

The First Chapter of the commentary on *THE GREAT PERFECTION: THE NATURE OF MIND, THE EASER OF WEARINESS*¹ called the Great Chariot

In Sanskrit the title is Mahasandhi citta visranta vrtti maharatha nama, In Tibetan Rdzogs pa chen po/ sems nyid ngal gso'i/ shing rta chen po/ shes bya ba

I prostrate to glorious Samantabhadra

From the ocean of the glorious two accumulations come clouds that bear the abundant rain of peace and happiness.

These are the hundreds of qualities of the Nature that constitute the beauties of trikaya.

The thunder of wisdom and kindness pervading the limits of space, the great drum of Bhrama, sounds.

To the all-knowing Chief of Beings, to the Dharma, and Sangha, the leaders of beings, I bow.

On an island in the lake of Uddiyana,
Born within the blossom on a lotus stalk,
Spontaneous emanation of the victorious ones,
Blazing with qualities of the major and minor marks,
Padmasambhava protects the lotus of my mind.

O primordial, spotless, full ocean; you who emanate samsara and nirvana
O non-dual, unborn, full nature; perfect essence of Buddha, you the natural state,
O fullness with no existence or lack of it, views that things are eternal or nothing, coming or going, nor object of complex variety.
O fullness with no conception of good or evil, you who neither accept or reject.
I bow to the uncompounded nature of the mind.

This is the unsurpassable city of joyous liberation. Here the Victorious Ones of the three times attained supreme peace. So that all beings may go there directly, it embodies the heart of the sutras and tantras. Here, day and night, with unremitting effort, with single-minded devotion, my mind is absorbed in peace. May this Great Chariot of the profound path that liberates from samsara be clearly elucidated.

Of this explanation of the GREAT PERFECTION, THE NATURE OF MIND, THE EASER OF WEARINESS, The single path of all Dharmas and traditions, there are three main sections:

First, the manner of entering on the composition of the treatise and the meaning of the introductory section,
Second, the extensive explanation of the main subject of the text,
Third, the conclusion.

First, the manner of entering on the composition of the treatise and the meaning of the introductory section,

The divisions are

First, the meaning of the homage
Second, The vow to compose the text.

First, the meaning of the homage

The Buddha has come into this world. The excellent speech of his teachings, holy Dharma, by the kindness of genuine beings remains in existence. Here are the details of how the ocean of the sutra and mantra vehicles may be practiced by a single individual Now that the freedoms and good favors, so difficult to attain, have been attained. In that way oneself and others may completely cross the ocean of sufferings of samsara. How mind,² wearied in samsara, eases its weariness in the land of peace is taught fully and without error.

This goes from how the beginner enters and begins, up to how the fruition of buddhahood manifests as the completed and perfect meaning of all the vehicles.

Wishing to compose the thirteen chapters of this treatise, the Great Perfection, the Nature of Mind, the Easer of Weariness, first I offer a short homage:

The primordial lord; the great, full ocean³ of buddha qualities;
Whose natural wisdom and kindness is limitless in its depth,
Birthplace of the Victorious Ones and all their sons,
Who emanates heaped up clouds of goodness and benefit,
I prostrate to the one who is all that is desired.

Thus I call on him. This lord is the manifestation of enlightenment, whose place is in the primordial ground. This is the teacher, the Buddha Bhagavat. Having the nature of the great full ocean of qualities of renunciation and realization, he rules the sphere of inexhaustible adornments of body, speech, and mind. All the depth and expanse of supreme understanding and wondrously arisen compassion are just this. This saying is incomprehensible to the mind that sees only the manifestations of the I of "this side."

By earnestly practicing the Dharma taught here, mind becomes the source of the jewel of the buddhas of the three times and their sons. Then for all the realms of sentient beings, as limitless as the sky, there are temporary benefits in accord with the happiness of each. Gods and human beings alike are brought to happiness.

The ultimate happiness is being brought to whichever of the three enlightenments of the shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas is in accord with the good fortune of one's powers. The holy masters join us to supremely ultimate great enlightenment, omniscient buddhahood. Therefore, I prostrate to glorious Samantabhadra and so forth, all the victorious ones and their sons throughout the ten directions and the three times.

As for the ocean of buddha qualities of this primordial lord. The glorious Net of Illusion says:

The lord is timeless perfection, known as buddhahood.
This is the precious ocean of Buddha qualities.

These precious jewels also arise within the connections of cause and effect. The Uttaratantra says:

From the Buddha comes the Dharma; From the Dharma comes the assembly of the Noble Ones.

Regarding emanation of heaped up clouds of goodness and benefit for sentient beings, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

They have compassionate kindness for every sentient being.
They have the kind of vision we do not need to seek.
They have the kind of vision that is inseparable.
I prostrate to you with the vision of goodness and happiness.

We should prostrate, because there are such great benefits for both ourselves and others. Since our bodies are of this excellent kind, if we briefly praise the good fortune of words and meaning, we realize that all this is holy. If we undertake this holy activity who stay with it, we cannot but reach the goal. The Great Commentary on the Prajnaparamita in 8000 Lines says:

Those who have the kindness of benefit for others
For the sake of living beings, do not relax their powers.
Though these holy beings bear a heavy burden,
They never put it down and dwell in discouragement.

This needs to be attained by others as well. When the teacher and shastra are understood in the highest way, there is devotion. Nagarjuna says:

It is never fruitless, when the authors of the treatises
Express their homage to the teacher and the teaching;⁴
Because of doing so they make us feel inspired.⁵

As for saying that both kinds of benefit must be attained, by perfecting the accumulations the goal of ripening will be accomplished. The Sutra of Vast Play says:

The wishes of those with merit will surely be accomplished.

The Sutra Producing many Buddhas:

Whoever for the Conqueror as a leader,
Does even a little bit of activity,
Having gone to various celestial realms,
Will attain the level of buddhahood.

Second, the vow to compose the text:

Here why homage is made:

Luminous dharmakaya, immaculate realm of the conquerors!
For us who wander here in samsara, by ignorant grasping,
Amidst this realm of grief of karma and the kleshas,
Today may our weariness come to rest in the nature of mind.

The nature of mind is primordial luminosity, the essence of the buddha realm. It is beyond the four extremes of existence, non-existence, eternalism, and nihilism. It primordially pervades all sentient beings. The Uttaratantra says:

When by the luminous nature of the mind
It has been seen that kleshas are essenceless,
After it has been realized that all beings
Are completely pure of the four extremes,

All will dwell within perfect buddhahood,
Possessing the mind that has no obscuration.
Beings completely purified will possess the limitless vision of the perceiver, wisdom.
Therefore, to that nature I pay homage.

Though primordially pure wisdom exists within us, by not recognizing it, we wander here in samsara. This karma of ignorance produces ego-grasping. By that in turn are produced passion, aggression, ignorance, pride, and envy. It is because of these five poisons or kleshas that we are whirling around here in samsara.

Why so? As various habitual patterns are superimposed on alaya, we enter into unhappiness. The least result is that by the karma of ignorance we are born as animals. The intermediate is that by the karma of seduction and desire we are born as pretas. The worst is that by the karma of aggression we are born in Hell.

Those who have pure merit, but also an equal amount of pride, are born as gods or human beings. Those who have equal parts of goodness and jealousy are born as asuras. Each of these has their own realm of existence, with its happiness, sorrow, and the states between them. They have their own sorts of good and evil behavior. So it is that we wander helplessly in this plain of the beginningless and endless sufferings of samsara, so difficult to cross. In vanity we grasp at an I or real self, which is like the seeming appearances of a dream. Though if we examine these well, they are non-existent, at this time of our confusion they appear to be really and truly existent. The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

The life of samsaric beings is like that in a dream.
Since this is so, no one is ever born or dies.

The Request of Bhrama says:

The beings of appearance are like those in a dream.
By their personal karma, they are bound as individuals.
They wander among samsara's many joys and sorrows.
Though their nature is suchness that is egoless
Still these unknowing children fixate I and ego,

And so samsara's torments are ever on the rise.

The sentient beings of samsara are held in various kinds of bondage. Though all dharmas are egoless, fixators of ego excluded themselves off from the eye of liberation, and have to be taught their own true essence.

How? When they know that this is their path, it is improper for them to concern themselves with the goal of peace alone. As all beings wander here in beginningless samsara, there is not even one has not been our father and our mother. So to reject them and liberate ourselves alone is not the proper way. The Teacher's Letter says:

Our kinsmen who are carried in the ocean of samsara
Seem to have tumbled down into a great abyss
If we have rejected these, who do not know what they are,
Because of the process of birth and death and transmigration,
If we produce liberation for ourselves alone,
They will never be liberated from their karma.

Thinking about that, and seeing the weariness of sentient beings, exhausted by the burden of their long wandering here in samsara, I wanted to compose a treatise giving the instructions of how we can ease this weariness by coming to the resting place ornamented by the wondrous wealth of the Victorious Ones, the level of great nirvana. I wanted to illuminate how by immeasurably abundant compassion, we can guide those wandering in samsara. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Kye! O son of noble family, when we see the realm of sentient beings, all undertakings of body, speech, and mind become the immeasurable great compassion. We work with the worldly sciences and those beyond the world that have come from the heads of the noble ones. Having been inspired to the good, we perform once more the buddha activity of the former Victorious Ones. Let us offer to the Tathagata. Let us raise the victory banner of Dharma. Let us introduce the great path of liberation. O Holy beings! O precious crest-ornament!

That was the vow to compose the text.

Second, there is the extensive explanation of the actual subject.

In general, the extensive explanation of the subject, how the two benefits arise, is in thirteen chapters.

I. The free and well-favored human body, so difficult to obtain

There are four sections:

- A. The general explanation of being free and well favored, and how it is so difficult to obtain.
- B. Recognition of being free and well favored.
- C. True analysis of the environment and inhabitants of the phenomenal world.
- D. The dedication of the merit of the situation.

A. The general explanation of being free and well favored, so difficult to obtain.

Within the general topic there are

- 1. The summary of the essence
- 2. The extensive explanation of the nature.

1. The summary of the essence

Now from the explanation of the real body of the text, first, briefly, the support of establishing enlightenment is being "well-favored." As for the details, here is the praise:

My friends, this body, the precious essence of freedom and favor,
Is very hard to gain within the six realms of beings,
Thus, like a blind man who has found a precious treasure,

With excellent joy, may good and benefit be accomplished.

Who has crossed over to enlightenment? This is the spiritual friend who has established enlightenment. The instruction is given to those with the good fortune of bodhicitta, the wish for enlightenment.

In regard to attaining the holy freedoms and favors, it is wonderful even for those who are not poor to attain what is supremely precious, let alone the poor. If those who are blind and helpless attain it, it is even more astonishingly wonderful than that. As for praise of beings, who attain the free and well favored human body, while they are whirled about in the six lokas of samsara, The Sutra Teaching the Freedoms and Favors says:

It is like this: Like a blind person who finds a precious jewel among earth and stones, sentient beings wandering in samsara, blinded by cataracts of ignorance who find their real humanity are supremely joyful. And so we ought to practice the Dharma, which is always excellent.

2. The extensive explanation of the nature,

There are eight topics

a) The extensive explanation of the eighteen freedoms and favors:

If you ask what are these freedoms and excellent favors,
We were not born in Hell, nor yet among hungry ghosts.
We are not beasts, nor long lived gods, nor vicious barbarians,
We were not reared in wrong views, nor in a time without buddhas,
Nor have we been born as idiots without speech,
We are completely free from all these eight non-freedoms.

We were born in the human realm, and in a central country.⁶
Also we sound in all our faculties,
Not having done inexpressibly wrong in deeds and actions,⁷
We are properly faithful to the objects of faith.
Thus the five holy favors regarding oneself are complete.

The Buddha has appeared and he has taught the Dharma.
Moreover, at this time the teachings still remain.
So that they may continue, people still follow them,
And others are treating us with kindness and concern.
These five favors are those that exist in regard to others.

Those were the eighteen kinds of being free and well-favored.
On this auspicious occasion they are complete within us.
So strive from the heart, that liberation may be accomplished.

We should take this to heart. Why? The life of the king of Brahmins Drökyi Kyeche says:

It is hard to find the opposites of the eight non-freedoms.
It is hard to find attainment of humanity.
It is hard to find the freedoms in purity and completeness.
It is hard to find the arising of a buddha.
It is hard to find true powers that are without defect.
It is hard to listen to the teachings of a buddha.
It is hard to find the friendship of any holy beings.
It is hard to meet with genuine spiritual friends.

If we are born as Hell beings, pretas, or animals; distracted by suffering, we have no freedom of body.
The blind, who cannot associate verbal symbols with their meanings, have no freedom of speech.

Those who are long-lived may never see the practice of Dharma. Buddhas may be absent, so that they arise in a dark kalpa without the appearance of the teachings. Even if buddhas appear, people may be coarse barbarians with no idea of entering. Even those who want to enter, falling into extremes of exaggeration or denigration, may fall into the four wrong views. Such people have no freedom of mind.

None of these have an opportunity to practice Dharma. They have been deprived of it by their own bad karma of the eight non-freedoms. By abandoning those eight, one always has the corresponding freedoms.

The Commentary on the Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

Beings in Hell, the pretas, and the animals;
The long-lived gods and those who are barbarians,
Those in an age without buddhas and those who have wrong views,
These and the blind comprise the eight states of non-freedom.

The Spiritual Letter, says:

Those who grasp wrong views and animals,
The hungry ghosts and beings born in Hell,
Those without the word of Victory,
And those who are born as savage barbarians,
The blind, the feeble-minded, and the gods;
These possess the faults of the eight non-freedoms.
Those who have the freedoms from these eight
Should strive in eliminating further births.

As for being well-favored, the Moon in your Heart Sutra says:

Those for whom the ten qualities are complete
Are said to be the ones who are well-favored.

What are these ten qualities. The following have been listed:

1. We have left behind the lower realms of life.
2. We are not feeble-minded.
3. Our senses are not impaired.
4. We are born as vessels.
5. Our health is good.
6. We are not impoverished.
7. We are not enslaved.
8. We have the power to use words.
9. We have come within view of many noble beings.

That is many people's view of what they are. But here they are as in the Sutra of the Twelve Perfections:

These are the five perfections pertaining to oneself

1. We have attained the human condition.
2. We are born in a country where there are noble ones.
3. Our powers are sound.
4. We have not performed extremely evil deeds.
5. We have faith in the proper topics of faith.

These are the five perfections pertaining to others.

6. A buddha has come.
7. The Dharma has been taught.
8. The holy Dharma still remains.
9. Others also practice it.
10. Others show kindness to those who practice the Dharma.

As for kindness to others, the spiritual friend apprehends us with compassion, and leads us to the Dharma. As for there being twelve perfections, the two bases of distinction are also counted.⁸ A tantra commentary says:

A central human being with faculties that are sound,
Without extreme bad actions, but with faith in the objects of faith.
These are the five kinds of favor pertaining to oneself.
A buddha has come and taught, and the teaching still remains.
The teaching still is followed and beings are kind to others.
These are the five kinds of favor pertaining to other beings.⁹

Here the freedoms are the essence and the favors are its particular dharmas. This is like the blue utpala lotus and its stalk and so forth. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

If even becoming human is difficult to attain,
Why even speak of completing the view of the precious freedoms?

b) Not being steadfast, even if we have the freedoms and favors

Even though we may have attained all of these freedoms, by craving samsaric happiness even a little:

If we accomplish no benefit within this life,
We may not hear later even the words "the higher realms".
Cycling again and again on the wheel of samsara
For a long time we will have to stay in the lower realms.
Having no knowledge of what we should accept and reject,
We will certainly go upon a mistaken path
Wandering in samsara, without beginning or end.

If within this life, so good to obtain, we do not practice the beneficial holy Dharma, by the power of karma we will be born in the lower realms. There we shall not so much as hear the words "higher realms," to say nothing of going there. The *Bodhicaryavatara*¹⁰ says:

As for our behavior which is of such a kind,
If we shall not even gain a human body,
It goes without saying we cannot go to higher realms.
For if we shall not even gain a human body,
We shall do only evil, and there can be no good.

Now when there is a chance for excellent behavior,
If, even so, good actions are not what we perform,
What are you going to do when they have come for you
With the stupefying sufferings of the lower realms?

If we go to the lower realms, we shall not be liberated for a very long time. The same text says:

Even in the course of a thousand million kalpas
I will not even hear the words, "the higher realms."

c) The instruction to strive for the dharma

An opportunity of liberation from the limitless depth of samsara is hard to find. So let us strive for the Dharma with all our hearts. That is the instruction.

Therefore, now when we still have the power to do so,
By auspicious conditions that accord with the proper path,
Relying on the inexhaustible wholesome dharmas
Gained by having gathered the two accumulations,
Let us pass beyond the city of samsara.

Keep in mind aging, becoming old and decrepit, and dying. Now while we still can, let us be guided by the path of liberation. If we do whatever goodness we can, we shall surely come forth from samsara. The Sutra of the Vast Display says:

O monks, because death, aging and enfeeblement are non-existent, because by nourishing goodness, one's powers will be transformed, and because enlightenment will proliferate, strive to accumulate merit and wisdom. For you the three cities of samsara will be emptied. The gates to the lower realms will be cut off. The stairway to the higher realms will be established. The realm of liberation will be attained.

d) How we must work hard at this

When the freedoms and favors of knowing about and establishing such benefit and goodness are accomplished by a guide who is our spiritual friend, extreme situations do not manifest. When this precious ship has been attained in the middle of the fearful, limitless ocean of samsara:

If we do not cross the limitless ocean of samsara
Now at the time of having attained this precious ship,
Then how can we do it at another time
When painful waves of the kleshas are always utterly raging?

If we have a great ship which will serve our purpose, we should use it to cross the ocean. Similarly, having attained this ship of humanity, we should cross the great ocean of samsara, so fearful and unbearable, whose beginning and end are not apparent. Because of wandering in constant birth, old age, sickness, and death, samsaric situations are never bearable. Shantideva says in the Bodhicaryavatara:

Whoever with the support of this ship of human birth,
Can cross the great waters of the river of suffering,
Since later such a ship may be difficult to find,
Would be wrong to sleep at this time, because of stupidity.

e) The suitability of this,

Because the freedoms and favors are so difficult to attain:

Therefore, quickly donning the armor of exertion
Clear the murk of mind and the events of mind,
And thus complete the path of spotless, luminous wisdom.
May the path of enlightenment be without obstacles.

When the turbulence of samsaric mind and mental events is pacified, the luminous wisdom of the nature of mind naturally rises. Becoming familiar with this is called the path of enlightenment. Try to practice it uninterruptedly day and night, abandoning sleep and tiredness. Just remain THERE. The Five Stages says:

All the complexities of mind and mental events
At the time when these are completely pacified
Arise as luminosity, the state of wisdom,
This is without conceptions and has no center or limit.

Here, "Mind," means exaggerated conceptions¹¹ which support the three realms. By the expressions of subsequent analysis¹² in terms of these there arise murky disturbances that obscure suchness. But when these conceptions are completely pacified, we enter into wisdom that is completely non-conceptualized. The Two Truths says:

Mind and mental contents¹³ are merely conceptualization,¹⁴
Exaggerated phenomena, the three realms of samsara.

Samsaric mind correlates with the generalized conception¹⁵ of "this," when an object is first seen.¹⁶ "That's an utpala lotus" is the mind's consciousness¹⁷ of such a first moment. Then, as we discriminate¹⁸ various distinctions of that object, we make analytic demarcations of the contents of mind. Here there are such conceptions as, "this utpala lotus is blue in color, and round in shape. It has a blossom, stamens, and pistil."

The Center and Extremes says:

To see the object as "that" is consciousness.
Distinctions of that are objects of the mind.

The *Abhidharmakosha*¹⁹ says:

There are conception and analytic discernment and these may be fine and coarse.

All who are bound in such conception and analytical discernment, bound by such habitual patterns of mind and mental events, are blocked from the level of buddhahood. The *Madhyamakavatara*²⁰ says:

When all the dry firewood of knowable objects has been burned,
There is peace, the dharmakaya of the victorious ones.
Then there is no arising, and also no cessation.
Cessation of mind brings manifestation of the kayas.

When, within self-awareness wisdom, we become enmeshed in the net of the kleshas, because of the confusion of grasping and fixation, that is called "samsaric mind," the dim and dismal cellar of examination and analysis. Liberation from that is buddhahood. The enlightened object and perceiver are free from the attachment to the examination and analysis of grasping and fixation. The Praise of the Vajra of Mind, says:

If we are enmeshed within the net of kleshas,
"Mind" is that which is expressible by speech.
If we should be separated from the kleshas,
This is the very thing that is known as buddhahood.

The Abhisamayalankara says:

Having "big mind" is the jewel itself

Buddhahood is having "big mind," or the great wisdom. The Sutra on the Array of Qualities, says:

The mind of sentient beings is that of false conception.
However, the great wisdom is the mind of buddhahood.
Just like gold in mountains or in the banks of rivers,
Sometimes it is pure and sometimes it is not.

In mantrayana big²¹ mind and its big kleshas are said to be wisdom itself. It is like that:

The dimness that does not know that is purified of its blindness.

The unceasing desire of mind is stupidity. When we meditate, objects still appear within awareness, but awareness of concept and analysis ceases. The Sutra on the Bases of Discipline says:

Within dhyana O monks, though the motion of mind has ceased, objects still appear within the sense-consciousnesses. Objects whirl with the motions of samsara.

But now they are like fleeting reflections in a still pond.

The Ascertainment of Proper Reasoning says:

Even when the inner self rests motionless,
Visual forms arise in the mind of the visual sense.

Within the senses, apparent objects are not conceptualized. The same text says:

This is taught because sense-awareness is not samsaric.

In brief, conceptualization and analysis of objects produced due to grasping and fixation are called samsaric mind and its mental objects. Object and insight²² when grasping and fixation are completely pacified are kaya and wisdom. The Sutra of the Glorious Garland says:

Whenever there are distinctions of grasping and fixation, that is reprovable. Such conceptualization of objects is the mind of samsara. Whenever grasping and fixation do not exist, object and insight are the wisdom of liberation.

By that it is established.

f) The samsaric torments if we do not make an effort now.

A person who has the Dharma by the power of former goodness:

Whoever has the happy good fortune of the Dharma,
Becoming a vessel of that precious spotlessness,
Yet has no use for its cooling rain of Dharma-amrita,
Will be annihilated by the torments of samsara.
The holy rain of the cooling waters of wisdom
From the banks of clouds of benefit and great bliss Falls to cleanse the free and favored minds of beings.

Being a good vessel is like having the precious human body. When the rain of dharma falls on us, if we are not vessels who can hold it, we will only exhaust oneself in suffering in the torments of samsara. The Generation Born in an Iron House says:

Even though the free and favored vessel is gained,
Since no drops of Dharma are received within it,
We shall roast in Hellfire, so difficult to bear.
Long and excruciating pain will be our karma.

g) The teaching of the freedoms and favors, which support the dharma.

Supported by the freedoms that we have, the natural arising of Dharma is like this:

Therefore joyfully practice the Dharma from your heart.

That is the instruction. The supreme teachings of the Buddha are the rain of Dharma. The freedoms and favors are its support. This rain naturally falls. The Arrangement of the Vessel says:

Kye! O child of a noble family, for those with the freedoms and favors, the great rain of perfect Dharma will fall. They will possess immeasurable benefits.

h) Why the freedoms and favors are difficult to obtain:

It is harder for us to gain a human birth
Than for a tortoise to thrust its head into a yoke
That is tossed about in the middle of the ocean.
That is what the teacher of Gods and men has said.
Then why even speak of a free and well favored body.
Let us be diligent in days that are to come.

Let us say that a turtle lives in an ocean for a hundred times a hundred years. Floating upon that ocean is a single yoke with a hole in it, blown by the wind so that it did not stay in one place for even a moment. It is very unlikely that the turtle's throat will be thrust into it. But obtaining a human body from within the lower realms of samsara is taught to be far more difficult. The Spiritual Letter says:

It is harder to gain a human birth and the Dharma,
From the state of having been an animal,
Than for a turtle to put its head into a yoke
While both of them are lost in the vastness of the ocean.
Therefore with these faculties of human beings
By practicing holy Dharma let us reach its fruition.

The Bodhicaryavatara says: 4.20

This is the reason why the Bhagavan has taught
That attaining human birth is much more difficult
Than for a turtle to put its head into a yoke,
Tossed within the vastness of a limitless ocean.

As for the scripture they are speaking about, the Bunch of Flowers says:

It is difficult for the Buddha Bhagavats to enter into the world. But very much more difficult than that is attaining human birth. Let the reason for this be taught in an example. O Shariputra, let the great difficulty of the first be like an ocean. Within it let there be a yoke, having a single hole. Let there also be a decrepit turtle. In that great ocean the wind blows from above and blows from below, and as it blows these things about, that decrepit turtle rises out of the ocean once in a hundred times a hundred years. The difficulty of becoming human again after having fallen back is not equal to that of the throat of that decrepit turtle that rises once in a hundred times a hundred years quickly entering into the hole of that quickly moving yoke. For those who fall away like that, becoming human again is very much more difficult.

If even attaining the human body is so very difficult, why even speak of a body with the freedoms and favors, and the view that realizes the Dharma. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 4.15

That a tathagata has actually arisen,
That we have faith, and have attained a human body,
And that, in addition, we can practice goodness;
When will what is so rare ever be gained again?

The Request of The One with the Jewel in the Crown says:

To see a guide is something very hard to find.
To hear the teachings, the Dharma of peace, is very hard.
It is very hard to be born as a free and favored person.
Discipline and faith are always hard to find.

B. Now there is the second division of the general meaning: delineating the nature of the freedoms and favors

There are six sections:

1. The explanation of merely attaining a human body.

What is a "precious human body?"

a. Here is the explanation of the three divisions of those with a human body:

There are some who merely gain a human birth,
Some whose body is special, and some whose birth is precious.

b. What is said about the divisions:

Respectively these are persons who act improperly,
Because they have no knowledge of what is right and wrong.
Even if their powers are sound, their birth is common.
They are barbarians even in the central realm.

The Sutra of Precious Space says:

These are born in the human world because of former goodness, have senses that are completely sound, and always are born in a country where the dharma is practiced. However, they still do not know about karma and its ripening.

Many of them will depend on the path of what is not good. It may be said that these have become human beings, but they will only be the worse for it. That is the last time they will be human, because they will fall without limit into the lower realms of death.

2. The special human body

Those who do not apply the teachings are confused
They do not have proper faith about what is right and wrong.
Preoccupied with this life, distracted by its business,
Undisciplined and beguiled, neglecting what is to come,
With no interest in liberation, though they may hear the Dharma,
They do not have the best body, but only the middle kind.

Occasionally their minds are drawn to something wholesome,
But mostly their mental vision is blocked by evil deeds.
They only go through the motions, what good are they to anyone?
Whether they take the form of a householder or a monk,
Only because they are slightly above lower realms,
The Buddha has said that these have a special human body.

The Sutra of Precious Space says:

In the realm of sentient beings some do not dwell purely in the Dharma, even though they could, because their behavior mixes right and wrong, and they are preoccupied with worldly activities. Even if they are sincere, with undisciplined body, speech, and mind, they are easily seduced. Falling into the three lower realms, they have the karma of remaining there. However, since they have seen the sunlight of the Buddha's compassion, and have had seeds of liberation for a long time, they are said to have the special human body.

Because their behavior mixes vice and virtue and they give only lip service to devotion, they are not protected from the lower realms. The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

Breaking their discipline, they go to the lower realms.
They are unprotected, no matter how great their learning.

The Nirvana Sutra says:

Kashyapa, the monk Devadatta had heard only the ordinary sutra vehicle of the burden of an elephant. Even though he grasped it, because of his non-virtue, he fell into the lower realms.

The Pair Sutra says:

Collection of Medicines, those sentient beings who wail so at the time of death are not among the ones who possess ripened karma of good deeds. If these are protected from karma, who would not be?

Also it says there:

Though the Tathagata has arisen and been seen,
And though the striking of the gandi has been heard,
Though they have heard the teachings of the holy Dharma,
Which take us to the peace which is called nirvana,
Nevertheless they never acted on what they heard.
People such as these are later going to say:

I am a person with the mind of a perfect fool.
Having fallen under the power of bad companions,
By the desires which rose from confusion in my mind,
I produced the karma of many evil deeds.
By cultivating and going along with these desires
I have been a murderer of living beings.
By listening to the people who waste the goods of the sangha
I had to know the unbearable fruit of doing that.

I am destroying stupas by my harmful thoughts
By malicious words I punish everyone, even my mother.
Regarding this human body that I formerly made
Soon all my transgressions will be common knowledge.
My mind will then be summoned to the lowest Hells.
The births I see ahead are more than I can bear.

3. The Precious Human Body.

As for the third part:

Supremely excellent beings, spotless vessels of Dharma
Apply their powers to what they hear and contemplate.
Having tamed themselves, they establish others in goodness.
They are immovable in their practice, like Mount Meru.
All these straightforward sages, like banners of saintliness,
Whether they are householders or renunciates,
Are taught by the Teacher to have the precious human body.

After having tamed oneself by hearing, contemplating, and the yogic resting of meditation, one also exhorts others to goodness. That is the good gate of auspicious Dharma. Putting on the great armor of liberation one flourishes the great banner of the sages. Calling this badge or clothing a victory banner is not just a figure of speech. When we urge others to work for the good, whether one lives in a house or is a renunciate, this is called having the precious human body. The Sutra of Glorious Secret says:

Glorious Secret, though many have heard this, their hearing is obstructed. The meaning is made into conceptualized thoughts. But by meditating without kleshas, union is produced. If one also urges others to do this, this produces the essence of the freedoms and favors, the most sublimely beautiful thing in this world including its gods.

Also the Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, bodhisattvas say, "I practice the good," to exhort others to do the same. Producing the essence of the freedoms and favors, this is praised by all the buddhas. I praise it. I honor it.

As to how others should be exhorted the Vast Play says:

All compounded things will quickly be destroyed.
Like lightening in the sky they cannot last for long.
As your time too is therefore drawing ever nearer,
The time has come for true repentance to manifest.

The master Candrakirti says:

First for a little while all the listeners
Will certainly be joined to small talk and the like.
When they become good vessels, after that occurs,
That is the time to relate to them with deeper words.

That is how it should be done. What it is to be such a vessel, generally depends on which of the vehicles one is concerned with. In particular, as for the freedoms and favors in the unsurpassable vessel, the Jewel of Space Sutra says:

The bodhisattva Akashagarbha asked, "Bhagavan, how should the freedoms and favors be viewed?"

This was the word of the Buddha: If it is divided by the discursive conceptions of mind, it is abused. This should be known as disturbing what one is engaged in. After discursive conceptions of mind have been pacified, resting within the nature is known as freedom. As for the favors, if the nature of mind, awareness, receives the wealth of what mind really is, that is being well-favored.

4. Why we should think about the Dharma.

Here is the reason why the person who has attained freedom and favor should think only of the Dharma:

Therefore, having heard the Dharma from holy beings,
To establish what is proper, abide within in the Dharma
Cultivate what is Dharmic, weed out what is not.
By practicing Dharma, we will abide within the Dharma.

That is the holy instruction. It is difficult to meet with a spiritual friend. To hear the Dharma and be able to practice it is difficult. Always to work hard is very difficult. When the Buddha was expounding the scriptures of the Vinaya at Vaishali, this was among the beneficial instructions given:

O monks, look on the beings of the lower realms. After going there, a material human form is very difficult to obtain. Look on bad teachers. Meeting a genuine spiritual friend is very difficult. Look on those who have broken their discipline, and how they have damaged discipline and liberation. By dwelling in the goodness of renunciation, Dharma, which alone is good, will be practiced. Therefore, joyfully dwell in forests or monasteries, and go beyond these others.

5. The benefit of contemplating the reason

As for the benefit produced:

Procrastinate no longer. Cross over samsara's ocean.
Quickly go to the island of peace and pass beyond suffering.

The Request of Devaputra Sutra says:

Devaputra, Exerting ourselves in this alone, let us exert ourselves on the side of the good. We shall quickly hold the benefits of complete, perfect enlightenment.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Having well attended an excellent spiritual friend,
We ought to make the attempt to behave in a decent way.
This is what was taught by the utterly perfect Sage.
Attend on holy beings, for having attended them,
There are very many who will attain to peace.

6. If the inhabitants of this earth practice, there will be great benefit.

Beings who have been born as inhabitants of this earth, Jambuling, have established a portion of goodness. But if, having become human beings, they do not train in goodness, here is what is said:

There is no one who has a mind more foolish
Than those becoming human who do not live in goodness.
Like coming back empty-handed from a land of jewels,
They make no use of the freedom and favor of their lives.
So let us act in the way of the Dharma, which leads to peace.

Though we may have attained these freedoms, if we do not practice the holy Dharma, then even though we have come to an island of precious jewels, we take none of them. Returning empty-handed, we are fools. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 4.23

If even having attained the leisure of these freedoms
We do not train in what is wholesome and what is good,
There is no seduction that is greater than this.
There can be no fool who is greater than such a one.

After doing some insignificant bit of good, we shall not have complete attainment. But by exerting themselves in the truth and goodness of Dharma alone, many attain the perfection of the Buddha qualities. The Precious Mala says:

Thus it is that if we always practice the Dharma,
We shall be the masters of all within the world.
Whoever transforms what is noxious into goodness,
In a little while will surely reach the peak.

Because the good of Dharma will wake us from our sleep,
When we awake to goodness, we shall be purified.
Because the master within us is one who has no faults,
Even in dreams we shall see what is virtuous and wholesome.

If we have respectful devotion to our parents,
Attending on the principal persons of our family,
Committin ourselves with patience to virtuous behavior,
Speaking soft words of truth without any calumny,

By such discipline over a single lifetime,
The powers of a god have actually been attained.
Once again at this time, we shall produce those powers,
We gradually will establish the state of buddhahood.

After that:

As for the benefits, the fruition of such karma,
We shall act in accordance with what we have come to know.
If we are always performing benefits for beings,
This itself will be of benefit to us.

While we do so, for this reason, there will be the wholesome merits of the Dharma.

C. True examination of the nature of the environment and inhabitants of the phenomenal world,

There are six sections:

1. The teaching of mind, the root of Dharma.

When we undertake to find the natures of the environment and inhabitants of the phenomenal world, they are truly analyzed as being one:

Dharma depends on mind, and likewise mind in turn
Depends on the freedoms and favors, so both depend on them.
Now these many conditions and causes have come together.
The thing we chiefly need to do is tame our minds.

All dharmas depend on mind. Mind depends on the free and well-favored human body. This is the interdependent arising of the environment and inhabitants of the phenomenal world. Mind is the realm of Dharma, the cause of all that is wholesome. As it is the companion necessary condition of the freedoms and favors, we must study exactly how to tame the mind. The Spiritual Letter says:

The Bhagavan says we must tame our minds.
Mind is the root of Dharma, as is taught.

The All-creating King, says:

Without remainder all dharmas, however they appear,
Are emanated by mind, produced by the nature of mind.

The Lankavatara Sutra says:

Though reflections may appear within a mirror
They do not exist; and if we do not know
The appearances of mind as mere appearances,
The duality of conceptual thinking will arise.

With the seeds of habitual patterns, what is completely pure Arises as the variety of the mental contents.
Though for human beings these seem to be external,
Nevertheless the phenomenal world is only mind.

Also it says there, in regard to mind that does not possess true reality:

For mind that is disturbed by seeds of habitual patterns
Within the completely real, appearances will arise.

The appearances of mind are like those of a dream. Arising merely from the viewpoint of confused mind, the variety of inner and outer arises as nothing at all. Such appearances arise from the seeds of confused habitual patterns. In reality they do not truly exist; but because they appear in the mind as if they did, mind is the root of all dharmas. Though mountains and so forth appear externally projected from the viewpoint of confused mind,²³ there are really no mountains. They exist only in the mind. If students have not guarded the mind before, they will not be able to guard it later. The Bodhicaryavatara says:

If this mind has not been guarded previously,
We will not be able to keep the disciplines.

Also it says there:

Aside from the kind of discipline that guards the mind,
What is the use of performing many disciplines?

Also it says there:

Thus it is that everything that frightens us,
And also all of our measureless pain and suffering,

Are only contents that have risen with the mind.
So it has been taught by the Speaker of Truth himself.

Who was it that produced the multitude of weapons
For the use of sentient beings within the Hells?
Who was it that produced this ground of blazing iron?
From where do these multitudes of blazing flames arise?²⁴

Every one of them, and all such things as these,
Are the mind of the evil-doer, so the Sage has said.
Thus it is that in the whole of this three-fold world,
There are no terrors that are other than the mind.

Also it says there: 5.5

If we ever succeed in taming the mind alone,
All these various things will likewise have been tamed.

Since all that is wholesome and unwholesome within samsara has arisen from mind, working to tame the mind is the root of all Dharmas. The Sutra of the Clouds of the Three Jewels says:

When we have been instructed by our worldly mind,
This mind of ours will never see the actual mind.
All our virtuous karma and that which has no goodness
Are nothing but collections in that worldly mind.

Also it says there in the chapter called, "Guarding the light:"

Mind produces various karmas like a painter.
In manifesting all harm, it is like an external danger.
In producing all suffering, it is like an enemy.

The *Dro Namje Sutra*²⁵ says

The ground is made of iron, blazing hot,
And blazing tongues of flame are everywhere.
The justice of the sharpened iron saws
Divides a single body into eight.
Such things as these arise as mental contents,
From evil acts of body, speech, or mind.

Mind is the root of all our joys and sorrows. Our only effort should be to tame the mind.

2. The Instruction that We Should Exert ourselves in Dharma Day and Night.

When we are wandering in samsara, as successive distractions occurring time and time again, here is what should be done:

Being terrified of death, within our endless births,
With deprivation and suffering falling on us like rain,
Arises from making no use of being free and well-favored.
The result is a state of becoming radically disturbed.

The higher manifestations, the dharmas of truth and goodness
Arise from thinking how hard it is to be free and favored,
Enjoy such an effort unstintingly, working day and night.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

Kye! O son of noble family, wherever beings wander within samsara, the body adorned with the freedoms and favors, so hard to obtain, is not produced, due to manifestation of thoughts. Because of the bad company of non-spiritual friends, there are samsaric phenomena, and we are tormented in flames of suffering. Nevertheless, by contemplating the freedoms and favors, we shall be completely liberated from samsara.

3. When the benefits have been explained, we arouse joy

Now there is the instruction to be joyful because of these benefits:

Here since it is useful to have seen a guide,
And it is of use to hear the Dharma and practice it,
Making use of this life and all its later fruits,
Arises from having gained this free and favored body.
Contemplate this again and again, with the highest joy.

Having seen how Buddhas of former times were completely liberated, having the benefit of being well-favored day and night on the present occasion, and collecting the seeds of a later liberation--this is what we have, if we are among the fortunate. All this arises from contemplating the freedoms and favors, which are so hard to obtain. The Closely Placed Mindfulness says:

Ananda, how should the arising of what has been well seen and well heard by you from having contemplated the freedoms and favors be viewed? It is what establishes the happiness of beings, and whatever good dharmas there may be. That is how it should be viewed.

Therefore, let us meditate with heartfelt joy on having attained these freedoms.

4. How we can attain superhuman goodness

Now, moreover there is the explanation of how superhuman goodness is to be established:

Since having attained the deathless level of amrita
By the Lord of this world of beings, including the gods,
And his sons among the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas,
Arose from having attained the precious human body,
The freedoms and favors are praised as better than being a god.
Therefore, rejoice in having attained this human body.

When the Sage, the Bhagavan, attained enlightenment, he became the chief of the human beings of Jambuling. Therefore, he was called better than the gods. The Sutra of Complete Enlightenment says:

Enlightenment in the realm of the gods produces an exclusive pride, and truth is not completely realized. It is seen only as a human being, for whom the freedoms and favors are complete. Therefore, to the place of those who dress in yellow and white.²⁶

The Bodhicaryavatara says:

This body, which is better than the body of a god...

5. Praise of the freedoms and favors, the support of all the vehicles

The level of wisdom, that sees the truth without conception
Is easy to gain among gods and men as a human being.
Even the vajra vehicle, profoundest heart of the path,
Is easily gained as the fruit of attaining a human body.
It is taught that among the foundations of the Dharma,
Within both the greater and the lesser vehicles,

The free and well favored human body is best of all.

The Abhidharmakosha says:

Thirdly, nothing higher than this is seen:
Within the valley of sadness of human beings
So that they might see its end this was composed.

Also the suchness of the secret mantra is quickly established with the support of human birth. The Tantra of Exhausting the Four Elements says:

This is the wondrously risen king of secret mantra.
If human beings exert themselves in gaining it,
Accomplishment occurs within this very life.
Why even speak of the siddhis of any other yogas?

Therefore, as the support of all the vehicles, the freedoms and favors have been praised.

6. Meditating on how difficult these are to obtain.

To take this difficulty of obtaining a human body as an object of meditation, sit on a comfortable seat. Take refuge and arouse bodhicitta. Then we visualize our own bodies, adorned with the freedoms and favors:

As a poor man who has found a gem of the highest value,
Fearful and anxious that it was nothing but a dream,
Contemplate the freedoms and favors with joyful longing,
Since this will establish the holy benefits of the Dharma.

Like a poor man who finds the finest of gems, let us rejoice in having obtained these freedoms and favors. This is a Dharma that should be practiced exclusively. Thinking, "If only this is not a dream!" we are afraid and terrified. Since we have attained it, meditating in heartfelt joy, let us dedicate it to the ultimate benefit of sentient beings. The Discrimination of Scripture says:

Maudgala, these freedoms alone should be contemplated. Remember them with joy.

D. The fourth section of the general meaning: Dedicating the Merit.

Now there is the dedication of the merit of having taught the freedoms and favors to sentient beings:

The futile agitation of beings is pacified,
By the precious amrita of this auspicious news.
Going into sweet solitude of pleasant forest retreats,
May Mind, worn out within this thicket of the kleshas,
Be freed this very day from all its weariness.

By looking at this explanation of the holy amrita of peace, adorned with a continuous stream of the flowers of truth, may all beings, exhausted by the agitations of this life, eliminate them. In a single joyful life, in the peaceful solitude of meditation, may their minds, long wearied by samsara, be released from that weariness.

This is the instruction on the particular topic of easing weariness. May the meaning of the whole chapter showing samsara and its sadness be instantly taken to heart. There is also a dedication written after completing the chapter. May the further chapters also be known in that way:

In peaceful forests, caves, and joyful valleys of herbs,
Dancing with moving flowers, to the rush of waterfalls,
May this mind, which has been so long in complete exhaustion.
Producing the holy benefit of the freedoms and favors,
Come to rest in unmoving equality/equanimity.

May no beings be seen who are not tamed by that.
With pacification of kleshas and the seven noble riches²⁷
After leaving behind this body and this life,
May we reach the primordial level--the King of Mind.

II: The impermanence of Life

There are five sections.

- A. The brief teaching.
- B. The extended explanation.
- C. The instruction that we should exert ourselves.
- D. The concluding summary.
- E. The dedication of merit.

A. The brief teaching.

Even though the freedoms, so difficult to obtain, have been obtained, since our minds are not stable, we are instructed that our nature is such that we need to exert ourselves:

Even if this hard-won freedom has been gained,
These destructible dharmas will not last for even an instant.
If they are examined, they are without an essence.
They are no more to be trusted than bubbles floating on water;
So contemplate day and night the certainty of death.

Even if the freedoms and favors are obtained, they cannot be permanent. They have no heart like a banana tree and, will not bear analysis. Like bubbles on water, they appear for only a moment. Then every one of their main and subsidiary characteristics is destroyed. On examination, they are necessarily found to be separable from reality. The Shrine of Telling the Reason Why says:

Kye ma! How impermanent are all compounded things!
Anything that is born is going to be destroyed.
Since having once been born, all will be destroyed,
"Them as dies quickly will be the lucky ones!"

They are like starry lamps that are clouded-over with mist,
Ephemeral things like bubbles on water or drops of dew,
Dreamily insubstantial, like lightning in the clouds.
All compounded things are taught to be that way.

B. The extended explanation,

- 1. Grasping the importance of the impermanence of the human body.

This essenceless body is impure and changeable. Its individual qualities are separable and nothing about it continues. Here is the instruction that those inclined to material desires should absorb the mind day and night in contemplating impermanence:

This body, the principal source of the rising of the kleshas,
Is the source of all suffering and unhappiness of the mind.
Though decked in garments and ornaments, flower garlands and such,
And worshipped with many offerings of food and drink,
In the end we must separate and part from it.
Because it is impermanent and destructible,
This body will be food for foxes, vultures, and jackals.
Abandon all thoughts that it is important, lasting, or pure.
Rather, from now on, let us practice the holy Dharma.

Grasping our alleged bodies as a permanent I and self, we offer them food and clothing, tending them with a level of ceremony befitting our ideas. Though we hardly want to talk about it, sorrowful time speaks instead by reversing our ministrations to harm. Shantideva says:

This body of ours is like a momentary reflection.

The time when we will be taken by the Lord of Death comes without warning. When the mind separates from the body, we cannot be with the body any more. It will be food for charnel birds, dogs, foxes, and vultures. To count such a thing as paramount and even think that we should do evil deeds for its sake should be regarded as vanity. Really we are something like a servant indentured to the body's happiness. Why is the body so worthy of being rewarded with food and clothing? What is worth exertion day and night is the Dharma. The Sutra of Instructions to the King says:

O great king, these have an essence like a great mountain, solid and firm in all the four directions. This mountain is indestructible, not to be split, very hard, undamageable. Its four sides, dense and massive, touch the sky and return again to the earth. Grass, trees with trunks, branches, and all their leaves, living things, and spirits accumulate there, like flour on a mill-stone.

To escape it by speed, remove it by force, buy it off, or get rid of it with substances, mantras, and medicinal herbs is no easy task.

O great king, that is what these four great terrors are like. One cannot escape them by speed, remove them by force, buy them off. To get rid of them with substances, mantras, and medicinal herbs is no easy task.

What are these four? They are old age, sickness, death, and deterioration.

O great king, old age comes to conquer youth. Illness comes to conquer health. Deterioration comes to conquer all our good qualities. Death comes to conquer life itself. One cannot escape them by speed, remove them by force, or buy them off. To get rid of them with substances, mantras, and medicinal herbs is no easy task.

O great king, it is like this. The king of beasts, the lion, dwells among the beasts. He preys on the beasts. He rules as he wishes. The beasts are powerless against his mighty jaws.

O great king, it is like this. There is no provision against the gleaming staff of the Lord of Death, there is no protector, no refuge, no friendly forces, no friends and relatives. Our joints will divide and come apart. Our flesh and blood will dry up. Our bodies will be racked by sickness. We shall rage with thirst. Our arms and legs will convulse. We will not be able to act. We will have no strength. Our bodies will be covered in saliva, mucus, urine, and vomit. Our powers of vision, hearing, smelling, tasting, touch, and thought will fade away. We shall vomit. Our voices will crack and wheeze. Our medicines will be given up as useless. All our medicine, food, and drink will be thrown away. Our possessions will go to others. We shall lie in our beds for the last time. We shall subside into the beginningless round of birth, old age, and death. We shall have no body. We shall be terrified by the Lord of Death. Our powers of acting will be gone. Our breathing will stop. Our mouths and noses will gape. Our teeth will be exposed. They will demand, "Give us our inheritance." Our karma will take over, and we shall pass into the control of samsaric existence. Alone without a second, we shall be friendless. We shall leave this world. We shall be outside the world. We shall be borne up in the great change of abode which is death. We shall dwell in the great darkness. We shall fall over the great precipice. We shall be crowded off the edge of the world. We shall be cast into the great wilderness. The great ocean will carry us away. Our karmic energy will pass away. We shall go to ugly places. We shall enter the great battle. We shall be seized by the great harm. We shall die away into space. Our fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, sons, and daughters will gather round. Our breathing will stop. They will say that our property and clothes should be handed out. Oh no! our fathers will say. Oh no! our mothers will say. Oh no! our children will say. Fear will overwhelm us. Generosity, penance, and Dharma will be our only friends. There will be no refuge but Dharma. There will be no other protector. There will be no other friendly forces.

O great king, at this time, at this moment, the Dharma will be an island, a dwelling, a protector, a teacher. O great king, though looking like we are asleep in our beds, we shall experience appearances of the life to come. If we are going to go to the lower realms, terrifying premonitions of those realms will arise. What refuge will there be then but Dharma?

O great king, You should fully guard such a body. But no matter how perfectly you look after it, its time of death will come. Intimates having all virtues, with whom we have been satisfied by much pure food and drink and so on, parents and children, will be there for the last time. The medicines will be thrown away. When everything is gone, we will be unhappy. Such will be the time of death.

O great king, your body will be repeatedly washed and fumigated with incense. It will be covered with fragrant flowers and, no doubt, pleasantly perfumed aromas will arise.

O great king, you will be dressed in fine clothes of Varanasi cotton and silk, and when this has been done for the last time, it will be like going to a defiled, stinking place, as a servant who has to go alone, and so the time of death will come.

O great king, though you have enjoyed your various desirable possessions, abandoning them all, as if they did not satisfy your desires, the time of death will come.

O great king, within your house incense, flowers, silk hangings, seats, and various cloths will be collected. With the pillows on the left and right, your bed will be taken away to the great charnel ground full of crows, foxes, and nauseating human corpses. Doubtless your motionless body will lie upon the ground.

O great king, as you are thus carried on the backs of your elephants, horses, and so on, different kinds of music will be heard and pleasantly enjoyed. Various parasols, victory banners, and so forth will be raised aloft. The new king, minister, and friends and relatives will make pleasant little speeches, praising you and going to look at you. The bed, formerly not raised very far, after you have died in it will be raised high by four pallbearers, lifted by your brothers and so forth. After servants, compelled by painful beatings bring it out by the south gate of the city, in a solitary wild place it will be put down on the earth. You will be eaten by crows, vultures, foxes, and so forth. Your bones will be burned by fire, thrown into water, or put on the ground, whichever it may be. They will be dispersed by wind, sun, and rain, and strewn in all directions. They will rot.

O great king, all composite things are impermanent. Do not rely on them.

This extensive teaching should be taken to heart and remembered. Persons knowing that the appearances of this life, no matter what they are, are empty, should try to exert themselves solely in practicing the holy Dharma, day and night.

2. To attain even the realm of Bhrama and so forth is impermanent.

Those who are the true foundation of wealth on the three levels²⁸

Gods like Bhramaa Shiva, Suurya, and Ishvara,

Though they shine in the radiant gleam of fame and fortune, Have no chance to vanquish the realm of the Lord of Death

Even if they stay in samadhi for a kalpa,

When their karma has been exhausted, that is their time of death.

Gods as well as asuras, siddhas, and sorcerers,

However many villeins and vassals there may be

Throughout their endless births are terrified by death.

Bhrama, Maheshvara, Vishnu, Indra, the four great world-protecting kings, and so forth fill the world with great rays of light, brighter than a thousand suns. They are more splendid than a mountain of gold. The fame of their merits fills the world. They are the highest beings of the three worlds, below the earth, upon the earth, and above the earth. But, though they are adorned with all this real wealth, they still have to die. The Dulwa Lung says:

O monks, look on this wealth as being essenceless and subject to deterioration. If the retinue mindful of my teachings were transferred into the inconceivable life and insatiable powers of Bhrama, Indra, the world protectors and so forth, they would be brought down to the lower realms.

Also it says there:

Bhrama the pure one, wrathful Indra, and thousand-eyed Surya,

As well as desireless Vishnu, are impermanent, and passing.

The display of the sun and moon is only for a moment.

The continents of the world, are seen to have been emptied.

The gods of the four dhyanas, and the other gods, the asuras, siddhas who have accomplished austerities, and all holders of vidya mantra still die. The same text says:

The gods who accomplish the dhyanas, as well as the kinnaras And ascetic sages who are not gods but blaze with splendor,
Are impermanent, though they may live for a long time or a kalpa.
As for conditioned humans, whose bodies are like foam,
No need to discuss their freedom from individual destruction?

The lords of the four continents, the universal monarchs, kings, ministers, and all kinds of ordinary people, monastic renunciates, brahmins, householders and so on, none of them escape death. The Shrine-room of Telling the Reason Why says:

Kings possessing the seven precious treasures,
Great noble lords and royal ministers
Monks and brahmins, householders and such,
All of these beings are impermanent.
They are like beings experienced in a dream.

3. There is impermanence because change is the nature of things.

Because there is transference and change, there is impermanence:

Within the impermanent play of the rain-clouds of this life,
In garlands of flashing lightning, dances the Lord of Death.
Day and night, the falling rain of the changing seasons
Drowns whatever sprouts may grow within the three levels.

Ornamented by the essence of the freedom and favors, the dark summer cloud-banks of this life gather, while, naturally wreathed in quivering lightning, the Lord of Death performs his dance. Day and night, not pausing for an instant, the rain of immanent death falls constantly, flooding out and drowning all the sprouts of sentient beings dwelling within the three worlds. The Vast Play says:

The three worlds' impermanence is like the clouds of autumn.
The birth and death of beings has the aspect of a dance.
The lives of beings vanish like lightning into space.
Like waterfalls cascading down a precipitous mountain,
As quickly as the water comes it falls away.

4. The impermanence of the Vessel and Essence

The vessel is the world, which has long been stable and motionless. The accompanying essence or contents supported by it is taught to be moving beings.

When the vessel and contents of this impermanent world,
With all its various cycles of creation and destruction,
Is destroyed seven times by fire and once by water,
And blown away like dust by the force of the raging wind,
Even Mount Meru, with its four slopes of precious substance,
Surrounded by the four oceans and the four continents,
Encircled by mountain ranges and the ramparts of the world,
Will not endure when all is turned to a single space.
Thinking that this time must certainly come to pass,
Therefore, let us practice the Dharma from our hearts.

The external vessel and contents are destructible. The inner vessel and contents too are taught to be impermanent.

In the beginning of the first kalpa, in the accommodating sky, the empty space of nothing whatever, pranavajra was born from a crossed vajra, indestructible. Above it was born the mandala of water, hard like vajra. There also on the little island which is this world, was the supreme mountain of precious substances, Mount Meru. The east was made of crystal, the south of yellow beryl, the west of ruby, the north of gold. Reaching to the edges of the surrounding water, with seven lakes between them are Nyashing Dzin, and so forth, the seven mountain ranges, surrounded by the expanse of the outer ocean.²⁹

In the outer ocean, in the east is the continent P_rvavideha. In the south is Jambudvipa, in the west Aparagod_niia, in the north Uttarakuru.

On Mount Meru, are four groves, and to the north-east, completely enclosed in trees, is the all-victorious good house, ornamented by caverns like a city, with agreeable mountains at the edge. From this to the ocean's horizon, as far as the other surrounding iron mountains,³⁰ is the vessel, the world, ornamented by the sun and moon.

Supported within it is the essence, sentient beings. The luminous gods are separated from people of the four main continents and eight sub-continents beside them. These sub-continents are Deha and Videha, Camara and Upacamara, Satha and Uttaramantrina, Kurava and Kaurava.

Also there are the appearances produced by lower karma, the individual realms of lower beings, the animal, hungry ghost, and Hell realms. In the dhatu of the animals the great ocean is the root place. Below, the hungry ghosts' royal capital city is their chief place. Hell beings have the hot Hells and snow mountain cold Hells. Under them all, like a yellow rose with eight joined petals, are the neighboring Hells, oriented in the four directions of the Avici or Unremitting Hell, which is the place at the root. The widely scattered animals, the hungry ghosts wandering in space, and the ephemeral human realm are also there.

The six kinds of kama divinities of the desire realm, kama deva sha.tkula, are halfway up mount Meru in the rising place of the sun, moon, stars, and planets. First there are the four, great, noble kings. Above them is the heaven of the thirty-three. Above them with their sky palaces dwelling like the stars and planets, in order there are the desire realm deity heavens of the strifeless, Yama; joyful, Tushita; Delighting in Emanation, Nirmanarata; and Mastery over Transformation, Paranirmita.

In holes in the rocks of Mount Meru dwell the asuras. In the edges of the water Rahu, and in Skartreng, Garland of Stars, a city at foot of Mount Meru, is the asura king Ka.n.tha Maalii.

In the edges of earth are nicely textured slopes where desire gods contend in wealth and enjoyments. Of the four realms of the desire gods, in the Bhramaa realms of the first dhyana are the stratum of Bhramaa, AAbhasvara; Priests who chant before Bhrama Bhramapurohita; and Great Bhramaa, Mahaabhramaa.

In the space above is the heaven of Mastery over the Emanations of Others, Para-nimitta-vashvartin (the sixth of the twenty-eight desire heavens) whose thrones reach upward four pagtse.

The second dhyana has the heavens of Lesser Radiance, Pariittaabha; Immeasurable Radiance, Apramaa.naabha; and radiance, Praabhasvara.

The third has Lesser Virtue, Pariittashubha; Immeasurable Virtue, Apramaa.nashubha; and Vast Virtue, Shubhak.ritsna.

The fourth has Cloudless; Increasing Merit, Pu.nyaprasava; and the great fruition born of merit B.rihatphala.

Then there are the five Pure Abodes, Pañcashuddhanivaasa. Here the three places of individual beings are the Slightest, Av.riha; Painless, Atapa; and Attractive Sud.risha. The other heavens of the pure realm gods are extreme Insight, Sudarshana, and the Highest, Akani.sh.ta. These five heavens are one above the other.

The four formless realms are limitless space, Aakaashaanabtyaayatana, limitless consciousness, vijñāanabtyaayatana nothing whatsoever, Aki.mcanabtyaayatana and neither perception nor non-perception, naivasa.mjñāasamjñāayatana.

These peaks of samsara, depend on former attainment of the formless samadhis. They are in the place where one dies. Thus, uniting the aspects of vessel and essence, as explained, this is called one world realm of four continents.

A thousand of these, likewise surrounded by iron mountains as high as the place of the thirty-three gods, is called a first thousand-fold world realm.

A thousand such realms, with surrounding mountains as high as the Para-nimitta-vashvartin realm is called a middle-thousand world realm.³¹

A thousand of those, with surrounding mountains as high as the special first dhyana realm, is called a great three thousand fold world realm.³² In each of these worlds is shown a body like that of the supreme nirmanakaya, performing the twelve deeds of a buddha that are not performed before or after. By its appearance, these are called worlds of those to be tamed.

Other than that in the ten directions, are measureless other words, round, semi-circular, square, and of other shapes, pervading to the limits of space. They also have immeasurable kinds of sentient beings above, below, and on the same level.

Generally, in this universe of suffering, the times of arising, enduring, destruction, and vacuity are equal.

The first is the time of well-arising. Then there is the present time of well-remaining, from the time of the coming of the tathagata Nampar Zikpa³³ when all beings attain immeasurable lives to when Shakyamuni comes, to the time when beings have lives of ten years. From the long ago time of the beginning lives each decrease by 200 years each. Then when they reach 100, they increase by one from 11 to 80,000 after Maitreya has come. After 100, they diminish by 1, until reaching 10 years of life.

There are 80 such cycles of increase and decrease, 18 in the present kalpa; Among these, 995 buddhas arise. Then from 200 years lives increase by one to measureless. When they go a little lower, after the buddha called "Devoted" comes, all the deeds, lives and assembled retinues of former buddhas are brought into one, and the same deeds and lives and assemblies arise. Beings not tamed by the former buddhas are tamed. The sound of the three jewels is heard. This continues until even beings who had sundered the basis of discipline and completely slandered virtue are liberated from samsara, and by the power vows to do so, these deeds are fully accomplished. Until their nirvana the holy Dharma also remains that long.

The completely perfect third-thousand-fold universe's sentient beings, however many they were are established in liberation. After their tenth year of life, that kalpa is entirely burned seven times by destroying fire, to ashes. The fire lasts a day. Some sutras say seven days. Some say that one sun having the heat of seven arises. In reality 700 times ten million suns will occur and, the universe will be annihilated and burned. The ashes will be washed away by water, scattered by wind, and finally, having become a single space, it will be like the former situation where nothing had yet been born. Know all dharmas to be like that.

Like this story of how the outer vessel and essence will be destroyed, the inner body too should be viewed. Mind becomes the single first nature of mind. From within that the wind of ignorance and discursive conceptualization are born. Because of that, by the karma of dwelling in samsara, by the condition of the karma establishing the nature of water, from the semen and blood of the father and mother, the body is Mount Meru, the eyes are the sun and moon, whose inner essential natures are white and red. The twelve ayatanas and dhatus are the four continents and eight sub-continents. The eight consciousnesses are the seven mountains and the great horizon, making eight altogether.

Supported by body, speech, and mind are the three main nadis, roma and kyangma to the left and right and the central channel. With the support of the three gates, the three poisons, and the three kayas there are the three realms. The nadis petals which are the five or six chakras are the five or six buddha families.

There are many distinct but similar realms, and within all these thousand-fold world systems appear many joys and sorrows and so forth. Gathered together, they separate. Born, they die. Compounded, they are destroyed.

When the time of death comes, the four external elements within which dwell the four inner elements, are destroyed seven times by fire and once by water, eight altogether. Then the inner elements dissolve into the secret elements, primordial luminosity, and everything becomes a single space.

When the four elements of the body have been gathered together, the emptying of prana nadi and bindu are the seven destructions by fire. Transmigration of life is the one destruction by water. Cessation of the breath is the final scattering by wind. The individual body disperses, finally becoming nothing at all like space, like before the body was born. The Later Tantra of Vast Wisdom says:

Ripened by the elements of air and water and fire,
The world of the body is engendered as the vessel.
Nadi and prana and the essence of the elements,
Existing as the pure nature of the four great elements,
Then abide in the form of changeless, radiant light.

Dwelling in space, if we transfer into purity,
All the different elements, nadi, prana, and essences,
That is like the world-destruction by seven fires.
The dissolving of the elements is the one destruction by water.
Cessation of coarse and subtle is the scattering by wind.
Entering into the light is the realm of spaciousness.

Then there is the primordial lord, enlightenment,
This is reaching the final goal of non-confusion.

We should examine further the subsiding of the worlds of individual sentient beings. The Spiritual Letter says:

For seven days the mass of the earth, as well as the oceans,
Will blaze, and all these beings will be burned away.
If visible bodies all will be reduced to ashes,
Why even speak of those which are invisible.

That is how we should think about it.

5. Impermanence of the teachings of how the victorious ones and their sons attain nirvana.

Even the teachers who come into these worlds, the many tathagatas and their retinues, go beyond suffering to nirvana. In considering how their teaching declines, there is the further teaching that our own lives are impermanent:

Even the leaders of the world, the lord buddha sages,
Attended by their retinues of buddha sons,
Pratyekabuddhas and hosts of shravakas,
As within the clear sky the always-existing moon
Is encircled by its attending garland of stars and planets;
Though these shine with brilliance in their luminosity,
They also teach impermanence by passing into nirvana.
See too how the measureless sun of the precious teachings
Sets ever more from generation to generation.
Then why should our bodies, like plantain trees without a heart,
Or like a phantom castle, fail to be destroyed.

Teachers came to this world of suffering. Their forms were seen. Vipashyi, Ratnach_da, Vishvabhu, Krakucchanda, Karakamuni, Diipa.mkara, and Shakyamuni, like the full moon rising on an autumn evening, blazed with the brilliance of the major and minor marks. They were surrounded by hosts of stars as their retinue, shravakas, bodhisattvas, pure ones, world protectors, and so on. Their bodies blazed with splendor. Their speech was brilliant, and without meaningless chatter. Their spotless minds shone with their illumination. They were as firm as vajra, having passed beyond suffering.

Other teachers, gradually declining, depend on the supreme being of the Shakyas. If all of them were impermanent, how will my body, as insubstantial as a bubble, not be impermanent. The Shrine of Impermanence says:

Ablaze with a thousand marks is the body of sugatagarbha.
If this is impermanent, established with merit a hundred times over,
Then, as unreliable as a breaking bubble,
How can, this, my body, not certainly be destroyed?
The one who is the benefit of sentient beings,
The Victorious One, the Sugata, passes like the sun,
The moon, the treasure of holy Dharma, is seen to set.
As for our goods, our retinues, and our enjoyments,
We should be ready to know that they are impermanent.

6. We are impermanent because our lives never wax but always wane.

If even a vajra-like body is impermanent, why depend on this body, as insubstantial as a plantain tree. That is the instruction:

Therefore, though it is certain that we are going to die,
Of where and when and how there is no certainty.
Our life-span never waxing, is always on the wane,
Conditions of death are many, and those of living few,
Life has no time to waste, so keep right to the point.
From today onwards, what makes sense is to work with Dharma.

Just by being born, death is certain. The White Lotus of Holy Dharma says:

Wherever there is birth, death will be there too.
Wherever there is gathering, there is dissolution.

Though time is beginningless, everyone has died. The Good Marks Sutra says:

Who was ever known who might not die tomorrow?
Therefore this very day we should exert ourselves.
The Lord of Death and his considerable tribe,
Neither of the two, are any friends of ours.

Anywhere in the world, death is inevitable. Walking, standing, or whatever we are doing, we should be ready, thinking, "Is it today that I will die?" The Sutra of the Good Army says:

Mountains or steep ravines, defiles or precipices,
At home or in the streets, or on the bank of a river.
Somewhere upon the earth will be my last abode.
This is something that is not to be divulged.
This completely removes my enjoyment of the world.

Because of conditions, the time of death too is uncertain. The scriptures say:

Some people die from choking on their food.
Others die from taking their medicines.
Why even say that beings have different conditions?
There is no certainty of the time of death.

Our life-spans never increase, but always grow shorter. Death is certain. The News of Impermanence, says:

Like the rock of a pool that was cut by falling water,
There is no increase, but always only decrease.
Since all of us must enter on the path of death,
Who can rely upon this incidental life.

The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Day as well as night it never stays at all.
This life eternally fleeting is getting ever-shorter
Having gotten shorter, it will not then increase.
Why would one like me not be going to die?

Few conditions are required for death other than birth in a womb. Death is certain. The News of Impermanence, says:

Though the conditions of death are a numerous multitude,
The conditions of our being born are very few.
Therefore since it is certain that we shall quickly die,
Let us keep the holy Dharma in our hearts.

7. How what seems external is inner impermanence

One's own mind is even more mortal than an ancient ruined city:

Sentient beings, like a bower gathered from the four elements
Are ornamented with moving thoughts like people inside.
Composite, their dharmas arise from conditions and are destroyed.
Since all is impermanent, like an ancient city,
Let us quickly perform the actions of holy Dharma.

That is the exhortation. Ruined cities that are now abandoned were once well-constructed and filled with many beings. Later they became vacant. Look at this life as being like that. Kye ma'o! What is left of the former youth and wealth of these samsaric beings? Only the people's names remain. Their adornments destroyed, bones are all that is left of these beings who once emanated their various discursive thoughts.

Like this, our bodies, these bowers collected from the four elements, are now beautiful with clothing and ornaments. What people will later call by our names is our bones. "That's how it is," we should think from our hearts. The Spiritual Letter says:

As we near the finish of the body, we glimpse its bleak end. At last its foul essence is not there at all. It is worn out, decomposes, and is completely destroyed. Know that its dharmas will be torn asunder.

8. An example of impermanence

Like being instantly killed in a dream in which we have enjoyed celestial bliss for a long time, at that time:

As the flame of a lamp that has been caught in a sandstorm
Flickers and is not steady, even for a moment,
When suddenly we are struck by the fierce conditions of death,
We shall not endure, but certainly will die.
Therefore, practice the holy Dharma right away.

A lamp may endure a soft breeze rising from the hearth, but is quickly blown out when a strong wind arises. Our lives, like such a flickering lamp, are agitated by the incessant, soft wind of day and night. When we have grown old, death gives no respite, and as if by a fierce wind, we will be quickly blown away by conditions of illness or harm. Think about this being certain. The Letter to Students says:

Like the tongue of flame of a lamp,
Blown away by a mighty wind
This tiny moment of life,
Has no reliance at all.

9. All is impermanent and must be left behind.

Moreover, as for thinking of impermanence; because, having left everything behind, we must go:

Attendants, pleasures, friends and relatives,
Youth and beauty, power and social rank—
We have to leave alone, abandoning them all,
Followed by black and white karma, until they both are emptied.
Then there is no refuge other than the Dharma.
Why should we not exert ourselves to go beyond them?

At the time of death, none of the appearances of this life will be of any use to us. Only the Dharma will be our refuge from the execution of the karma of our virtue and vice. About this the Sutra of Instructions to the King says:

The time approaches when the king will go,
Your cherished pleasures, friends and relatives
Will not follow where you must go then.
As for kings, wherever they may go,
Karma follows after like a shadow.

The Sutra requested by Shriidatta³⁴, says

By karmic confusion we are made to seek enjoyments
We are also distracted by our children and spouses.
By that we shall experience suffering alone.

They will do us no good at our appointed time.
Our beloved parents, siblings, children, and spouses,
Servants, wealth, and crowds of friends and relatives,
Will not travel with us when we go to death.
Karma will be an only child at that time.

At that time those who have gathered powerful bad karma will seem to be surrounded by those whom they have killed, and the minions of the Lord of Death will seem to lead them away with a noose. The Bodhicaryavatara says:

If this is the day when a man is being led
To a place where he will have a limb cut off,
With dry mouth, blood-shot eyes, and such,
He seems quite otherwise than he was formerly.

When the utterly terrifying messengers of the Lord of Death
Having a form of flesh, seize us bodily.
How badly will we be stricken with the illness of great fear?
What need is there to say how terrible that will be?

Who is the sahdu³⁵ that can be our guardian
One who is able to guard us from such frights as these, Our flesh will crawl with panic, and with staring eyes,
We shall search for protectors in the four directions.

Having seen that in the four directions there are none,
We shall be enveloped in complete despair.

Then it will be too late to think about Dharma. It will be like criminals looking for a refuge as they are given into the hands of their executioners. From now on we had better remember that. The same text says:

Even if we truly abandon laziness,
Then it is too late. Then what could we do?
After the Lord of Death has suddenly appeared,
We shall think, "Oh no, all is surely lost."

Thus:

The three jewels and the virtue of Dharma are a refuge
For those who have supplicated for this spotless gift.
For those besides such beings, though they have appropriate virtue,
Even our father and mother will be no refuge to us,
Nor will a host of friends, and wealth and beautiful youth.
All such refuges will sink into samsara.

We should give over our bodies joyfully to the buddhas,
And likewise entrust to them our lives and our enjoyments.
Other than the three jewels, there is no refuge at all
On which we can rely while we are sentient beings.

10. The impermanence of the three times

Samsaric existence and the being of ourselves and hosts of others are all more impermanent than we think:

Think of the existence of former and later worlds.
Countless former generations have passed away.
Also most of the beings of the present world
Certainly will not last another hundred years.
Those of the future will follow in a similar way.

Young and old are equal in their lot of passing away.
Because we too will not transcend this common nature,
Thinking that death is certain, let us practice Dharma.

Our existence was primordially good and pure, but think of the other spheres of apparent being to which we will later transmigrate. Look and see whether the people who lived a hundred years ago are still embodied. We who are now human beings a hundred years from now will be only names. The Shrine of Telling the Reason Why says:

A person who just for a night
Entered into a womb,
Would suffer tremendous harm.
Such going is irreversible.
In the morning one would see
Many different beings.
By evening some would be gone.
Of the many one would see later
The next morning more would be gone.
Numerous men and women
Die even in their youth.
Why are the young so cheerful,
So confident they will thrive?
Some will die in the womb.
Some the day they are born.
Some will be snatched away,
In unexpected departures.
Some will die old, some young
But one by one they will go,
Like fruit that ripens and falls.

11. The impermanence of the three levels³⁶
Moreover:

Within the three levels from Hell up to the peak of samsara,
There is no liberation from the Lord of Death.
All is impermanent, changing, and essenceless.
Nothing stable, and things roll along like a wagon wheel.
Particularly the human world has many afflictions.
Being a place of harm by sickness and by dōns,³⁷
By fires and falls and weapons; by poison and wild beasts.
By kings and enemies, by robbers and the like,
We will be ravished of life and our wealth will be destroyed.

There are no beings anywhere in the six realms, for whom death does not establish itself. We should recall that none of the six kinds of beings in the three levels transcend death. The Sutra on Teachings that are the Bases of Discipline says:

Someone who is born without death being established
Such a one does not exist within this world.
Nor are there any in the air or in the oceans.
There are none who live among the tallest mountains.

When we die, as soon as we lose our bodies, this mind by its former karma undergoes rounds of samsaric existence in many worlds. The Vast Play says:

Beings, by of the power of samsaric ignorance,
In divine and human paths, and those of the lower realms,
Are tumbled in samsara as five kinds of ignorant beings .
For example, as a pot is turned upon a wheel.

Baited with fine and pleasant forms and ravishing sounds,
Sweet fragrances, delicious tastes, and blissful touch,
The snare of evil times always traps these beings
For example, like a monkey snared in a hunter's net.

Many in the human realm are afflicted with leprosy, contagion, disorders of prana and bile, and other diseases. There are many injuries from birds, rakshasas, dakinis, gekas and dōns. Kings, enemies, savages, dissipation of the skandhas, and so forth end hundreds of lives. These contend with the Lord of Beings for our body and life. Since we die without respite, we should try to practice the holy Dharma. The Collection of Precious Qualities says:

With the many harmful spirits and diseases of the world,
Peace is a truly kind and beneficial gift.

12. Instantaneous Impermanence

Not only do we die of such afflictions, but even if we have no afflictions, the life of sentient beings is passing away:

Even with no afflictions, the life of beings is passing.
Day and night, with the passing of every moment or instant,
It is always approaching the land of the Lord of Death.
As over waterfalls, water flows into the ocean,
Or far to the west the sun declines until it sets.

Even though there are lives where someone can say, "I have not been harmed by incidental affliction," and though there are teachings that extend life by appropriate food and medicines and so forth, in the end it is of no use--we have to enter death. The Bodhicaryavatara says:

Though seemingly today, I am without any illness,
Even if I have food and am without affliction
This life is still no more than an illusory instant,
This body is no more than a momentary reflection.

About its not lasting for even a moment, the Pinnacle of Precious Gathering says:

It was said by Subhuti, "The life of beings is like a waterfall.

The Sutra on Teachings that are the Bases of Discipline says:

Waterfalls descend in rivers to the sea
The sun and moon sink down behind the western mountains.
Day and night tick off their fragmentary instants.
Like these the life of beings must pass and disappear.

13. The impermanence of the conditions and time of our existence:

Having completed life's conditions, such as food,
As sure as taking poison, will bring occasions of suffering.
With so many contrary conditions that do us harm,
How can this completion fail to be destroyed?
All of it must turn into a cause of death.
Never knowing how or when or where we die,
We have been seduced into futility.
Therefore, abandoning the dharmas of this world,
Let us turn to genuine practice from the heart,
Attaining the dharma teaching of impermanence and death.

Though food is necessary for life, it is also a condition of sickness. Though it appears to be temporarily beneficial, essentially it is an inevitable establisher of harm. Even beneficial purification with baths and medicine leads to sickness, not to mention life being cut off by damage that actively opposes it. Since the conditions of death are changelessly many, let us consider the approach of death. Moreover, as above, whoever lives will die. Only when and how are uncertain. We cannot even be sure that we will not die today. And even if we could, the Bodhicaryavatara says:

"At least today I will not die," I say.
What reason is there to rejoice in that?
For still, the time when I become a non-existence
Will doubtless come to pass, in any case.

C. The three instructions of striving

1. The instruction to practice at this favorable time of having the guru and oral instructions.

At this auspicious time of completely attaining the free and well-favored human body, we should liberate ourselves from samsara:

If, having attained the ship of being free and well-favored,
Whose captain is the oral instructions of the guru,
If we do not strive to cross the river of suffering,
But stare at it fascinated, until there is no choice,
At last we shall fall in, and so be swept away.

In the ship of external freedom and favor, having the holy guru as our guide, if we think we do not need to work with the tradition of Dharma established by the Buddha Bhagavat, we are much deceived. The Letter to Students says:

Whoever, attains the path of Dharma of the Sages,
The tradition like a great ship, and throws it away again,
Will whirl like a giddy dancer in the ocean of samsara.
A mind that thinks that joy is certain is deceived.

2. The exhortation truly to make an effort from our hearts:

This is because if we do not try, we will not be liberated.

While we have this precious vessel praised by the Teacher,
Which offers an end to evil and attainment of what is pure,
If we will not receive the wealth of the two benefits
That for ourselves and also that for other beings,
We only chain ourselves in the prison of samsara.

Those with the support, these freedoms, who do not practice the holy Dharma that benefits self and others will be bound forever in the noose of samsara. Those who use their leisure to turn back samsara, will establish the liberation of holy Dharma. Urging practice, the Letter to Students says:

Whoever has the best gifts of the ocean of arising
Also plants the good seed of supreme enlightenment.
Its virtues are better than those of a wish-fulfilling gem.

Whoever has human birth, though lacking the fruition,
Having the power of mind attained by human beings
Should rely on the sugata path, which is the guide of beings.

Such a path is not attained by gods and nagas,

By sky-soarers, kinnaras or serpent gods.³⁸

Having attained humanity, so hard to gain,
Whoever really thinks about the worth of that
Will practice very hard with the greatest diligence.

3. The motivating power of compassion

Third, for the human beings who have been so well-urged, there is also the motivating power of compassion. These words have been spoken so that we can protect beings. How can we not hold this in our hearts? Therefore, our aspiration to peace is always motivated by the guiding power of compassion.

Kye ma! As if we had been chained to solid rock, Thinking mostly of this world, our sorrow grows.
Not realizing what was taught; not understanding the teachings,
Even though our day of death may be tomorrow,
We fixate our lives as being long and permanent.
Not grieving at samsara, with no speck of renunciation,
We are consciously proud and knowingly confused.
While we are so distracted, the rain of the kleshas falls.
How can we ever be of use to sentient beings.

Kye ma! Sentient beings have been told how things are, but with a fool's intelligence, they do not comprehend the details of the symbols and the means of practice. Really having very little freedom to follow them, they will never realize them. They do not understand the explanations.

Some, even while they are being urged to get rid of the appearances of this world right away, are actually attached to keeping them, motivated only by the actions of this world. Their karmas and kleshas blaze like a fire, and they are far from happiness.

Others with the fire of aggression burning within them are jealous of others. They abuse them in many ways, provoking faults, spreading bad rumors, and belittling them.

Some, no matter how many sufferings torment and oppress them, are not saddened by samsara and do never experience the least particle of renunciation.

Some, who have heard just a little, dispute and condemn others because of pride and arrogance, emanating a thousand tongues of klesha flames in the ten directions. Dispensing with the natural goodness of their being, they burn up anything pure. As they break vows and samayas day and night, there falls a rain of evil. When we see this, sometimes the thought arises that we should give up and just try to practice profound samadhi alone in peaceful forests, with the intent of personal enlightenment. But for the most part, the powerful force of compassion produces the joyful thought, "Let's get enlightened!" The following are verses on this highest of aspirations.

Those who are in the ten directions of the world,
As many sentient beings as may be in existence,
By my merit may all of them gain happiness,
And may they all be free from any suffering.

Those who are sickly and those whose lives will be cut short,
May they have the good fortune and auspiciousness
Of lives that are long and happy, without attacks of sickness.

May those condemned to being poor and hungry beggars
Have abundant food and drink, and ample wealth.
May all in fear of bandits, savage ones, and kings,
Great abysses, water, fire, and other terrors,
Attain the happiness that is free from all such fear.

Whatever they wish for, may their wishes be established.
Because of always acting well and properly,
May they be liberated in enlightenment.

By a good Sakyong King may the whole earth be protected.
May his gentle kingdom widely spread and flourish.
May his ministers' Dharmic wishes be fulfilled.
May his servants always live in happiness.

May those who have the sufferings of the lower realms,
Be freed and have the happiness of the higher realms.
May those who have the sufferings of the higher realms,
Be peaceful and establish prosperity and bliss.
May sentient beings who dwell in the three realms of the world
All be happy in their minds and every thought.

Let no evil conceptions flash within their minds.
Day and night may they transcend them through the Dharma.
May there be good harvests in all the realms of beings
May they be free from every sickness and affliction.
May there be no strife and quarreling between them.

May they be happy, like the gods in heavenly realms.
May promoters of goodness be completely successful.
Those who want wealth and retinue, servants, and attendants,
May it be accomplished, just as they desire.

May merit and dominion increase for sentient beings.
May the dharma increase for its renunciates.
For those who want virtue, may virtuous states of mind increase.
May life and auspicious fortune flourish and increase.

For those who practice dhyana, may samadhi and insight,
Higher perceptions, and miracle flourish and increase.
May there be the path and fruition of the Dharma.
May we come face to face with liberating wisdom.

Those who are tormented with pain and suffering,
May their minds be soothed, expanding with great joy.
May those who are idle and slothful, strive for enlightenment.

May those well-ornamented with the wealth of merit,
Those who have dhyana and discipline, never be separate
From all who need them in their fear and anxiety.

May the many children of the Victorious One
Have immeasurable body, life, and buddha activity.
May benefit for others be completely perfect.

May the time they remain on earth be very long.
If anyone at any time who depends on me,
May happiness and prosperity of such beings increase.

Those who have mastered the vinaya, knowing what is allowed,
May they be possessors of the seven aryan riches³⁹
Whether they praise or blame, or verbally disparage,
May all who see or hear, remember or contact me
Quickly cross the fearful ocean of samsara.

May those who even hear my name, because of that,
Be expelled from samsara in that very life.
Attaining bliss and liberated from samsara,

Let them be set firm as unsurpassable buddhas.

May I always, like the elements, earth and so forth,
Be a sustaining ground for the sake of sentient beings.
May everything that is beneficial be established.

May those who are poor and suffer setbacks in samsara,
Needlessly tormented in blazing tongues of flame,
Become a happy throng, completely liberated.
May they always try to benefit other beings.
May beings' sufferings serve to ripen them for me.

Whatever merit I have, may it ripen sentient beings.
By any virtuous mental power I may have,
May beings attain to bliss and purification of suffering.
May suffering be unseen, even in their dreams.

May they attain an ocean of bliss and happiness.
Pervading the space of the sky in all the ten directions
As many buddhas and sentient beings as there may be,
May they be associated with happiness.

May they be wealthy and prosperous, because of what I do.
Throughout the ten directions, for all who hear my name,
May there fall a rain of all that is desired.
Making offerings to buddhas and other sentient beings,

May sentient beings of the six realms and ten directions
No more be surpassed by any victorious ones.
May I completely liberate every one of them.
May the endless ocean of samsara be empty.

Sukhavati,⁴⁰ totally beautified by ornaments of light, the precious source of all beings, is a universe filling the whole of space, established from clouds of pure happiness. By grasping this white yak tail scepter or jeweled umbrella, all the obscuring torment of the three levels is cleared away.

In this undisturbed water, may the gradually blossoming lotus of the victorious ones be planted. May pleasant and delightful divine maidens, their heads adorned with fragrant lotus garlands, playing on a platform with water birds, lovingly caress the lotus anthers. By these teachings may human hearts be greatly exalted, floating in the water of explanation emanating as it does in the pure lands.

Free from the harm of the kleshas, completely filled with samadhi, may those excellent ones help all sentient beings cross over.

Like the undefiled young sun, whose eye is characterized by an excellent red light, wreathed in variegated stars. Becoming amrita for beings, their eyes shine more excellently than the brilliantly blazing light of Bhrama. May the vast appearance of these radiant masters, revealed as great beings adorned with the mandala of the major and minor marks, fill the whole of space.

May all beings effortlessly reach that field, the supreme wealth of trikaya, the cloudless path of the sun and moon, free from even an atom of the nirvana of lower people.

Without duality of one and many, in uncompounded, primordial existence incomprehensible to thought, the spontaneous presence of peace, in the field of Samantabhadra may the purified minds of all beings heal their weariness. May they reach the space of the dhatu beyond wide and narrow, high and low, bias and partiality, concept and thought.

There may they remain without sadness and weariness, with excellent thoughts, exerting themselves to benefit self and others among the rocky mountains.

Urged on by the intention of benefit, one can hardly not be sad at the Dharma teachings of impermanence. For those with a mind that always grasps samsara and never turns back, teaching Dharma is like addressing a lump of stone or an animal. The Instruction on Impermanence says:

Like me you too will die.

And:

There is no doubt about it.
Kye 'ud! I am an animal.

D. The final summary

There are two parts.

1. How to think of impermanence in order to cross over from samsara.

Now the final summary teaches of the great exhortation to meditate and work until samsara is gone:

Whoever truly wishes to cross the ocean of evil
And establish the wondrously risen excellent qualities,
Now should contemplate the certainty of death.
Meditate day and night on impermanence alone.
Again and again arouse renunciation and sorrow.

Whether going, staying, eating, sleeping, arising, walking, talking, or seeing a crowd of many people; and whether staying in villages, valleys, or monasteries, always meditate on impermanence. Whatever we see, hear, and remember has the nature of impermanence, and the marks of impermanence. Remember the exhortation of impermanence. The Bodhicaryavatara says:

Always, day and night, I should think of this alone.

If we do not think about it, what's the problem? Having come into the power of this life alone, there will be ambition, love of fame, desire, hatred, laziness, hoarding, indolence, cantankerousness and sometimes the Dharma's not arising. We will not quickly be liberated from samsara. We do not have enough time for ordinary tasks, let alone the liberation of enlightenment.

Strive with a long and continuous effort until buddhahood is attained. Dipa.mkara, Shakyamuni, and so forth were at first sentient beings like us. But by their exertion, they became Buddhas. Now we are the ones wandering in samsara. Even though countless former buddhas have come, we have not been healed by their realization of enlightenment.

Thinking that by our own karma, we will wander limitlessly in samsara, by now we should have been led to complete their path of enlightenment. Thinking that this life is impermanent, like a borrowed moment or instant, we should try to practice the Dharma. The Bodhicaryavatara says:

If I do not make an effort from now on
I will simply go ever lower and lower still.

Though countless former Buddhas have come throughout the past,
Having the purpose of benefit for all sentient beings,
I, because of my own faults and shortcomings,
Was not within the scope of their healing ministrations.

If from this time on, I still act like that,
Again and again, as it has been before,
I will die and have to go to the lower realms,
Being cut in pieces and suffering other tortures.

2. The Benefits of the Teachings

If we meditate day and night only on impermanence and death, in a short time we will accumulate a measureless accumulation of virtues. Then because of that,

Thus goodness and benefit will surely be established.

Striving with fierce energy to establish them,
The mind of this life will be abandoned and cast away.
The confusion of fixating egohood will be destroyed.

In brief, establish all the excellent qualities.
Restrict the mind to the root of all dharmas, impermanence.
This will be the cause of holy liberation,
Bringing us the end of everything that is evil.

Death is certain, Thus our own death is certain. When the smoke of thinking, ceaselessly "Will we have even tomorrow," continually arises, the blazing fire of exertion in Dharma will also naturally arise; and so we will be led to the path of this and later benefits.

When appearances of this life are seen not always to have power, mind does not desire, be contentious, quarrel, grasp maliciously, be angry, harm others, and naturally leaves behind all afflictions. Pride and ego grasping cannot occur, and by the rising of the extraordinary, all is harmonious and pleasant. Since we know that wealth, retinue, and all relatives and companions are impermanent, desire and attachment to them will not arise.

When through these relatives and companions other harms or benefits arise, whatever joys and sorrows occur, no desire or aggression will arise. When these die or are separated from us, or even if we have nothing, the suffering of unhappiness will not arise. Wherever we go in the world, we will not return to the karma of desire and attachment.

Whatever suitable and unsuitable conditions arise, the individual marks of desire, aggression, and the grasping of attachment will not arise. Day and night will pass in happiness. Having come to the path of dharma, we will fulfill our vows and difficult practices. Our activities will be spotlessly pure, unobscured by transgressions. Working with the dharmic activities of the path, we shall accumulate the two accumulations a hundred times over.

Since our conduct will not be mixed with evil deeds, there will be no regret for anything we do. A special faith, compassion, and renunciation will newly arise. The Buddha and all the bodhisattvas will take care of us. Men and non-men will have no opportunity to harm us, and the gods of Abhirati will keep us within the whiteness of virtue. We will sleep in happiness, rise in happiness, go in happiness, walk in happiness, possess happiness, and live happy lives.

The higher worlds of the celestial realms will arise. We shall see the Sugata and his children. We shall hear the good Dharma. We shall meditate on the good path. We shall attain the good realm of Sukhavati. The Sutra on Teachings that are the Bases of Discipline says:

Those who act with pure conduct
And meditate well on the path,
Will not suffer in dying,
As if freed from a burning house.

These and limitless other virtues will be attained.

E. Dedicating the merit.

Now the merits of well composing this are taught as a way for beings to attain blessings:

Thus by the amrita of this auspicious news
From the resounding drums of the thunder-clouds of Dharma,
By the deep, melodious speech of beneficial instructions,
May the weary nature of the minds of beings
Unhinged by the kleshas and fixated thoughts of permanence,
Be released this very day from all its weariness.

In benefit-producing white light, to the sound of divine drums, from the swelling ocean of good teachings, emerge water dragons of instruction with gaping mouths. For beings exhausted by samsara, the turbulent extremes of ever-grasping mind are completely pacified. By the primordial lord who draws breath in enjoyment of bliss and happiness in his excellent house adorned by the rays of the sun, may all weariness be eased.

Beings are distracted, as if they were in a dream.
Gathering and dispersing, dharmas are hollow and empty.
Though travelling to a market, companions match our path,

They like impermanent dharmas soon will go their own way.

Like an flash of lightning among the autumn clouds,
The life of beings hurtles by like a waterfall.
Dharmas are impermanent with no stability.
From today let us realize that with certainty.

Things and property and much collected wealth,
Along with any fame and glory we possess,
Are fickle dharmas. Mind can never rely on them.
Let us know their nature of the four extremes.

III. The Suffering of Samsara

There are four parts:

- A. The general explanation of the nature of suffering
- B. The extended explanation of the particulars
- C. The appropriateness of thinking about the sufferings of samsara
- D. The dedication of merit

- A. The general explanation of the nature of suffering

There are eight parts.

- 1. The brief teaching of suffering.

After realizing the impermanence of dharmas, is the teaching of the suffering intrinsic to samsara. Anything one says about it falls short of the truth.

For those among the dharmas of the three realms of samsara, Unremittingly changeable, there are the extremest sufferings.
With sufferings of suffering, change, and composite nature,
All beings of its six habitations live in extreme anxiety

The Sutra of Instructions to the King says:

O great king, this samsara is change. This samsara is impermanence. This samsara is suffering.

The three kinds of suffering are the suffering of suffering, the suffering of change, and the sufferings of the composite. By these the six kinds of sentient beings struggle and sink in the ocean of samsara.

- 2. The examples of suffering.

By these verses the examples of how the kleshas are produced are explained:

Like some person who is thrown into a fire,
Or attacked by a ravaging horde of savage men or beasts,
Or imprisoned by some king, just like an animal,
With successive waves of suffering like the Unremitting Hell And having no chance of escape, our sorrows only increase.

Thus as the assembled faculties of sentient beings are not purified of former suffering, it will oppress them later. Unbearable, it is without measure or limit. The Jewel Mala says:

Space in all the directions, earth, water, fire, and air,
Just as they are limitless, so are beings' sufferings.

They rise again and again, as waves rise in the ocean.
They are like always having to live in terror and fear

With vicious beasts of prey and cruel savages.
Like the dungeon of a king, getting free is difficult.

3. The example of being seduced by desire.

Though all sentient beings want to find happiness and be free from suffering:

One may wish to find bliss, and be separated from suffering.
But suffering strikes us, acting as both cause and effect.
Like a moth who is attracted by the flame of a lamp
Enticed by grasping, desirous of his wished-for object,
Or like deer, bees, and elephants,
Enticed by sound or smell or else by taste, or touch,
Beings are seduced by desire for the five objects of sense.
See how they never find bliss, but only suffering.

By the obscuring power of accepting and rejecting, though we may want powerful means of entering into the fruition, we do not produce the cause. How can we be free from accepting and rejecting? Those who want happiness should practice the cause, the virtuous path. We want to leave suffering behind, yet wholeheartedly enter into its cause, non-virtue. We practice all the causes of suffering, the five klesha-poisons, and the three chief kleshas. We are rushing to practice the source of all suffering, whose fruition is suffering itself, and experience of its different varieties. Still we just accept this and cannot even be ashamed of it. This is like a thief who is punished by having his hands cut off, but still robs us again. This time his punishment is having his head cut off. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 1.28

We think we have the intention of getting rid of suffering,
Instead we run right to that very suffering.
Though we want happiness, because of ignorance,
We conquer our own happiness like an enemy

How do we conquer it? By the force of desire and attachment to the five desirables, the power of the kleshas increases, and we enter into suffering.

A moth desiring the form of a lamp's light, is burned when it is reached. Deer are killed because they listen to the sound of a flute. Bees who suck flowers, which are the source of nectar, get tangled when they close to them. Fishermen entice fish by the taste of food on the point of a hook. Elephants wanting to feel cool, go into lakes and die. A song in the Dohakosha:

By the mudra of samsara all beings are seduced.

Also it says there:

Kye ho! The stupid are wounded by arrows it is said.
View them as having been enticed like gullible deer.
They are like fish and butterflies, elephants and bees,

The kleshas arise from the five sense-objects, and by their force we wander endlessly in samsara. This is more to be feared than poison, it is taught. The Letter to Students says:

Objects and poison alike are pleasant when first experienced.
Objects and poison alike are unbearably harsh when ripe.
Objects and poison alike are imbibed because of ignorance.
Objects and poison alike are potent and hard to reverse.
Poison and objects, imputed with certainty by the mind,

Both do harm, but poison may simply be avoided
But injuries by objects are not so easily shunned.
Poison is only poisonous in a sentient being
Our feelings regarding objects are poisonous anywhere.
Poison when mixed with other poison is neutralized.
Thus supreme secret mantra is properly used as a cure.
Poison skillfully used is of benefit to man.
However, the great poison, objects, never will be so.

4. How beings are tormented in successive births within the six realms of beings

These samsaric beings whirl about with each other and suffer:

For gods, asuras, Hell beings, and the hungry ghosts,
For humans and animals, all beings of the six realms,
Like the chain of buckets on a water wheel,
Limitless sufferings follow each other in train.

The Precious Mala says:

Its three paths have no beginning, no middle and no end.
Like the circle that is made by whirling a fire-brand.
Mutual causes become the mandala of samsara.

5. How enemies, friends, and relatives are uncertain

Thus when we are whirled within samsara:

In the course of the generations, every sentient being
Has carried the burden of being our friend and our enemy.
Also they have been neither, or something between the two.
The number of times that they have done us right or wrong
Or benefit and harm transcends enumeration.
Often a father becomes a mother and she a sister,
And she again a brother, lost in uncertainty.
We can never be sure if our friends will change to enemies

In all the generations from beginningless time a particular sentient being will have been the father of all the sentient beings in the three realms, and so forth. The number of times that it will have been their father, mother, and intimate cannot be counted. The Spiritual Letter says:

By desiring what is fine, deprivation, and death
Sickness, age, and so forth, are sources of many sufferings,
Samsara indeed is a treasury of every sorrow.

6. How we suffer in countless births:

If thus we think of the karmic succession in this world,
Our sorrow should increase to its ultimate extreme.
If all our previous bodies, when we were born as ants,
Were gathered up together and piled into a heap,
Its height would surpass Mount Meru, with its four precious slopes.
The tears we have wept would surpass the four oceans in their volume.
When we have been a Hell being or a hungry ghost,
The amount of molten copper that we have had to drink,
And the foul volume of pus and blood and excrement,
Is unmatched by the flowing rivers to the limits of the directions.
Our other sufferings were as limitless as the sky.

The number of time our head and limbs have been cut off,
Because of desire, is unmatched by the atoms of the world.

The Resting in Closely-attentive Mindfulness, says:

O monks, be sorrowful within the realm of samsara. Why? While we were being whirled about in beginningless samsara, we were born as ants. If their discarded bodies were brought together in one place, and made into a heap, it would be taller than Mount Meru. We have wept more tears than there is water in the four oceans. The countless immeasurable number of times we have become Hell beings and pretas, we have drunk more seething molten copper, blood, urine, pus, and mucus than there is water in the four great rivers that flow down to the ocean.⁴¹ Because of desires, the number of times that our head, eyes, and major and minor limbs have been cut off equals the number of atoms of earth, water, air, and fire in as many worlds as there are grains of sand of the river Ganges.

The Spiritual Letter says:

More than the four oceans is the milk that we have drunk.
More than the retinue of existing individuals,
The heap of all our bones would be bigger than a mountain
If juniper berries were as many as our mothers,
The earth would not suffice for such a number of them.

7. How, even if we attain the fruition of Bhrama and so forth, we will ultimately suffer.

Moreover, when we course within samsara, here is what happens:

Charnel vampire-ghouls, and demonic mountain spirits,
Beasts and snakes, and various things that creep and crawl
Experience the countless pains and pleasures of this realm.
Bhram and Indra, and adepts of dhyanas formed and formless
Defending their territory and seven precious possessions⁴²
Human rulers, whatever splendor and wealth they gained,
Fell to the lower realms, suffering more and more.

In this time of samsaric succession, there are no realms of earth, water, mountains, islands, and space, where we have not been. Countless times we have been gods, nagas, rakshasas, gandharvas, kimbhandas,⁴³ persons who experienced the sufferings of all the six lokas at once,⁴⁴ Bhrama, and Indra, and world-ruling kings. There is no joy and sorrow of any of these that we have not experienced. Again, we have been whirled down to the lower realms and lived among their extreme sorrows. The Letter to Students says:

What being exists that we have not been a hundred times?
What joy is there that we have not savored many times?
What glories, like splendid white yak tails, have we not obtained?
Yet whatever we have gained, our desires only increase.

There is no river upon whose banks we never lived.
There is no country's region where we have never lived.
There is no direction where we have never lived.
And yet the difficult power of our desire increases.

There is no sorrow that was not ours formerly many times.
Nothing could satisfy beings that we have not desired.
There is no sentient being that we have not engendered
But whatever we have in samsara, we are not free of desire.

Completely grasping at birth these widely meandering beings
Are rolling on the ground in ecstasy and sorrow.

There is no being with whom we have not been intimate.

8. Suffering due to the nature of change.

These others who did badly in the mouth of samsara are worthy of further thought:

Having enjoyed unlimited wealth within this life
These beings of exalted station, after they departed,
Were stricken with poverty or even made to be servants.
As wealth in a dream is gone as soon as we awake,
If we thoroughly think of the sufferings of change,
Arising from the impermanence of all our joy and sorrow,
Our sorrow increases, building ever more and more.
Therefore beings within the three realms' habitations,
Without desire for samsara's pleasures, should get enlightened.

So it is for Indra, the king of the gods, and Bhrama, the paranimitacashavartin gods, and those who have attained happiness among human beings. When they exhaust the fruition of their former virtuous karma Bhrama, Indra, chakravartins, gods, including samadhi gods and formless gods, and ordinary people who had a great fruition, by the power of former karma, death, and transmigration, must experience many afflictions, going to the lower realms and so forth. The Sutra on Renunciation says:

When from their joyful and excellent existences
Lion-like lords of beings have to die and transmigrate.
The gods will speak to them, saying words like these:
This care-free life must be completely left behind.
The joys of the gods, however many they may be,
All of these arose from the cause of our good karma.
Now by these pleasant actions that you have in mind
All your collected virtue is totally exhausted.
Now, experiencing suffering from non-virtue that you have,
You will fall into the suffering of the lower realms.

Extensive manifestations of this kind will arise. Also the Sutra on Teachings that are the Bases of Discipline says:

Wealth in a dream with houses and abundant enjoyments, gods and men Becomes quite non-existent as soon as we awake.	Dreaming that one has been made a lord of
---	---

It is like that. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 2.35

Like the experiences that we have in our dreams
Whatever may be the sorts of things that one enjoys
These become nothing more than objects of memory.
They all are gone. We do not see them any more.

When one transfers between lives, this also happens. The Spiritual Letter:⁴⁵

Indra who is worthy of homage from the world,
By power of his karma, falls back upon the earth.
Even after becoming universal monarchs,
Lords of the world are born again as others' servants.

Breasts and buttocks of celestial courtesans,
Are delightful to fondle, but after time has past,
Destined to be sausage in the Lord of Hell's machines,
Such lovers will be attended by knowledge hard to bear.

The touch of their shapely legs, is happily endured,
But having lived with tremendous joy for a very long time
Again in Hells of biting flames and rotten corpses
An equal result of unbearable pain will be produced.

After the joyful attentions of celestial maidens,
After this life of pleasure in exquisite groves,
By a forest of trees, with leaves like swords and daggers
Ones arms and legs and nose and ears will be cut to pieces.

Having lived in a place with divine girls free to hand,
All with pretty faces and golden lotuses,
Again we shall be helpless in the rivers of Hell
Forced into scalding water, as hot gates block return.

Desire for the realm of the gods will be very great
But having attained the desireless bliss of Bhrama again,
Once more we will fuel the fires of the Avici Hell.
We shall be thrown into constant suffering with no gaps.

Attaining the sun and moon, the light of our personal bodies
Will shine with brilliance to the limits of the world.
Then again we shall come into dismal murky darkness,
Unable to see so much as our own hands and feet.

Thus, as for the merit of those who were criminals,
After the triple lamp of the Buddha's teaching appears,
They will go where the sun and moon have never shone,
They will pass into chaos, limitless endless darkness.

The three realms of desire, form, and the formless, are the cities of appearance, half-appearance, and non-appearance. This is because they have coarse appearance, subtle appearance, and none at all. Those who are happy, not desiring the path at all, are instructed to establish unsurpassable enlightenment. But being without the leisure to establish merit, they must make an effort. The same text says:

If our hair or garments suddenly burst into flame
The first thing we would do is put them out again.
Then we would try to keep it from happening again.
There would be no priority that would be higher than that.

B. The extended explanation of the particulars

There are three parts:

1. The basis of confusion

There are two parts.

a. The basis of confusion in the three worlds.

Whatever sufferings exist, their basis of dependence is the inner three realms. These are body, speech, and mind; or desire, form, and the formless:

In the cities of appearance, half-appearance and non-appearance
Tormented by composition, pain, and change,
The compositions of senses, mind, and consciousness
Are remorselessly turning mills of the objects of joy and sorrow,

Body composed of coarse things is the city of appearance. Speech, as appearance that is non-existent like an echo, is the city of half-appearance. Mind, without the phenomena of the five gates and completely without things, is the city of non-appearance. These are also called the realms of desire, form, and the formless. The Entering the Intention says:

Body is the coarse, the desire realm. Speech is the subtle, the form realm. Mind is the very subtle, the formless realm. Within these three cities lives the child of apparent true existence.

That child is explained as naturally-arising wisdom. The three gates are tormented by the three sufferings. By the condition of conceptualizing everything, arising becomes experience of one confusion after another. How does confusion arise? The objects of the six senses individually come forth by means of the powers of the six sense-consciousnesses. By fixating these objects, there is continuous attachment to them as happiness, suffering, and neutrality. These individually arising phenomena of form and so forth are called "consciousness." The first, coarse, general phenomenal process of conscious is insight, rigpa, or mind, sem. When we analyze the particular kinds, there are passion, aggression, and ignorance, a continual series of mental contents of one or another of these three kinds, comprising "content-mind," yi. The Bodhisattvabhumi says:

The appearance of objects is known as consciousness
The first conceptualization of these is known as mind.

Subsequent particular analysis of these deals with the mental contents. This is content-mind. Mental contents are also established by mind as having universal relationships, similarities or classes that exist among mental contents. When objects are evaluated by insight, at first there is a generalized perception of nature. The aspect that does this is mind. Then, by discriminating particular aspects, mental contents are individually designated conventionally. Because this is our real object understanding, and except for such analysis, there is no other. The Precious Mala says:

If you ask about the objects that are seen by mind,
They are what is conventionally expressible.
Without the mental contents, mind cannot arise.
Not to maintain them as co-emergent is meaningless.

At the level of a sugata and the completely non-conceptual natural state, apparent objects are individually discriminated by insight, but there is no mind, content mind, or consciousness. This is because there is no grasping of dualistic appearance, or awareness of a grasped object by a fixating mind. The Praise of Vajra of Mind says:

Sentient beings, who have mind, content-mind, and consciousness, since they are accustomed to grasping and fixation, conceptualize them. Therefore, they do not have non-conceptual wisdom. Supreme wisdom is the mind, lo,⁴⁶ that sees reality.

The Structure of the Three Jewels says:

Neither mind, content-mind, consciousness; nor samadhi which is free from these are discarded.
The secret mind of the sugata is incomprehensible by thought.

When form, sound, and so forth arise as the corresponding external phenomena, and the mind's insight apprehends them, it is called consciousness, literally nampar phenomenal awareness shepa. Since these mental productions appear to be objective phenomena, they are called nampar shepa. At the first time when we know objects, the aspect of insight, that apprehends, "this," is mind. The analyzer of the distinctions that arise continuously connected to that is content mind. After the instant of clarity when individual things first present themselves, the knowledge that discriminates object awareness analyzes them. If it is attached to them as pleasant there is desire or passion. If as painful, there is aggression. If there is neither, but attachment to "this," that is ignorance.⁴⁷ Examples are, seeing a good woman we once knew; seeing an enemy that once conquered us; and seeing a wall, water, a highway, a tree, and ordinary people, toward which we have neither joy or sorrow. The Sutra on Teachings that are the Basis of Discipline says:

If we see amicable people, then we feel desire.
If harmful ones are present, our minds become aggressive.
For intermediate ones, our ignorance will increase,
In any case the gates of our faculties have been bound.

b. The basis of confusion in the eight consciousnesses

Now the ground of arising and divisions of these are extensively taught as follows:

Alaya consciousness, content mind, and then the five gates,
Gradually proliferate, one upon the other.
From that arise the cause and effect of samsaric suffering.
The root of samsara and suffering is ignorance,
Having the confusion of grasping and fixation.
By objects, conceptualization, and mind's habitual patterns,
By fixating "me" and "mine," samsara is established.

Here to distinguishes the different aspects, at the very time when awareness⁴⁸ of individual objects⁴⁹ arises, without divisions of their vividness, mind⁵⁰ which has insight of this is called the alaya-consciousness. Then the mind that fixates that, that peacefully saves it, with much analysis of objects at its leisure and so forth, is content-mind. The Sutra of the Ornament of Manjushri's wisdom says:

Mind is the alaya consciousness.
The "I" fixator is content-mind.

The eye-consciousness sees, when forms are seen, depending on the eye. Similarly depending on the ear there is sound, depending on the nose there is smell, depending on the tongue taste, depending on the body touchables. These are the five consciousnesses. The arising of later knowledge from such former phenomena is called the ayatana. In Tibetan this is kyeche, meaning increase or proliferation of what has arisen. The objects and awareness of these have immeasurable conditions, and since these many and extensive aspects are not put aside, but "retained" this is called kham or in Sanskrit dhatu.

From the object there is the arising of the seemingly supported perceiver-mind.⁵¹ From what is former, a connection to the later arises, and dharmin, the realm of *dharma*s, and *dharma*tā, their nature, occur. This is interdependent arising. When the two minds of object and perceiver are combined, pleasure and suchlike phenomena are felt and included in insight. By the condition of contact, this is called feeling. The particulars of these and other aspects are beyond describing.

In brief, by the three poisons, arising from the three collections of objects, the senses, and the actions of concept mind,⁵² come all motivating *karma*s. These *karma*s are unhappiness.

From patience and so forth freedom from the three poisons arises. This is the great happiness, the great bliss.

On the path of the ten virtues and so forth, prajna and compassion are not fully accomplished. This is the path of the lesser happiness. Accumulated by ignorant earthly beings, after the fruition of samsaric happiness is produced, it is exhausted. This is happiness proportional to merit.

The enlightened happiness produced by completely finishing the path is happiness proportional to liberation.

By the three poisons there is universally arising unhappiness. The lower realms and whatever suffering there may be are produced by this cause. Happiness proportional to merit grasps the glorious highlights of divine and human happiness.

The happiness proportional to liberation is produced both by incidental highlights and ultimate true goodness. The Precious Mala says:

As for passion, aggression, and ignorance
The karma produced by them is unhappiness.
As for non-passion, -aggression, and -ignorance,
The karma produced by them is happiness.
Unhappy karma is all suffering.
Happy karma is all the higher realms
And all the happiness of sentient beings

'Externally appearing things are like the things that appear to be other in a dream.' This means that grasping involves habitual patterns of objects. These various appearances of pure and impure are confused existence. Habitual patterns of reality are produced by the karma of bodily arising and also by the inner condition of not knowing suchness. These are the shandhas, dhatus, ayatanas, and so forth. From them arise all the kleshas, and the suffering that is their fruition, the support of the confusions of fixation.

Luminous, naturally-arisen wisdom is in essence empty, and by nature luminous. It is the source of the unobstructed arising of various kinds of radiance. When we become attached to this as the individualizing characteristics of grasping and fixation, insight arises as the habitual patterns of mind. The five or the three poisons arise. The root of confusion is fixating on the "I" and ego. Because of that, the confused appearances of samsara arise like reflections, dreams, or hairs drifting before the eyes. Moreover, fixation is fixated as "I", and grasped objects are fixated as "mine" with an attitude like that of the owner of a house.

2. The manner of confusion,

There are two sections:

a. By knowing or not knowing what we are⁵³ there are liberation or confusion.

Now the basis and way of confusion are extensively taught, as follows:

The changeless nature of mind, perfection, dharmakaya,
By ignorant fixation, takes on habits of false conception.
Involving confused appearance of impure relativity,
Dualistic appearance of objects as self and other,
Then come to be grasped as really being two.
Intrinsically this presents itself as limitless suffering.

When we have realized the ever-changeless nature of mind,
By the path of meditation on this unerring perfection,
We will properly reach the field of pure relativity.
Easing the weariness of the village of samsara.

Here three great doctrines of the yogachara⁵⁴ tradition are taught. These are false conceptions, relativity, and the perfectly established, in sanskrit, parikalpita, paratantra, and parinishpanna.

There are two kinds of false conceptions, characteristics, and accountable false conceptions.⁵⁵

By characteristics, from someone's viewpoint something is conceptually imputed, though it is non-existent, such as the horns of a rabbit or the alleged ego. This includes any bad doctrines and all the names and meanings of this and that established from that that may be presented by such a mind.

What is this like? Some search for the real bodily existence of that to which the name "lion" is imputed, but do not find it. Though the phenomenal meaning has been presented as "this," from mere arrogance, giving individual characteristics without any real remembered mental object, they may say it is like "fire."

Accountable false conceptions are various aspects of the environment and inhabitants of the phenomenal world arising from the viewpoint of confusion--joy and sorrow, the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas. Because they really do not exist, but only appear like a dream from the confused viewpoint of mind, they are called accountable false conceptions. Though all these things are natureless, they appear from the viewpoint of confusion. Since they are exaggerations, they are called parikalpita, or false conceptions, in Tibetan kun tak,⁵⁶ literally all-imputation or all-labeling. The Bodhisattvabhumi says:

As for the false conceptions of parikalpita
Though non-existent, are produced by the mind of confusion.

There are also two kinds of relativity, pure and impure. Pure relativity is the pure fields and the objects of the pure seeing of the buddhas, appearances that arise of buddha fields, the seven precious things⁵⁷ and divine palaces of pure light. Some say that the relativity of yogacara tradition is unacceptable, since all such things are classified as personal appearance.⁵⁸ Such disputatious people have not seen this properly. This sort of relativity is not established by oneself from personal habitual patterns of awareness. It is not like the phenomena reflected in a mirror, which are produced by conditions.

Whether everything is included within personal appearance should be analyzed. Either mind is included within mere appearance, or appearance is included within mind.

If it is like the first, at the time of mere appearance, there is no discernible boundary between phenomena that are included and those that are not included. Therefore "included" is a mere word, having nothing to do with real phenomena.⁵⁹

If it is like the second, how can this be suitable? Someone might say, "Since appearance arises from mind, it too is mind."

Then a boy child that comes from a woman would also be a woman, but this is not so. Excrement comes from the body, so it would be the body. This is clearly not the case.

Someone also might say, "Appearance is mind because it appears in mind."

Then form would be visual consciousness, because it appears in visual consciousness. Buddhas that appear to erroneous sentient beings would be the minds of those beings. Fallaciously, these sentient beings with their erroneous minds would be buddhas. Since sentient beings also appear to these buddhas, the whole realm of sentient beings would all be buddhas. Moreover, this fault that spotless buddhas are also defiled sentient beings could never be abandoned. This is because if buddhas were not mind, they could not arise at all.⁶⁰

If someone says, "Phenomena are mind," then what is really cause and fruition would be a single thing. If this did not exist, neither could arise at all. Thus, an enemy and one's anger at the enemy would be the same single thing. Therefore, without the enemy, there could be no anger at the enemy.

Also it is not proper to say, "phenomena are mind because they are produced by mind." Then the details of a painting would be the painter, because the painter produced them.

How is it proper to maintain that external earth, stones, mountains, and rocks are mind? Admit that their arising from the habitual patterns of mind is confused appearance. If this were not so, when a hundred people look at one vase, the vase that is seen by them all would be their awareness, and all the hundred beings would be a single awareness. If this is maintained, it would be proper reasoning that if one of them gets enlightened, they would all be enlightened. If one went to the lower realms, they would all go there. If it is like these notions, sentient beings in the world like you and me would not exist at all, since all that appears like that would be other than one's own mind. Moreover, it would not be suitable that there were any other buddhas besides the single one Shakyamuni. This is because all objects seen by him would be his awareness. If one maintains that, clearly he is us. These days many people fixate such traditions and completely obscure the mahayana.⁶¹ From what they say it would follow that a huge body could be covered by one the size of a lotus. A flower could have ear-rings. A gold face would be more than a mere ornament. An elephant would be just the sound of trumpeting.

If you ask what are pure appearances, when it is proclaimed within proper reasoning that completely false phenomena that are spotless are mind-only, that tradition says:

These appearances of oneself to oneself are one's own mind appearing to itself, but the apparent object is not mind.

Many yogachara texts say:

As many things that appear, that many are mind.
But that is not so for apparent objects themselves.
Having habitual patterns from beginningless time,
We are shaggy, as it were, with hairs before the eyes.

Appearance and the apparent object are distinguished. Others may think, "The apparent object of a mountain is a mountain!" but the clear appearances of fixation of mind arise in dependence on the faculty of sight. The objects we directly encounter, the phenomena fixated by our minds, are private, personal appearances.⁶² Then when others encounter the same mountain, that their apparent objects are the same as ours does not follow. Apparent objects are fixations of what appears in sense perception in terms of the habitual patterns of former eye consciousness.

A mere abstraction,⁶³ a mental object, a luminous appearance of what does not exist, vividly appears in the mental sense. Therefore, even if appearances apprehended by the mind and the fixator of them, appearances of others and the fixator of them are all mind, the object which arises for and is perceived by the mind is classified as an apparent object. All the objects of the five gates appear even though they do not exist, like shaggy hairs before the eyes, because of beginningless habitual patterns. Thus they become dualized. It may be asked, "Do you therefore establish appearance and apparent object as different?"

For you also they are two. This is because they exist externally to apparent mind, and because this is maintained within the fixating mind.⁶⁴ These are one within the mind, but are called "two."⁶⁵

It may be asked, "according to proper reasoning are they one? Here the apparent object caused by confused habitual patterns and the appearance ascertained by fixation, while both do not exist,⁶⁶ neither differs conventionally from the phenomena confused by habitual patterns. Moreover, since there are not really two such objects, they are established to be not-two in nature. For we who profess madhyamaka, if we analyze, not only the thing which is the apparent object, but the appearance too is maintained not to be mind. {{217.5}} This is because mind is inner and does just so, not exist externally and external appearance that arises within the individual senses is analyzed as being within the mind. If appearances had an external aspect too, then peoples' consciousness would be two or more at the same time, or one's consciousness would be a material thing.⁶⁷ There would be many such fallacies.

Therefore, the fixator of appearance and non-appearance is mind, but appearance itself is not established as mind. What is or is not the word "tail" is grasped by the listening consciousness, but listening consciousness itself is not established as the word, "tail."

In brief, one's own mind, though seemingly externally projected does not really go outward, and therefore, external phenomena really appear inwardly. However, external appearance is never internal mind. Why? Because what appears does not exist. A variety of such things, white and red, arise.⁶⁸

For one who has diseased eyes due to a disorder of the phlegm objects which are completely non-existent nevertheless appear, externally, internally and between. These are said to be natureless or empty of essence. Neither what is established as mind and what is established as other than mind are liberated from attachment to truly existent self-nature. In that respect they are indistinguishable. Some one may say, "Isn't this assertion that there are external objects-things which are not directly known, like that of the shravaka vaibhashika school?"

It is not the same. The vaibhashikas proclaim that these objects are established to have individual characteristics of material things. We, on the other hand, say that habitual patterns of confused appearance, appear to mind even though what seems to be there is non-existent like a dream. This approach is not refuted by madhyamaka, and so it is suitable.

Someone may ask why what has been proclaimed by us is not refuted by the prasangika madhyamaka school. Mere appearance is not refuted, but attachment to true existence is refuted. The teacher Nagarjuna says:

Thus though appearance itself is not to be refuted,
Eliminate thoughts that conceptualize this as truly existent.

{218.5}} The yogacara true-aspectarians proclaim that phenomena are mind. Both the true and false aspectarians assert the refuted tenet that the absolute is truly established as self-insight,⁶⁹ so how will they deny that confused appearances of habitual patterns arise while they are non-existent and that classifications of existents are really entered into? This is because these would be made into the classification of the relative at the same time.⁷⁰

Thus outer relativity and the relativity of mind or insight,⁷¹ arising after the former, its appearance depending on other previous objects, must be analyzed in terms of inner patterns. If seeming appearance of before and after is imputed, the name alone is the meaning, and they accord. If it is maintained to be other and different from what is present, one's own insight cannot be established as a characteristic of something other, because the very assertion is contradictory. This is not good reasoning. The former text says:

Thus all these various different kinds of appearances,
Because they seem to be phenomena that are other,
Are the impure relativity of grasping and fixation.
The pure is also said to be relativity,
But what becomes through external power is not pure.
This too is explained as appearing to be something other.

The perfectly established is changeless and true. This changeless, completely established nature without confusion is the emptiness of dharmata, by nature intrinsically pure, without distinction of earlier and later. This changeless perfectly established is the quintessential natural state. The empowerment of this is established as empty or as threefold.

It is naturally empty of itself, other, and both. As for emptiness of itself, it appears as non-existence, like the moon in water. Individual characteristics are abandoned, and divided aspects of self and other do not exist; but spontaneously present dharmas are not put aside, there are both imputations of these and of the emptiness of their self-nature.

Other emptiness is the other emptiness of not having or the other emptiness of accountables.

Emptiness of both self and other has both emptiness of accountables and emptiness of the individual characteristics denoted by the words.

This luminous nature of mind, the nature, the dhatu, the essence, is empty of all fallacious things. It has the characteristics of the buddha qualities. Its purity of essence is beyond faults and virtues, and establishing or clearing away. Various defiled dharmas of confused appearance, red and white, arise. These false conceptions, the eight consciousnesses, are natureless. Their self-nature is empty. Accountable like a pillar or a vase, they are empty and fallacious. The pure nature is beyond faults and virtues, establishing or clearing away. The paths too are empty of themselves and have some virtuous and some faulty aspects. But the pure essence is beyond faults and virtues.

At the time of the ultimate purity, all injurious faults together with their habitual patterns are obscured in emptiness. This is the absolute itself. Whatever qualities of the absolute dhatu exist are also ultimate manifestations and are not empty.⁷² The pure essence is beyond faults and virtues, establishing and clearing away.

In brief, as for self-emptiness, the nature of dharmas of this and that has no true existence. From the two divisions, as for characteristics being empty of their own essence, whatever characteristic is described is non-existent like the horns of a rabbit. Though appearing from the viewpoint of confusion, it is without nature or reality, empty like the moon in water.

Emptiness of self-nature of imputation, is emptiness of what is imputed by names, words, and letters. Except as mere mental constructions, the individual characteristics of these objects do not exist, as for small children what is imputed by the name "lion" really has a turquoise mane. What is actually denoted by the word used by this small child has a body without such a mane, but since the understanding producing name can have an understood symbolic meaning even when it is empty, all impute to it an effect-producing power.

In emptiness of other, a dharma is imputed to be empty of another dharma. From the two divisions, in other emptiness of not having the sun is said to be empty by not having darkness, a pillar, a blanket, and so forth. Here, dharmas that are non-existent within the sun are other real individual natures.⁷³

As for emptiness of accountable others, "the sun" and "light-producer," and "the one with seven horses" are general accountable imputations. Since the natures⁷⁴ and particular included examples⁷⁵ expressed do not touch the individuating characteristics which are the meaning of the sun, it is empty of them.

What is empty of both self and other, is a dharma that has neither. From the two divisions. There are accountable imputations and real individual characteristics.

Within the one involving accountable imputations, are the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas and so forth, which are imputed by samsaric confusions. All such things are also empty of the individual characteristics of the three realms, since they are constructions of conventional mind in names. They have both empty individual characteristics, like the water in a mirage, and no individual characteristics, like the child of a barren woman. Though they are empty of any truly any existing nature, they unobstructedly appear, vividly luminous, with an emptiness like that of relativity.

If the three essences are divided in this way, there are six sorts of things of which there is emptiness. Though these are expressed by calling them empty of essence, they are also completely pure and by the accountable expression empty since being beyond mind is included as a second sense, all dharmas should be realized also to be empty in this manner.

As for what is said by exponents of nihilistic emptiness, since that style of emptiness is impossible, their dharma is like that of the outsider materialists, the charvakas. There is emptiness; but this non-empty emptiness is merely partial emptiness. It accords with the dharma of those of the eternalistic view of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, and therefore it falls into both the eternalistic and nihilistic extremes, and simply should not be relied upon.⁷⁶

Correct perfect establishment is the path of true liberation. In realizing the natural state as it is, since the phenomena of appearance are not put aside, in the relative, merit can be accumulated. The nature of emptiness which is contemplated is the accumulation of wisdom within the absolute. Earnestly produce this dharmata like the sky free from one and many. The former text says:

"Correct" is genuinely gathering the truths of the path.

In brief, we enter into the nature of mind, the changeless luminosity of suchness, after all dharmas are realized to be empty in the sense of being mere false conceptions. If we meditate on the path, impure confused appearance, along with the mind of false conceptions, becomes pure as it really is. The primordial state has been reached. The dharmas of the holy teachings are gathered into one as the inexhaustible body, speech, and mind, of the sphere of the ornament. One becomes a perfect master of the pure buddha fields.

b. The suffering of wandering in samsara because of ego-grasping.

Now because there is such a grasper and grasped, while we are wandering here in samsara, as if in a dream, we are compared to people sinking in a river:

E ma! How limitless is this realm of samsara.
How difficult it is to examine what it is.
So painful is the weariness of the path of samsara

That anyone born there has no happiness at all.
This unbearable fruition is produced by unhappy actions,
It is a self-projection which is wrongly understood,
The sort of thing we often do within a dream.
The natures experienced by individuals of the six lokas
Are confused appearances of what does not exist.
Therefore they give rise to measureless sufferings.
Listen while briefly I summarize what has been taught about them.

The Analysis of Scripture says:

As if in a filthy swamp of foul and disgusting stench
Beings of the six realms have no happiness.
As if in a blazing pit where it is never cool
Those in samsara too never have any joy.

Within samsara they transmigrate from the desire realm to the realm of form. From the realms of form and the formless, they transmigrate into the realm of desire. From the realm of the formless, they transmigrate to the realm of form. Wherever samsaric beings exist within the six lokas, there is only suffering, and they have no chance of happiness. For a little while, as explained in the scriptures etc., they may remember how those who have realization put aside the mind of joy in samsara and urged them to "practice the dharma of liberation." If they do not make an effort to do this, generally they will continue to wander in samsara. The Letter to Students says:

Whoever dwells within the ever-changing round of samsara, Happily thinking that it is just a residence,
Will certainly willy-nilly many hundreds of times
Wander everywhere with like and dissimilar beings.

3. The Divisions of Confusion

a. The Hells,

1) the Hot Hells

Of the twelve hot Hells, the first is the Reviving Hell.

a) The Reviving Hell:

i) A brief explanation:

Over the blazing iron coals of the Hell of Reviving,
Beings meet and kill each other with their weapons.
A voice says, "Revive," and again they suffer as before.
They experience this until their karma is exhausted.

Above blazing iron coals, these Hell beings are gathered by their karma. They strike each other with sticks, battle-axes, iron clubs, disks and so forth. Seeing each other as hostile enemies, they seem to fight until all of them are killed. Then a voice from space says, "Revive," and right away they revive as they were before. They have to experience countless times the real suffering of being killed by their weapons. The Spiritual Letter says:

Three hundred times a day by short sharp spears,
These are fiercely stabbed, and their sufferings
When they enter into the sufferings of Hell
Are an intolerable rain of sufferings.
Even one instance is unbearable.

ii) The measure of their lives

The measure of their lives is until their karma is exhausted, briefly, as it says in the ordinary sutras:

Fifty years within the life of a human being
Are just a day for the four great gods who are kings of the world.
Their months are thirty such days, and twelve months make a year.
Five hundred such years are a day of the Reviving Hell.
They have to suffer for five hundred years of days like these.
An exact calculation of this according to the sutras
Is a hundred and sixty trillion years of human time.

The ordinary sutras of the mahayana, the tantras, and the shastras say that individuals' karma being thin or thick⁷⁷ and by merely transmigrating between lives, those who fall into that place are not taught to have one single certain measure of life. Strong antidotes may arise in one's being and so forth, so that one suddenly transmigrates. Someone who was something like a tantric master might have to remain for many kalpas, until released from karmic obscurations. The Spiritual Letter says:

Thus they experience quite unbearable suffering
Over the course of eight times ten million years.
For as long as their bad karma has not been exhausted,
For that long they cannot be free of that life.

In the case of the viewpoint of the ordinary sutras, the Abhidharmakosha says:

In the six levels of the Reviving and so forth,
One day equals the life of the desire gods.

According to the account given in the Objects of Mindfulness and Le Namje, fifty human years is one day for the great conquering kings of the four families. Thirty of these is one of their months, and twelve of these is counted as their year, and five hundred of those years is one day of the Reviving Hell. They suffer for five hundred such years. If one counts this in human years, the Objects of Mindfulness says:

Beings endure a hundred thousand times ten million years and 62,000 in the Reviving Hell.

b) The Black Thread Hell

The Hell below this is the Black Thread Hell:

In the Black Thread Hell they are sewn together with blazing needles,
Then just where they were stitched, they are cut apart again.
Because of this, their suffering is terrible.

If we take a day of a hundred and three human years,
A thousand years of those is a day of the Black Thread Hell.
According to the teachings, a thousand of their years
Is twelve trillion, nine hundred sixty billion years of ours.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Some are sewn with needles, and parted like that again.
By sharp irresistible axes they are cut apart

If 133 human years is counted as a day, a thousand years of such days is one day of the Black Thread Hell. They endure a thousand such years. If one counts the same period in human years, the Objects of Mindfulness says:

The years of beings in the Black Thread Hell are twelve hundred thousand and ninety six times ten million years.

c) The Hell of Crushing and Joining

Below that

In the Hell of Crushing and Joining, beings are crushed to atoms
By mountains like horses, camels, lions, tigers, and so on.
The mountains part, and again they are living, as before.

In iron valleys hammers pound them into dust.
While they are being crushed, streams of blood flow down.
Two hundred years are a day for the Aviha gods.

Two thousand such Twin-god days are a day of the Crushing Hell.
There they are said to suffer for two thousand of their years,
Or thirty trillion, nine hundred and eighty billion years.

The Letter to Students says:

Herded by two fearful mountains like giant shepherds
Gathered between them their bodies are crushed and reduced to dust.
They are separated by wind that does not cool at all.
Then again they are crushed to dust like that a hundred times.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Some are crushed like sesame seeds,
And others ground fine like flour.

There are certain gods who, because they are free from fighting with the asuras, are called "free from strife," Aviha, and because boys and girls emerge from their loins together, they are also called the "Twin gods." Two hundred human years make up one day for them. Two thousand of these days are one day in the Hell of Crushing and Joining. Beings there must endure two thousand such years. If this is divided in human years, the Objects of Mindfulness says:

Those of the Hell of Crushing and Joining endure 10,368,000 times ten million human years.

d) The Crying and Screaming Hell

i) A brief explanation

Then below that:

In the Crying and Screaming Hell, beings are burnt in fires,
This is why they weep and lament, they scream and wail.
They suffer by being cooked in boiling iron cauldrons.
Four hundred years are a day for the Tushita gods.
Four thousand of these are a day of the Crying and Screaming Hell.
Their sufferings go on for four thousand of these years.
In human years this is a hundred and eighty trillion
Nine hundred and forty-four billion are also added to these.

The Spiritual Letter says: {{229.3}}

Some are burned by blazing embers continuously,
While they are being consumed, their mouths are gaping wide.
Some boiled in iron caldrons, or great copper ones,
Are cooked like meat that is being made into soup.

The Letter to Students says: {{229.4}}

Some fall into great soup-kettles and are boiled there
Others transmigrate to burning sand that gives off sparks.
They cannot see the ground on which they put their feet.

Four hundred human years are counted as one day among the gods of the Tushita heaven. Four thousand of these are one day of the Crying and Screaming Hell. They endure four thousand such years. If one counts this in human years the Objects of Mindfulness says:

ii) The measure of their lives

Those of the Crying and Screaming Hell live for 10,944,000 times ten million human years.

In the Hell of Great Screams, in a blazing iron house, Beings are burned in fires and hacked in pieces by Yama.⁷⁸
Eight hundred years are a day for the Nirm__arati gods. Eight thousand of those are a day within the Hell of Great Screams.
Their sufferings go on for eight thousand of their years.
This amounts In human years to three quadrillion,
Five hundred and fifty-two trillion, six hundred and sixty billion.

The Letter to Students says:

They live in Hell fire and a shroud of stinking smoke.
Tongues of flame pervade the circle of the directions.
Adorned with heaped white bones, like some terrible wreath.
As elephant skins appear as a means of threatening them
These beings cry out in pain and fear "Kye ma! Kye hu!

Some places great flaming fires are emanated
With an agonizing roar they rise and tower upward.
By day their voices peak in number and shrill volume
Inside their dwellings of bones, they loudly scream and howl.
Not even kalpa fire produces what they fell into.

Eight hundred human years are counted as a day of the Nirmanarati gods, and eight thousand of those years are a day of the Hell of Great Screams. They remain for eight thousand of their years. As for the count of this in human years, the Objects of Mindfulness says

They have to endure the Hell of Great Screams for 663,552,000 times 10 million human years.

e) The Hell of Heat

Below that:

In the Hell of Heat beings are in an iron house.
Their brains are first exposed by using a short spear.
After that they are thoroughly beaten on with hammers.
Inside and out they are seared by blazing tongues of flame.

A day of the Paranirmitavashavartin gods
Has the same length as sixteen hundred human years.
Sixteen thousand of these is a day within the Hell of Heat.
They suffer there for sixteen thousand of their years.
Which equals three billion and eighty-four million human years,
To which are added another hundred and sixty thousand.

The Letter to Students says:

We see the noose of time in the hand of the Lord of Death
Poisonous snakes are coiled around the head and lap.
Crows, gulls, ravens, and vultures peck out eyes and brains From living victims without the slightest hesitation.

Sixteen hundred human years is counted as one day by the Paranirmitavashavartin gods. Sixteen thousand of these are counted as one day in the Hell of Heat. They endure sixteen thousand of their years, which in human years, as the Objects of Mindfulness says:

Those of the Hell of Heat endure this for 818,416 million times ten million human years.

f) The Very Hot Hell

Below this:

In the Very Hot Hell, among two rows of iron houses,
They are burned in fire and stabbed with three-pointed weapons.
Their heads and shoulders are parted, then joined with bandages.
They also suffer by being boiled in copper cauldrons.
The length of their lives is half an anta_kalpa.
It is beyond being counted in terms of human years.
In four small kalpas the world arises and endures.
It is destroyed and there is nothingness.
The length of these is equal to one anta_kalpa.
One great kalpa is eighty intermediate ones.

A sutra says:

In the Very Hot Hell are a host of blazing fires
Their bodies are pierced and stabbed by vajras and by tridents.
They are boiled in great copper cauldrons and tied in bandages.
They only rest while burned by fires within and without.

The measure of their lives is unfathomably long. In four stages the word arises, endures, is destroyed, and remains in emptiness. Each of these is counted as one anta_kalpa or intermediate kalpa. They live for half of such a kalpa. The Objects of Mindfulness:

Those of the Very Hot Hell experience their sufferings for half an antahkalpa. This should be kept in mind.

g) The Avici Hell

Below that:

In the Uninterrupted Hell, in blazing iron houses
Aside from the clamor of lamentation of the Hell beings,
The fire and those beings cannot be separately seen.
Just As the burning flame of a lamp will cling to its center,
There is just a spark of life in the center of the fire.

They have to suffer this for the time of one anta_kalpa.
Since there is no greater suffering than this,
Therefore it is called the Uninterrupted Hell.

The Letter to Students says:

As dry grass burns from the heart, they are burned by blazing fires.
From throats and mouths repeatedly issue smoky flames.
Falling from inner hunger, their innards burst and splatter.
They produce an indescribable howling cry.

Wishing to be freed from their great suffering,
Again and again, they watch from within the opening gates
Seeing other places, they wait until they open.
As soon as they go forward the gates shut tight again.

Then there is further pain of unbearable depression.
Like a falling rain of sharp and blazing arrows, the guardians beat them with sticks, and boiling tears flow down.

Because they are being stewed in a pot of molten iron, Drinking in a heaped up wreath of tongues of flame,
Smoke rises from the holes of mouth, and nose, and ears.
Eyes and brains ooze like cream in blazing tongues of flame.
That fire, as if furious at those piled bodies,
Flare like piles of dry firewood that are being kindled.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Among the unbearable sufferings of all of these
Those of the Avici Hell are worst of all.

The Analysis of Karma says:

At the gates of the Avici Hell is an iron mountain of 60,000 pagtses. The Hell beings, exhausted by getting by it, transmigrate to new lives.

There are an immeasurable number of them, it is taught. This is manifested by very heavy karma of having abandoned Dharma, broken samaya etc. The Objects of Mindfulness says:

Those of the Avici Hell transmigrate after having passed there an intermediate kalpa. Even if they are born as a king, their powers will not be sound, so it has been taught.

h) The summary of the meaning of these

Now there is the summary:

In each these different Hells that have been mentioned above,
The tongues of flame are seven times hotter than the last.
Each is lower, with greater suffering, than the last.
Beings suffer until their karma is exhausted.

As for these Hells that have just been described, the tongues of flame become seven times hotter [from one to the next. The Analysis says:

Hellfire from one to the next
Increases by seven times.
Likewise the sufferings
Are seven times the last.

More and more sufferings are stacked up, like blisters on top of leprosy. As if their sensations had become seven times stronger, their sufferings are also seven times stronger. They must endure this until their karma is exhausted.

i) The ephemeral Hells

i) The Main Explanation of the temporary Hells

Included among these Hells are the following:

The ephemeral Hells may be in the mountains, trees, or sky.
In water, fire, or rocks, or in uncertain places.
Groups or single beings remain there for a while.
In those places they suffer their respective torments.
That explains their being called "ephemeral Hells."

The beings of the ephemeral Hells are in mountains, rocks, water, fire, space, and so on, or in uncertain places, like a pestle, rope, refuse rag, a burning piece of wood, or a log. There may be different kinds of beings together, or one alone. They may be hot, cold, wet, or dry, ripped apart, cut up, boiled, whatever sort of suffering it may be, but each of them unbearable. This may last half a day and night, just a moment, or for all eternity, since they suffer by the force of different karmas. Thus they are called ephemeral. The Sutra on Teachings that are the Basis of Discipline says:

Then son of Maudgal from across the ocean, the Hell of the beings of the ephemeral Hells are in places like a pestle, or a tree, and they are seen to be tormented by many different kinds of suffering.

Within the realm of samsara, beings have no pleasure.
They are like the beings of the ephemeral Hells,
All tormented by their individual sufferings,
As if they had been forced to live in a blazing land.

ii) In order to refute other kinds of wrong conceptions:

Some mistakenly say that the name "ephemeral"
Is given as few are there, or since their lives are short.
But scorpions live for quite a while among the rocks.
And once there was an ephemeral Hell that had the form
Of five hundred shravakas gathered for their noontime meal.
It is said that they took up weapons and struck each other.

Some say are called ephemeral since each day they become non-existent. This is not the right sense here.

After many human generations in an iron house
Still they have many years to remain within this Hell.

With such harm, and some alone and companionless, they are called ephemeral. When Shro_ako_kar_a⁷⁹ arrived in a vihara, from one with a net beating a gandi,⁸⁰ as soon as 500 beings had taken the form of shravakas, they quarrelled with each other, and resolved it with weapons.⁸¹ The moment the hostilities were over, they were no longer seen, so the scriptures say.

j) The Neighboring Hells

i) The brief teaching.

Around the Avici Hell are 16 others:

The Neighboring Hells are found by the Uninterrupted Hell.
They are found in each of its cardinal directions.
These are the fire pit Hell, the Hell of putrid stench,
The plain of weapons, and the river without a ford.

In all there are four times four--sixteen such Hells.

ii) The extensive explanation

There are six sections describing these, which open in whatever direction one turns.

a)) The Fire Pit Hell:

Thinking that its ten million gates have now been opened,
Beings come forth from within the uninterrupted Hell.
Seeing shady river valleys, when they enter the running water,
Having sunk into blazing coals up to their knees,
Their flesh is burned away, leaving bones as white as lotuses.
Then revived, as before, their suffering is extreme.

First, their karma mostly restrains them in the iron houses of the Avici Hell, where sufferings of heat are afflicted with increasing sufferings. Then, thinking that the gates have opened, they flee. As they approach, driven by iron dogs, they seem to see a pleasant shady ravine. About what they suffer the Letter to Students says:

A crowd of torn people are herded by dogs with gaping jaws
Long thorn-like fangs with vajra tips rip at their bodies.
There is a ravine and river completely lacking water,
Full of dismal ashes and licking tongues of flame.

While driven they are mutilated by corners of rocks,
Having sharp razor points that tear unbearably.
Fleeing into the river, they sink into the ashes.
Their flesh and bones are burned, and then they revive again,

b)) When they think they are free,

Here is what they reach:

As soon as they enter the cooling ponds that they have seen,
They sink in a putrid, stinking mire of rotting corpses.
Worms with metal beaks of copper, iron, and gold,
Piercing their bodies, bore and tunnel into them.

The Letter to Students says:

Some move about like little worms and insects.⁸²
Because of the crowd their bodies are immobile.
Or else they rot away upon the fields.
With lives blocked by the trap of their karmic nature
They live without being even able to move.

c)) Then:

As soon as they return to the pleasant plains they have seen
They are cut to pieces by blazing daggers while still alive.

The Letter to Students says:

Into a grove whose branches are swords with dagger leaves,
They run exhausted, and of course their bodies are wounded, by many three pointed short spears, arrows, and sharp swords
Fangs in the mouth of the Lord of Death pierce as they fall.

d)) And then:

When they have entered into pleasant leafy groves,
They are overcome by a forest of sharp swords

The Letter to Students says:

Enduring many torments difficult to bear
Day and night, their bodies are grievously destroyed.
As they go among green trees which they formerly saw
They cannot help falling onto leaves of a hundred weapons.
There in long entanglements they are badly wounded.

e)) And then

Passing from there to a very pleasant mountain peak,
They see their former homeland and go as if they were summoned.
Flesh and blood are scraped away with sharp iron spoons.
Vultures peck their brains, as they are climbing upward.
Then they think that they are called to descend the mountain,
And again they are scraped by the spoons, as when they first went up.
At the edge of the plain are men and women with sharpened beaks.
In the blazing embrace of these their suffering is extreme.
After that they are eaten by many dogs and jackals.

Then they think that there is a very pleasant mountain. When they go there, these former men and woman seem to see all the features of the countries where they formerly lived, and seeing people once close to them, thinking they are calling, they ascend. As they are scraped with iron spoons, their flesh and blood multiplies. As they come down, they suffer the same pains of being scraped as when they went up. The Letter to Students says:

As they quickly climb this slope of unbearable shalmali trees,⁸³
There is a host of briars. Sharp spoons scrape them through.
With terrible pain, they destroy inside, and then subside.

And also:

When they move downward, from iron briars going upward,
They Remember many sharp things roughly piercing their bodies,
Then sometimes by the sharpness and the painfulness
Of blazing three pointed spears, their bodies cannot descend.

Then by crows whose beaks are marked with symbolic weapons
They are driven along by ordinary needs
Of their bellies and such, and as they are lost and scattered.
Some fall into fearful abysses of mountain chasms.

Also

From all the women a hundred tongues of flame come forth.
They live ornamented by massive wreaths of flame.
Toothed like saws these do not ever leave their bodies.
Lured into pleasant groves, they embrace unite with them.

f)) And then:

Also having seen the cool streams of flowing rivers,
As soon as they joyfully go and are immersed in them,

They sink to their waists in hot ashes, and flesh and bones are consumed.
They see the guards of Yama keeping them from the two banks.
There they have to suffer for many thousands of years.

The Objects of Mindfulness says:

When they go there, they see streams. As soon as they step into them up to their waists, their flesh is burned, and even their bones turn to powder and separate from them. When again they are revived, on the banks where they formerly were, the beings of the Lord of Death appear to be standing.

k) The instruction on eliminating those sufferings.

They are as follows:

If someone in the Hells remains unterrified,
But knows the nature of these endless samsaric torments,
Then that person will have the means of passing beyond them.

That is the instruction.

2) The Cold Hells,

There are three sections

a) The eight cold Hells.

Now the sufferings of cold are explained:

There are also eight Hells where there are the torments of cold.
In extremely frigid places of snow and so forth,
Arbuda, Nnirarbuda, Atata, and Hahava
Huhuva and Utpala, Padma and Mahapadma.⁸⁴
In blackest darkness their bodies are ravished by swirling blizzards, Devoured by living things with sharp and flaming beaks.
Until they reach the end of their karma they shiver there.

Having been afflicted, in cold and snowy places, cold and dark, blasted by black winds, they are covered with blisters and, when the blisters burst, with wounds. Except for sneezing "achu!" they cannot speak. They lament, "kye 'ud!" and their teeth chatter, so that no speech can get out. They are wounded like a blue utpala lotus with fine roots and big leaves turned inside out. Like a red lotus, they are split into four pieces. Like a big lotus they are split into eight pieces. From their wounds come fine streams of fluid. Insects crawl in and eat. As for their immeasurable sufferings from cold, the Letter to Students says:

They are many beyond example, exposing even their bones.
Their hungry bodies shiver, becoming shriveled and crooked. A hundred blisters rise with fluid, and as they break,
Insects ravage them with beaks as sharp as swords
To their feet the blood and gore comes dripping down.
Their teeth chatter helplessly. Their head and body hairs tremble.
Sore eyes, ears, throats and noses, torment all these beings.
With bodies and minds corrupted to the very center,⁸⁵
They remain in those Cold Hells, and loudly cry and wail.

b) The explanation of the measure of time.

The time of their suffering in these eight Hells:

The length of their lives in the Hell which is called Arbuda
Is as long as it would take to empty out
A sesame store in Kosala⁸⁶ containing 200 bushels⁸⁷
By removing only a single grain in a century,
In each of the other cold Hells, it is twenty times the last.

The Objects of Mindfulness says:⁸⁸

If the storage bin of the city of Kosala were full of sesame seed full of sesame seed without any gap, The lives of the beings in the Blistering Hell are as long as it would take to empty it by removing one grain every hundred years. The others each last for twenty times longer than the last.

In accord with this, the Abhidharmakosha says:

From within a sesame store every hundred years
Removing a single seed until they all are emptied,
That is the length of life within the Blistering Hell.
The lives each of the others are twenty times the last.

c) The Instruction of striving in the means of liberation from these Hells

Thus thinking of these immeasurable sufferings of heat and cold:

Beings with minds should then arouse their strength of effort
To conquer these merely mental worlds of Hell.

So it is taught. The Spiritual Letter says:

Evildoers, as soon as their breath has ceased,
When they are cut off by time, at the end of life,
Having heard of Hell's measureless sufferings,
To be fearless through emptiness requires the vajra nature.

If having seen pictures of Hell and heard of it,
Remembering, reading, or merely glancing at pictures,
People are often stricken with unbearable fear
Why speak of the actual experiences of ripening?

b. The suffering of the hungry ghosts,

There are three sections.

1) The way they live:

Pretas stay and roam in their world of hungry ghosts.
Their bodies are large with great paunches. Their hands and feet are small.
Their necks are slim with mouths no bigger than a needle.
Finding no food or drink, they are racked by hunger and thirst.
Trees and flowers, medicinal herbs, and wholesome things
Wither away as soon as these pretas look at them.
Externally they eat vomit, or things that are foul and vile.
If they do see food and drink, they seem to be kept away.
Because of inner defilement, their food is consumed by fire.
Smoky tongues of flame are spewing from their mouths.
Obscured with malicious anger, they always fear deprivation.
In terrifying places, they suffer helplessly.

Living in space, externals are obscured for them, and since externals they do experience are not pleasing, they do not get what they want. Their evil bodies have to eat evil vomit, and even if these ravening ones see food and drink, it seems to be guarded, or as soon as they get to it, it dries up. By that they suffer. Their inner obscurations are even worse. Flames blaze from their bellies, and emit smoke. As for their obscurations generally, on top of that they always suffer poverty, deprivation, hunger, thirst, ugly forms, and sensory distortion. They always have to be fed by others. They are fearful, without refuge and protector. The Letter to Students says:

Unbearably tortured by thirst, they seem to see spotless streams.
They want to drink, but as soon as they can, the water
Is full of clots of hair, mixed with fish dung and pus
Trailing mud and slime, and blood and excrement.

In time winds disperse the water, and they are among cool mountains.
If there they see green growing groves of sandalwood
Above them, the forest flames, with sharp thick tongues of fire,
Blazing embers fall and they cannot help themselves.

Fearful ocean waves rise and crash over them
Even if they get beyond that foamy trouble,
Millions of harsh red clouds of howling, gritty wind
Whirl and drown everything in a fearful, sandy desert.

If the rain-clouds come that they are praying for,
A rain of iron arrows, falls with smoke and embers,
Hot vajra boulders crush and ravish them completely,
Seeming of golden color, wreathed with orange lightning,
A rain of these falls everywhere upon their bodies.

2) Those who live in the air and in space:

As for this subtle assembly:

The spirits of the air are evil hungry ghosts.⁸⁹
By miraculous actions they go unhindered anywhere,
Accomplishing their various manifestations of harm.
Bringing sickness, they ravish health and cut off life
A month for human beings is just a day for them.
Five hundred years of theirs are fifty thousand of ours.
They suffer thus within the realms of the Lord of Death.

These too are among the hungry ghosts, and their suffering is immeasurable. Their realm is unpleasant, dangerous, fearful, hungry and thirsty. Whoever is close to their hearts is infected with fatal diseases. They themselves are always tormented by these as well, and spread these diseases. Life and health are ravished away, and only harm to others is accomplished. They are beings unhappy to meet. Going about by miraculous power, they appear as guardians of narrow paths. Their individual bodies are like gates, bubbles, half burned or split pieces of wood, and various dogs and birds. Some by former slight merit have enjoyments, but also suffer many sufferings. Mostly events occur at the wrong season and moreover even in their enjoyments there are limitless sufferings and so forth. The same text says:

Even in a snowstorm they are afflicted by heat.
Helplessly chilled by winds, they are even cold in a fire.
By such unbearable ripenings they are stupefied.
Various kinds of things wrongly appear to them.
Even the eye of a needle seems many terrifying miles,
With their great bellies, even if they drink an ocean,
It will not wet so far as even the end of their throats.
By the heat of their mouths they are thirsty for even a drop of water.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Hungry ghosts are impoverished by never-ending desire.
The suffering so produced is continuous and unbearable.
Hunger, thirst and cold; heat, fatigue, and fear,
Produce unbearable sufferings that always attend them.

Some with tiny mouths as small the eye of a needle.
And bellies as big as mountains are tormented by hunger.
They cannot get rid of the false perspective of their eyes.
They do not have the power to seek out anything.

Some are naked with bodies formed of skin and bones
They are dry like the sun-baked tops of desert palms.
Some are ablaze with fire from mouths and genitals?
As food of burning sand falls into their gullets.

Some of the lower ones do not even get
Pus and excrement, or blood and other filth.
From their throats, they mutually infect each other.
Buboes arise, and then exude a ripening pus.

For pretas, even in the springtime of their lives,
Even the moon is hot and even the sun is cold.
Trees are fruitless and barren, blasted by their glance,
As soon as they are looked at, rivers and springs dry up.

Sufferings attend them continuous and unhindered.
As for the karmic noose of their evil activity,
The bodies of some of them are quite tenaciously held.
They will not die in five or even ten thousand years.

One human month is counted as a day of the pretas. Five hundred of their years is taught to be 50,000 human years.

3) Encouragement to practice Dharma, not Desiring Samsara.

As for the endless ways of suffering:

Having seen this saddening nature of how things are,
Accordingly, persons, to gain their liberation,
Should distance themselves from samsara's hedonic calculus.
By that the true peace of holy Dharma will be established.

That is the good instruction.

c. The Animal Realm

1) Animals too are without happiness:

In the animal realm, those who live within the four oceans
All devour each other, in measureless suffering.
Even if they hide in the dark places of the land,
They fear heat and cold, and hunger and thirst, and being eaten.
Wild beasts and birds throughout the human realm
Are in danger from sharp weapons and also from each other.
Horses, oxen, camels, as well as donkeys and such,
Have limitless pains of carrying burdens and being beaten.
They are killed for their skins, and for their meat and bones.

They cannot see the limitless suffering of their nature.

Nagas suffer the pain and pleasure of midday and midnight.
And the pains and pleasures of coming day and coming night.
In some places there fall rains of abrasive, burning sand.
In some they are forsaken, alone without companions.
Mostly stupid, they fear soaring birds and such.
They meet with a great variety of sufferings.
Their lives, uncertain, are sometimes just a day.
Divine Tak_saka and others are said to live a kalpa

The great oceans between the four continents are filled without gaps with fish, conches, crocodiles, and the like, crawling like grain in chang. The big ones eat the little ones, the little ones eat still littler ones, and so forth.

Others from this continent to the surrounding iron mountains-hide under fine in darkness inside the earth, since the sun and moon do not appear there. As in the water, they eat one another, and have measureless sufferings of hunger and thirst.

The scattered animals on the face of the world, living in the human realm's mountains, plains, water, rocks, sky, and so forth, small creatures, worms, insects, birds, wild animals, and so forth, each have their particular sufferings of heat, cold, hunger, thirst, being eaten by each other, and so forth--measureless illness and affliction. In particular they are tormented by hunters, fishermen, and birds of prey. Some die for their flesh, skins, and bones, or are used beaten and bleeding and then killed at the end of their labors, and have limitless other sufferings.

In the serpent realm too though there are appropriate pleasures of day and night, morning and evening, there are also the many particular sufferings of hot and cold, hunger and thirst, and so forth.

Where some live thousands of rains fall, and some are forsaken by any. Some are entirely alone and companionless. In general they are stupid and afraid of birds, vidya mantra, and immeasurable other harmful phenomena. Their lives are uncertain. Some live only an instant, a day, and so forth. The kings of nagas, like Tak_saka, live for an intermediate kalpa. The Abhidharmakosha says:

That of Tak_saka is a kalpa.

The Sutra Requested by Ocean says:

He lives in the ocean for an intermediate kalpa.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Those who live within the animal realm
Have various sufferings of bondage and beating.
They are worked and driven with whips and hooks and so forth.

2) The instruction to be diligent in the Dharma:

Having thought about this, those who want liberation
From the world of animals, to benefit themselves,
Should customarily travel the path of accurate vision.
Striving day and night to be absorbed in the wholesome.

For these reasons, those desiring liberation from the fate of those who have gone astray among the animals, from the goodness and so forth of holy Dharma, should strive with this opportunity of the great human and divine path of the ten virtues that accord with merit, the four dhyanas, and the four formless attainments. This is the instruction of the ultimate great path of liberation through the accumulations of merit and wisdom. Its essence is emptiness and compassion. Strive to meditate on that path by the six paramitas and so forth.

d. The human realm,

There are nine sections:

1) The torments of the eight sufferings:

Now, though they have attained the higher realms:

Humans also have no chance of happiness.
Sorrows, unhappiness, strife, and war and such,
Before we are rid of one, we suffer with another.
Sometimes our food is changed by being mixed with poison.
Food, clothing and requisites fail us, and therefore we get sick.
Later sufferings we have ripened then come forth.
There are the three kinds of suffering and also the following:
Birth and age, sickness, death and hostile people;
Being parted from those we love and what we want,
As well as the pain of having to deal with what we get.
The suffering of these eight is without measure and end.

What kinds of suffering do people have? The three great root sufferings are the sufferings of:

- 1). Suffering,
- 2). Change
- 3). Conditioned existence.

The eight kinds of suffering that always grasp us in samsara are:

- 1). Birth,
- 2). age
- 3). sickness
- 4). death
- 5). meeting with hostile enemies
- 6). being separated from dear intimates
- 7). not getting what one wants
- 8). sufferings intimately associated with the five skandhas.

In the suffering of suffering, one misery is heaped on another. It is like our father dying, and then our mother dies too.

In The suffering of change, as much as one's present pleasure is the suffering it emanates. This is like a house falling apart when someone has not been careful about the site, or poison mixed with food.

The suffering of conditioned existence is like having eaten poison. Though our food, clothing and activities are not directly harmed, they are involved in the subsequent sickness; or from one's senses being injured, later injuries follow on that. The *Dulwa Lung*⁹⁰ says:

The misery of samsara
Arises from the skandhas.
There are the three sufferings
Of suffering, change, and conditions.
From the eight varieties,
People suffer terribly.

The suffering of birth is predominantly before birth occurs. Thus wandering in the intermediate state between lives, spirits who come near and enter, as they grasp existence in the mother's womb:

Prana mind and bindu of ignorant consciousness.
Gather as oval and oblong, and then a solid lump,
Then we are like a disk, then like a fish and tortoise,
In seven weeks a body is gradually engendered.

When the mother is tired, hungry or thirsty, hot or cold,
Even a little bit, we suffer immeasurably.
Dark and close, it is fearful with an unpleasant stench.

We must suffer unbearable suffering of restriction.

After seven weeks, for twenty-six following
The deceptions of the senses and limbs are being established.
For a total period of thirty-six weeks,
The bodily embryo grows and gains the power to move.

Then soon to be extruded between the girdle of bones,
By our karmic energy we are turned head downward.
There is greater pain than dying, like the Crushing and Joining Hell.

After birth, being touched is like being skinned alive.
Being washed is like our flesh being scraped away with razors.

From the intercourse of the father and mother there is a mixing of the essence of the red and white bindus, which constitutes consciousness. In the first week, the embryo has the shape of a fluid oval like mercury. In the second, there is an oblong shape like mucus⁹¹. In the third there is a lump shaped like a finger. In the fourth there is a hard lump like an egg. In the fifth, there is a disk like a lotus petal. In the sixth, it is like the fish as which Vishnu incarnated. The seventh is like a tortoise. For example, the head, feet, and hands are very non-prominent like those of a tortoise.

Then for twenty-six weeks, the limbs of the body, the fingers, the eyes and other senses and their supporting structures, the hair of the head and body, the heart and veins on the inside, the prana and dhatu essences, blood and lymph, masculine and feminine organs, and so forth develop along with the ayatanas.

During the thirty-sixth week, in the body that has developed, there is the downward moving power of consuming food and drink, and produced by the fetus's eating and drinking, there is occasional movement and restless thoughts and the body becomes uncomfortable. During these stages, the fetus dwells in darkness. It seems close and disgusting. There is the suffering of being restricted, and if the mother's belly is too well satisfied, it thinks it is being squashed by mountains and oceans. If she is tired and strongly agitated, there is suffering like being thrown over a cliff.

Young boys, remain with their faces looking inward from the mother's right side, covered by their two palms. Girls stay looking outward from the left. Then by the wind of karma their heads turn upside down. Having been extruded through the pelvic girdle, at birth they suffer as much as those in the Hell of Crushing and Joining. As soon as they are touched, it is as if their skin was being taken off. When they are washed, they suffer immeasurably, as if their flesh were being cut off with razors. The sufferings of growing, can be briefly seen from those of entering the womb. Of these the Letter to Students says:

Confined, accumulating unbearable unwholesome stench,
Enclosed in unmitigated darkness and narrowness.
Having dwelled in the Hell-like place that is the womb,
The body, completely restricted, must suffer great suffering.

Gradually ground like sesame oil, how will it be born?
But in the sutras it says its life will not be lost.
Indeed its condition is highly fit for suffering.
Living in filth, by looking about it is badly harmed.

By the damp womb it is fettered, in unbearable fearful stench.
The pain of development is as bad as being destroyed.
Like coming on something disgusting, former memory is lost.

2) The suffering of old age

Then in stages:

The suffering of age is very hard to bear.
After youth decays, there will be no more pleasures.
We cannot get up and down without the help of assistants.
As bodily heat is impaired, our food is hard to digest.

Our strength is failing and we begin to tremble,
So that it is difficult either to go or stay.
Our joints decay. We cannot get where we want to go.
The senses fail. The eyes are dim and cannot see
We cannot hear sounds or voices any longer.
There are no sensations of smell and taste and touch.
Memory is not clear. We sink in an ignorant sleep.
Perception of things is failing, so there are few qualities.
Delicious food and such appear as the opposite.
As life is failing, thoughts are disturbed by the fear of death.
Like a child's, our patience and span of attention are small.
We are quickly gone, like a lamp whose oil is spent.

By the slipping away of youth, the strength of the body deteriorates. The joints disintegrate. Food does not nourish. The senses cloud. The eyes are fuzzy. The ears become increasingly deaf. The tongue stammers. Memory is lost. Objects and food that were previously delightful are no longer pleasurable. To the dimming sense organs of the tongue food and drink, do not taste like they did when we were young. We are afraid of death. Like a child again, we have little patience. There are such immeasurable sufferings. The Letter to Students says:

Then for all persons, age,
The hand of the Lord of Death,
After it has grasped us
With no chance of letting go,

Our hair turns gray and white,
All our collection of teeth
As if for a joke are taken.

Our joints all come apart.
Our minds become impaired.
Our situation becomes
As bad as being in Hell.

3) As for the suffering of sickness:

The suffering of sickness is very hard to bear.
The bodily nature changes, and mind becomes unhappy.
Our enjoyment of things no longer give us pleasure.
There is increasing fear that we will lose our lives.
We wail a lament about this unbearable suffering.

When we are afflicted with sickness our minds are distressed and no joy arises. Perception is interfered with, and we are irritated. We must die, or sometimes we just think it would be better if we did. We want to die, but at the same time the torment of dying rivals Hell. The Commentary on the Praise of the Hundred Actions says:

As for embodied beings
Tormented by sickness,
It feels like being in Hell.
Rising higher and higher,
Such is the misery
Of suffering in samsara.

4) The suffering of death

When one's time is exhausted, or even if it is not really exhausted, but one throws it away:

The suffering of dying is even greater than this.
There is our last meal and our last words are spoken.

For the last time we get dressed. We go to our final sleep.
Body and life, attendants and servants are left behind.
Friends and relations, wealth and enjoyment, are left behind.
We cannot stay, but still we fear to go alone.

For the last time we lie down, rest, talk, eat, get dressed, and come to the last appearances of this life. Attendants and enjoyments are left behind. We have no power to keep living, and leave alone and companionless. Having thought about how we will do it, with an unhappy heart, with a strong feeling that one's essence is being destroyed, life ceases. We experience wandering in the bardo. Without refuge or protector, our skandhas are lifted on a litter. We are taken to the charnel ground. We are eaten by jackals and so forth. Our assembled intimates suffer immeasurably. The Letter to Students says:

How is it going to be?
This fearful Lord of Death
Walking at my head,
Whether oppressed or doubtful,
The pain will seem like vajra.

Those who harm the mind,
After having oppressed it
Relations and the household
With tears streaming down their faces
We see their pain like vajra.

That having infiltrated
Into our deepest nature
Is most unbearable like entering murky darkness.

This body we guarded so zealously
And all its accustomed pleasures
Will be completely lost.

Firmly bound at the feet
Of the terrible Lord of Death
Our head tuft is pulled out,
Our fate will be determined.

As we are taken by him,
By the roar of those nearby
One's many screams and cries
Are never heard at all.

Between water hard to cross and piled heaps of boulders,
Pricked by sharp piercing thorns,
Those on this frightful path,
Bound by the noose of time,
By the things of the Lord of Death
They are fiercely driven with sticks
And herded like animals.

5) The suffering of meeting with enemies:

By the suffering of meeting people we dislike
We are oppressed by fear of the danger of being unpleasantly harmed.
If we meet with hostile enemies, we will no longer be able to have our bodies, lives, and enjoyments.

6) The suffering of being separated from those dear to us:

To separate from people and the country that we love
Causes sorrow, lamentation, and unhappiness.
Remembering their qualities, we are tormented by longing.

If we are separated from our dear friends and relatives who are kind to us, remembering their qualities, our minds are tormented with suffering.

7) The suffering of deprivation.

As for the suffering of being deprived of desirables:

In the suffering of being deprived of what we want
A tormented mind arises when we do not succeed.
We are worn out by poverty, like hungry and thirsty pretas.

If we do not succeed in our goals, our minds are unhappy. When we are deprived of possessions or of something desirable, we are tormented by unhappiness.

8) The suffering of defilement:

Form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness
Which comprise the five perpetuating⁹² skandhas,
Because of defilement are the ground of all suffering.
They have been said to be its source, support, and vessel.

The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, because the closely connected skandhas are defiled, they are the place of all suffering. They are the support of all suffering. They are the vessel of all suffering. They are the source of all suffering. Moreover, since form manifests the harm of suffering, it is its place. Since feeling takes on suffering, it is its vessel. Since perception is the first gate to being disturbed by conceptualization, it is its support. Since the doer and understander arise among formations and consciousness, they are its source.

These are so explained in the Great Commentary on the Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines.

9) The Instruction of exertion in the means of liberation from this.

Now there is the instruction on eliminating unhappiness:

Thus within the limits of this human world,
With suffering as cause and effect, there is no happiness.
To be liberated from this, think of the excellent Dharma.
That offers the means of liberation from samsara.

As for the path, by the action of the cause of suffering, unhappiness, there is subsequent suffering. Sometimes, by the fruition of former actions, there will be suffering. We should be liberated from that.

e. The suffering of the asuras,

1) How they are unhappy:

a) The way of their unhappiness:

Asuras likewise are without a chance of happiness.
Through hatred they have senseless quarrels, disputes, and wars.

Through envy they cannot bear the splendor of the gods.
Their warlike perspective supports many hundreds of sufferings.

They fight and quarrel even with their own kind. Having seen the happiness and wealth of the thirty three gods, they are tormented with fires of hatred and jealousy. Sometimes, in the wars which they fight with the gods, their heads and limbs are cut off. They are injured by vajras, arrows, wheels, and so forth, and sometimes die, or suffer from fear of dying. The Spiritual Letter says:

Since by their nature asuras
Hate the splendor of the gods,
Their minds all suffer greatly
Though they are knowledgeable, by the obscurations of beings,
They do not see things truly.

As for this explanation that they do not see truly, their seeing is like that of the path of seeing of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, but not like that of the mahayana. The Edifice of the Three jewels says:

If one explains an account of the dharmas of those lives, the gods, nagas, asuras, and sky soarers of the animal realm, the kinnaras, and the big bellied hungry ghosts beyond number with respect to dharma do not have even a particle of the dharma eye, nor do they attain spotlessness.

Therefore, the way of their vehicles should be realized.

b) The instruction to be diligent in practicing Dharma:

Therefore, those who are going to happiness and peace
Should quickly practice the Dharma, that leads to liberation.

f. The suffering of the gods

There are four sections

1) the suffering produced by death and transmigration.

Thus in the heavenly realms:

Also the gods of the realm of desire have endless suffering.
Drunk with desire, they are careless. They fall in the changes of death.
Their flowers wither, their thrones no longer give them pleasure.
Abandoned by their friends, they dread their coming state.
For a week these gods will have unbearable emotions,

The victorious Four Great Kings and the Thirty-three, and the Twin Gods, and the Ganden gods and the Thulga gods and Shenthrol Wangje appear to be happy. But even this happiness does not go beyond the suffering of change and the suffering of conditions. At the time of their deaths, the color of their bodies becomes unpleasant. Their thrones do not please them. The flowers wreathing their brows wither. Their clothes smell bad. A pain they have never experienced before arises. They are troubled by the perception that they will leave their divine companions and be alone. With the divine eye, they see the place where they will be born, they are terrified. When they faint away, from far away the gods who are their father and mother or intimates call their names, saying, "May you be born among human beings in Jambuling. There having practiced the ten virtues, once again may you be born here in the god realm." Having said that and scattered flowers, they depart. The day of such gods is a week. The Spiritual Letter says:

In the celestial realms, as they are very happy,
The suffering of death and transmigration is therefore great.
Having contemplated that, superior ones
Do not crave for celestial realms that will be exhausted.

Their color of their bodies becomes unpleasant to see.
Their thrones no longer please them. Their wreaths of flowers wither.
Their clothes smell bad; and irresistibly in their bodies,
Arises a dread that they have never felt before.

These are the five presages of being summoned by death
And their transmigration from the celestial realm.
That arise for gods within the realm of the gods.

As with men on the earth who are going to die
There are those who are summoned to view their deaths.

2) The associated suffering of their subsequent samsaric birth

The samadhi gods of such realms of form, as the realms of Bhram_, Exhausting their former karma, fall down into samsara.
They suffer the suffering of having foreseen this change.
They see how their karma of formless shamatha will be exhausted.
They suffer anticipating their subsequent state of samsara.
Though they have gone to heaven, they cannot rely on it.
Therefore, fortunate ones should gain enlightenment.

During their great fruition in the Bhram_ realms, the samadhi-gods have natural bliss. But they too die, and this is transformed. they suffer over entering into their subsequent births. Nagarjuna says:

Those with self-existing samadhi like the Bhram_ realms,
Though they have the brilliance of limitless light and color,
Since they have not seen their latent ego-conceptions,
After they die, they cannot help being born in Hell.

Those gods who remain one-pointedly in formless shamatha, also die and transmigrate, and then with formations of suffering on seeing their subsequent samsaric birth, they must be reborn. The Spiritual Letter says:

Since they are in such a samsaric state asuras
As well as Hell beings, animals, and hungry ghosts
Are not good births and therefore we should know these births
To be the vessels of many further kinds of harm

3) The suffering of defiled bliss:

All beings who are attached to samsaric happiness
Are tormented for their craving in a fiery pit.

Moreover, they sow the seeds of subsequent existences in the lower realms where there will be nothing but the flow of the four great currents.⁹³ The Letter to Students says:

Gathering fiery suffering in the world of destruction,
Beings who expect to be happy are manifesting pride.
They will be flung to the giant mouth of the Lord of Death.
They sow the seeds of the tree of subsequent rebirths.

4) How we should establish liberation,

There are four sections.

a) How if we do not establish it, we shall not attain liberation

We may think that we will really be protected by the Buddha from the lower realms, but here, if by ego we have done evil deeds, the fruition of the lower realms is ripening within us. As for the teaching that it is difficult to have an opportunity of being seen with compassion:

Enlightenment and the means to it depend on us.
So it has been said by the Teacher of gods and men.
It cannot be the incidental gift of others,
Just as dreams in the coma of sleep cannot be stopped.
If this could be done, samsara would already have been emptied
By the rays of compassion of the Tathagata and his children.
You yourself must gird yourself in the armor of effort.
Now is the time to ascend the path of liberation.

Being liberated from the lower realms and from samsara depends on our own efforts. This cannot be done by any amount of effort or skillful means by someone else. The vinaya says:

I, by teaching you the means of liberation
Teach you to strive for freedom depending on yourselves.

That is the right idea. Attempting to let the karma of one's self-accumulated projections reverse itself, is like eliminating a dream, by going to sleep and having another dream. If that was workable, these immeasurable samsaric beings would already have been emptied previously by the light rays of compassion of the buddhas.

b) Since we have not been tamed by the buddhas in the past, if we do not make an effort now, we will not be liberated by them.

Therefore, by our own defects:

Those like us who have not practiced the remedy,
As was done by countless buddhas in the past,
Will wander on the desolate path which is samsara,
Whose nature is to be a path of evil deeds.
Think how, as before, if we do not make an effort,
We will produce the sufferings existing within the six realms.

The Bodhicaryavatara says: 4.13-14

For the sake of benefitting sentient beings
There have been countless buddhas, teaching in the past;
Though this is so, simply because of my own defects,
I have not been the object of their curative actions.

If now again I act in such a way as that,
Having acted again and again in just that way,
How will I be worthy of their consideration?

c) The instruction that compassion will not enter into bad karma:

The sufferings of samsara are as limitless as the sky.
As unbearable as fire, and as various as all objects.
Our lack of care for ourselves is really such a shame.
How can we have a chance to enter into compassion.
The wise and skillful deeds of buddha activity
Are said to depend on the karma of those who are to be tamed.
Therefore having come to recognize our faults,
Mindful in our hearts of the suffering of samsara,
So that we and beings may be liberated from samsara,
Let us truly embark upon the path of peace.

The sufferings of samsara are as limitless as space and cannot be encompassed by thought. They are a mass of fire difficult to endure. Since their existence is not reasonable, enduring the variety of seeming net of red and white apparent external objects is not right. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 4.29

This is an inappropriate and shameful object of patience.

Since such patience is truly shameless. Not seeing the rays of the sun of the Buddha's compassion, we are like people in the darkness under the earth who have no chance to enter into sunlight. Just as the darkness under the earth has its own impure manner of existence, unassociated with conditions that produce light, within the murky darkness of one's own being, it is difficult for compassion to have an opportunity. The compassion of the Victorious One also appears only in accord with the merit and good fortune of those who are to be tamed, The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Just as, even if the disk of the moon arises,
When there is no vessel, it will not shine there,
Also the ever-shining moon of the Buddha's compassion
Will not shine where there is no vessel of good fortune.

Since this is so, it is right to exert ourselves in the means of true liberation.

d) How, even though suffering has been explained, we are not saddened

Suitability for that is like this:

If our suffering now is hardly bearable,
How will we bear the pain that is truly unbearable.
If we are not even a little sorry when this is explained,
Our hearts must be great lumps, composed of the hardest iron.
Our minds must surely be as thoughtless as a stone.

Shantideva says: ???

If even the amount of suffering I have now
Is irresistible and more than I can bear,
What about the sufferings of sentient beings in Hell?
How will I be able to bear such pain as theirs?

Think about that, and don't just say "Well it isn't my fault!" The Basket-like Talk says:

We hear of samsaric suffering, and yet we are not sad.
We who are like that are certainly very foolish.
As if we were made of stone or a piece of solid iron.
We clearly show ourselves to be just mindless fools.

C. It is right to contemplate the sufferings of samsara.

For that reason:

Samsara is a valley of unbearable suffering.
Knowing mind as the source of many different kleshas,
Kleshas and sub-kleshas, and those that are universal,
Who would want this state of samsara to increase further?
So let us quickly be victorious over samsara.

The nature of samsara is suffering. The fruition of suffering is the five skandhas. These are the six causes. The five root kleshas and the twenty lesser kleshas are all included in the truth that all is suffering. The nature of this great source of many illnesses and harms should properly make us sad.

D. the dedication of merit of the situation

Now the merit of proclaiming the nature of these in song is dedicated as a cause of benefitting sentient beings:

Therefore, by this dharma feast, the source of happiness,
May as many beings as dwell in the three habitations
Be able to nourish themselves on joy and happiness,
Wearied by all the various kinds of suffering,
Today may the nature of mind, be able to come to rest.

That is the aspiration. And by the auspiciously-caused merit of this wreath of genuine words and meanings, may all the beings here in the three worlds of beginningless samsara, impoverished and exhausted in the Dharma of accumulation of merit, be enriched by the true wealth of the noble ones, so that their weariness be eased.

May those tormented by masses of fire in Hell and so forth
Be cooled by a lake of celestial water gently falling.
Wreathed in a circlet of jewels, their faces adorned in light,
Having gone to the higher realms, may they reach enlightenment.

Thus may hungry ghosts, animals, and asuras,
Human beings and gods, becoming of equal fortune,
Having attained the joy of the celestial realms,
Attain the enlightened peace, where not even an atom exists.

Awakening from the pure view of good dharmas of meditation.
And also the absorptions of the four formless attainments,
By having completely perfected themselves in merit and wisdom
May they attain a state like that of lord Amithaba.

By this true and virtuous intention which is mine
May all samsaric beings be led to total peace,
Striving day and night, may they perfect the two benefits.
May they attain the limitless major and minor marks.

IV This is the commentary on the fourth chapter of the GREAT PERFECTION, THE NATURE OF MIND, THE EASER OF WEARINESS, "Karma, Cause, and Effect."

The fourth chapter, "Karma, Cause, and Effect," has four parts:

- A. The brief teaching of the essence,
- B. The extensive explanation of the nature,
- C. The final summary,
- D. The dedication of merit.

- A. The brief teaching of the essence.

Why do these lives of wandering in the sufferings of samsara, each with its own appearances of joy and sorrow appear? They occur because of karma:

Thus, samsara's heights and depths of pleasure and pain
Arise from former accumulations of our karma.
That is how it has been taught by the Sage, the Buddha.

From the different conditions of beings, different fruitions of their associated karma exist. Many kinds of connection with their happiness and sorrow ripen. The Hundred Actions says:

E ma ho! Karma comes from the world.
Joy and sorrow are a painting produced by karma.
The assembly of conditions arises karmically.
Happiness and suffering are produced by karma.

Also it says:

Karmas over the time a hundred kalpas
Do not dissipate, but accumulate.
Once embodied beings have acquired them
The ripening of their fruition is assured.

The White Lotus says:

Karma, like a painter, produces everything.
Karmic patterns are choreography of a dance.

The Gathering the Accumulations of Enlightenment says:

Having as well as being without the three-fold kleshas
Are established according to merit and karma of liberation.
Because of mind, karma, and the causes of beings,
Many karmas are gathered up, and then remain like seeds.

B. The extensive explanation of the nature of karma, has two sections.

1. The establishment of the samsaric world,
2. Being connected to peace.

1. The establishment of samsara.

There are three sections

- a. The brief teaching,
- b. The extended explanation,
- c. How to eliminate it.

- a. The brief teaching

From the establishment of the samsaric world, and being connected to peace, this is the first subject:

The black and white actions that are the formations of samsara
Have the nature of the ten wholesome and unwholesome actions.

The ten unwholesome action and the ten wholesome ones that accord with merit establish samsara. What are they? The Precious Mala says:

Not cutting off life, and giving up thievery;
Leaving alone the spouses of other people;
With no talk that is frivolous, wrong and rough,
Keeping our speech both true and genuine.
Without the attitudes of desire and anger,
Having completely abandoned the view of ego,
These ten actions are the white karmic path.
The opposites are the path of unwholesome blackness.

These unwholesome actions produce suffering and the lower realms. By the wholesome ones, we attain happiness and the higher realms. The Objects of Mindfulness says:

By unwholesome ones we gain suffering and the lower realms,
By wholesome ones there is happiness and the higher realms.

The Sutra on Production of Karmic Phenomena says:

The Householder Toutaputra, the bhramin's son, asked, Kye Gautama, by what cause and conditions are sentient beings short or tall, have many illnesses or few illnesses, have a pleasant or unpleasant color, great or small powers, exalted or low caste, great or small activities, and great or small prajna?

The Buddha spoke saying, "O Bhramin's son, sentient beings are as they are because of karma. Their karmic roles are performed. They have their karmic birth-places. They depend on karma. Low, high, and middle, exalted, degraded, bad, and good ones develop. The karma of sentient beings is various. Their views are various. Their actions are various. By black karma sentient beings are born among hell beings, pretas, or animals. By white karma they are born among gods and human beings.

b. The extended explanation,

There are three parts

- 1) The support,
- 2) The supported,
- 3) The fruition.

- 1) The support

There are ten sections,

- a) The explanation of alaya and consciousness,

The supporting ground of these is the neutral alaya.
As if on the surface of a mirror without reflections,
Luminous awareness, without conceptual⁹⁴ objects,
Produces a ground for such reflections to arise,
It is like the luminous clarity of a mirror.
From that comes the consciousness of the five sense faculties.
As the five senses fixate their objects, such as form,
In its own nature this is not conceptual;
Rather they are like reflections in a mirror.
After that occurs, there rise the awarenesses
Of the divided objects of grasping and fixation.
Within successive moments, as these are fixated or not,
There may be conceptualization, or there may not.
The former is klesha-mind, and mental consciousness.

Karma and all the resulting appearance of phenomena depend on what is within alaya as its seeds. The Sutra of the Immaculate Wisdom of Manjushri says:

Alaya is the ground of everything,
The ground of both samsara and nirvana,
And all the appearances of phenomena.

The suchness of space is called the neutral alaya. The ground of all that is divided it is completely neutral and undistinguished.

On top of this, or within it, connected to and supporting the spontaneously present, primordially uncompounded nature of insight is the alaya of reality. This is made into a ground by ignorance.

The support of the dharmas of samsara, the collections of the eight consciousnesses, with their habitual patterns, is called the alaya of the various habitual patterns. Within this are supported all things of the compounded nature of good and evil, arising as various joys and sorrows. Here all causes and fruitions in accord with merit and all goodness according with liberation are also supported. These are naturally supported by the fruition free from defilement.

As for the extended explanation of these, on top of the neutral alaya are lower wholesome and unwholesome samsaric causes and effects; the aspects according with liberation, the separable cause of nirvana; and the karma of phenomenal appearances.⁹⁵ As many as are perceived are supported.

Wholesome things according with liberation, included in the true path are incidental and compounded. Therefore, they are supported as separable causes within the alaya of various habitual patterns. They are supported on the gotra as fruitions of separation. Such a fruition is dependent in something like the way that the revealed sun depends on the sun behind obscuring clouds which is yet to be revealed. The Uttaratantra says:

Earth is in water, water in wind,⁹⁶ and wind in space.
But space is not in the dhatus of wind and water and earth.
Thus the skandhas and dhatus,⁹⁷ and the powers of sense,
Are supported in existence by karma and the kleshas.

Karma and the kleshas are not as they should be.
They always exist in the form of mental artifacts.
As for these mental artifacts that are not proper entities,
They exist completely in the purity of mind.
But the true nature of the mind does not exist in these.

In this case we speak of:

- 1). The ground of separation
- 2). The cause of separation
- 3). The fruition of separation
- 4). The separated.

The ground of separation is the element or essence. The cause of separation, eliminating defilements superimposed on that, is the aspect in accord with liberation, possessed by the wholesome path. The fruition of separation is that when sugatagarbha has been freed from all defilements, the buddha qualities manifest.

The separated is the eight consciousnesses, with their various habitual patterns, which depend on the alaya of the various habitual patterns.

These, according to secret mantra, are known as the basis, producer, and fruition of purification and that which is to be purified. The words are different, but the meaning is the same. Within that state, without dependence, is the nature of ignorance, the alaya of the various habitual patterns. It is the cause of impure samsara and its consciousness. That compounded wholesome entities are associated with the level joined to liberation has been taught for a long time. The alaya of reality is associated with the buddha qualities of nirvana, which depend on it. These arise because of the essence, emptiness; the nature, luminosity; and all pervading compassion. The jewel-like qualities of the alaya of reality, neither defiled nor free from defilement, are spontaneously present as realization of the primordially luminous kayas and wisdoms.

THE NATURAL STATE.

The natural state is natural, complete purity, like space. Though described by the names markless, emptiness, completely uncompounded, and so forth, it is not nihilistic empty nothingness; rather, it is realization of spontaneous presence, the luminosity of the kayas and wisdoms. It is empty in the sense of being completely liberated from all dharmas of samsara. The Continuous Display of Beauty says:

The disk of the moon immaculate and pure,
Always undefiled, is completely full.
By the power of time within this world,
The moon is thought to wax and wane in phases.

Likewise, the alaya of reality
Always is or possesses sugatagarbha.
Alaya here is another word for the essence
As it was taught by the tathagatas.

For individuals who do not understand this
Alaya, by the power of habitual patterns,
Is seen as various karmic joys and sorrows,
The Universal affliction of the kleshas.

With a nature pure and undefiled,
With qualities like a wish-fulfilling gem,
Without transmigration, and without change,
It is the perfect awareness of liberation.

Maitreya says:

There is nothing to be illumined,
There is nothing to be improved.
The real looks at the real.

In accountable names, this is called the associated alaya of reality, the beginningless goodness of the element of dharmas, sugatagarbha, the dhatu, the luminous nature of mind, dharmadhatu, the suchness of the natural state, the natural purity of suchness, the perfection of prajna, the supporting ground, the source of arising, and the producer of the cause of separation. However, what is being named cannot be truly encompassed by thought.

In addition to the nature of mind there is the support of habitual patterns of samsara, called the alaya of the various habitual patterns. What is it like? It is primordially without the karmic natures of wholesome and unwholesome, liberation and apparent phenomena. That is because it is the support and producer of all such incidental productions. Since the arising of both good and evil depends on it, and because its essence is ignorance, it is neutral.

Some say that ignorance rather than the alaya of the various habitual patterns is the support and producer of the five poisons and phenomenal arising. That is just a change of labels. Why? Though it is not the same as the ignorance that discriminates the five poisons, co-emergent ignorance at the time of first being confused by samsara is also called ignorance.

The support and producer of phenomenal appearance should be examined further. It is not the support and producer of the wisdom of buddhahood, possessing the two purities, primordial purity and purity from incidental defilements. That kind of alaya must remain unchanged. The Holy Golden Light says:

The alaya that remains, is dharmakaya, the essence.

The Tantra on Exhausting the Basis of the Elements says:

The pure alaya is the same as dharmadhatu.

Pure alaya is not the cause of the dhatu separate from defilement, and they are not related as support and supported. It does not produce compounded merit and actions of meditation on the path of the accumulation of wisdom, except in the sense of being the support of their phenomenal appearance. Since these are included in the true path, though classified as deceptive and impermanent, it is therefore accepted that they are dependent on the alaya of various habitual patterns. If so, how is it reasonable that it also destroys such things?

This has been said, but it really is like that. It is like a lamp dependent on a wick or a fire dependent on fuel burning until they burn themselves out. Though they depend on alaya, habitual patterns of samsara are self-purified by the path of the two accumulations. In that way defilements of the gotra, or of dharmadhatu, are purified. Then the phenomenal exists as it did at first, as the manifested luminosity of enlightenment. What produces this manifestation is called the condition of purification. Subsequently the antidotes that produce purification destroy even themselves. This is because they are good false conceptions imputed by mind. The commentary on the Uttaratantra says:

The beginning⁹⁸ of the manifestation of enlightenment occurs because all truths of the path are eliminated.

The Madhyamakavatara says:

By burning all the dry kindling of every knowable object
There is the dharmakaya of the victorious ones.

If so, what about the kind of emptiness that throws nothing away or the thirty seven factors of enlightenment?

Things are gathered into the level of buddhahood without being thrown away, and there are the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment; but neither of these are included in the path, since at that point the path is over.

The list of names of the great darkness is co-emergent ignorance, the alaya of the various habitual patterns, obscuration without beginning or end, primordially existing unawareness and so forth.

The nature of mind like the sky, besides existing as the beginningless space of the dhatu, depending on liberation is yogic union, and depending on samsara is the various habitual patterns. These are the joys and sorrows of the different appearances of samsara and nirvana and the arising of their faults and virtues. The commentary to the Uttaratantra says:

The dhatu of time without beginning and end
Is the true state of all the various dharmas.
Since this exists, all beings are in nirvana.

THE DIVISIONS OF ALAYA AND THE EIGHT CONSCIOUSNESSES.

The neutral alaya of the various habitual patterns is like a mirror.
The alaya-consciousness, is like the luminous clarity of the mirror.
The consciousnesses of the five gates are like reflections in the mirror.

The mental consciousness is the process of analyzing former objects of these or saying, "These are the apparent objects of the five gates," when these first arise.

Klesha-mind occurs after that, when desire, hatred or indifference arise simultaneously with experience. If there is no such appraisal by klesha-mind, there is no formation of any of the three poisons, and no karma is accumulated by the six sense-awarenesses. This is how the former teachers say it should be analyzed.

When the nature of all dharmas is known, the situation of the view, meditation, and action, is like that. Ignorant beings who make biased assertions about such a mind accumulate bad karma.

Thus, the gate of accumulating karma is the mental sense and the five senses along with their supports. The actual accumulator is mind possessing the kleshas and wishing for goodness, and the one who knows such a mind. When these are collected, they are collected on top of alaya. The developer, proliferator and collector, diminisher and so forth, is alayavijnana. Master Lodrö Tenpa in his great commentary on the Mahayanasutralankara says:

The mind-sense and the five senses, the eye and so forth, are the gates of karma, and supports of its entering. The mind that thinks of good, bad, and indifferent is the producer. The six objects, form and so forth, are what is produced. Alayavijnana is the developer. Alaya is their support and place, like a house.

Alayavijnana is clear and vivid awareness with no fixation of grasper and grasped. Proliferating from that are the awarenesses of the five senses.

The eye consciousness has insight of form. It does not arise conceptually, but as consciousness. Similarly the ears hear, the nose smells, the tongue tastes, and things that the body can touch are sensed. They do not arise conceptually, but as consciousness. The apparent objects that seem to arise as likenesses in the five gates are dharmas. They are also the mind consciousness and the dharmas of the object aspect. These phenomena, arising as apprehensions,⁹⁹ are known as consciousness. The same text says:

As for mind-consciousness, traces like former objects arise, or inferences of non-manifest objects, but these too are objects of consciousness. Also the awarenesses of the five gates and alayavijnana, as soon as they have ceased, as former objects or phenomena of the individual six awarenesses, are also mental.

The Abhidharmakosha says:

As soon as the six have ceased,

Their consciousness becomes mind.

When there is apparent form, the vivid, luminous object without a grasper is alayavijnana. The arising awareness that apprehends a form-phenomena is the eye-consciousness. When presentation of both has ceased, the instantly arising aspect that thinks and makes the imputation, "this is form," is mind or concept mind.¹⁰⁰ Moreover, entering that same instant, labeling that non-conceptuality quickly and precisely as non-conceptual, the object first intuited is labeled in "grasping conception."¹⁰¹ Detailed analysis that arises after that is "fixating conception."¹⁰² If there is not this continuation of the apprehension of mind at the first instant, karma does not accumulate. So it is maintained by all the lords of yoga. The Doha of the Peak of Knowing says:

The consciousness of the objects of the six senses,
Is not defiled by simply being grasped.
Without karma, it is also without its ripening.
It is seen without defilement, like space.

b. How consciousness accumulates karma

Now, as for how these consciousnesses accumulate karma:

By the coarsened vice and virtue of conceptual desire
Alaya supports the seeds¹⁰³ of constructing what is desired.
Luminous non-thought is reconstructed as form.
Depending on these seeds there is one-pointed, formless non-thought.
The removable two obscurations, the nature of samsara,
Are an essential part of their environment.

From the false conceptions of the coarse grasping and fixation of mind, one falls into the good and bad karma of the desire realm.

If the natural state is not attained in samadhi, meditation in which conceptualization of apparent objects as appearances does not arise, karma collects on top of alaya in the realm of form.

By meditating in complete non-thought, in the sense of blocking apparent objects, seeds of being born in formlessness are heaped up in alaya. The chapter on "ultimate samadhi" of the Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Whoever is afflicted by desire¹⁰⁴ produced by discursive thoughts, in turn produced by formations of good, bad, and indifferent, falls into the desire realm.

Whoever within this kind of mind has complete non-thought that does not discard objects, produces one-pointed yogic union. Separate from the essence of Dharma, this is conditioned formation of the form realm. Whoever is within neither form or desire, not seeing the tracks of mind's objects, and becoming accustomed to this by looking at it a great deal, whirls in the formless realm.

These will never be liberated from these three realms of samsara. Therefore, hearing with true hearing, one should earnestly meditate on that which should be meditated on.

c) The occasion of awareness

Now the occasion of awareness is taught:

When awareness is undistracted, being without all thoughts,
One pointed without the grasping of apparent objects,
That is the time of apprehending the neutral alaya.
When there is no fixation of luminous appearance,
That is the motionless, clear, and luminous alaya-consciousness.
When the five objects are grasped and fixated, affirmed and denied,
And objects are coarsely conceived in the seven consciousnesses,
That is what is called the seven consciousnesses.

Unwavering one-pointedness without any thoughts at all is alaya. When apparent objects are lucidly seen, with still attention and without any thoughts at all, this is alayavijnana. Then, when phenomenal objects arise clearly and distinctly this is awareness of the five gates. When any object that arises is grasped at the first instant, and then is adulterated by kleshas produced by secondary apprehensions, this fixated arising is klesha mind and the mental consciousness. Those are the seven consciousnesses. The Level of the Awakening of Bodhicitta says:

Non-thought unconnected to objects is the occasion of alaya. Non-thought connected to objects is the occasion of alayavijnana. Individual apprehension of phenomenal objects is the five gates. With subsequent analysis of the first conception of objects as for grasping and fixation arising, this is mind-consciousness and the occasion of klesha-mind.¹⁰⁵

d) Knowing the occasions:

When becoming familiar with these, in the three realms of samsara,
There is formation of the three gates and of suffering.

Knowledge of alaya unconnected with the path of liberation is the stable samadhi of one-pointed resting, and the stable conceptionless luminosity of vipashyana. Subsequent arising of objects, with the predominant condition of the six senses, in their accumulated coarse awareness of good and evil are the formless, form, and desire realms. The reason is that liberation is not accomplished, and grasping and fixation are not transcended. Also, grasping this samadhi of non-thought, and resting in it one pointedly without distraction involves fixation.

Pure dhyana is meditation in the style of skillful means, the great compassion, and prajna without phenomenal complexities of subject and object¹⁰⁶ that does not abide in the two extremes. The state described, with no one-sided nihilistic meditation, is connected with the natural state incomprehensible by thought, and the happiness and bliss attained with it. Though miracles and higher perceptions are attained, there is no haughty delight and pride in them and no fixation of marks.

Since one has to come out again from nihilistic meditation, it does not go beyond samsara. It is obvious that today's meditation has strayed into the common-path meditation of the extremists etc. Nor is it seen to have the intrinsic buddha qualities.

e) What predominates in the three chief realms

As for these consciousnesses in their own place and as chief factors of other places, and contemplating the ways of samsara:

In the realm of desire the seven consciousnesses dominate.
In the realm of pure form it is the alaya-consciousness.
In the formless realm there is only the non-thought of alaya.
The other two samsaric styles are merely latent.
Each of the levels should be known like that.

In his commentary examining alaya and wisdom, Loppön Sanje Sangwa says:

Within the desire realm, the seven consciousnesses, the eye-consciousness and so forth are the principal ones, and the others exist as their retinue. In the realm of form, the alayavijnana, and object-engaging consciousness¹⁰⁷ are principal, and the others are their retinue. In the formless realm, alaya is the principle one. The others exist only as latencies.

f) How consciousness dissolves

Here are the extensive divisions of the subject:

Thus when we go to sleep, within the desire realm,
Awareness of the five objects by stages dissolves into mind.¹⁰⁸
This dissolves within the non-thought of alaya.
This is a one-pointed state without apparent objects.
This too dissolves in dharmadhatu, simplicity.
When it develops again, from the alaya consciousness,
There is isolated mind, known as the mind of dreaming.
What is really nothing appears. We affirm and negate its variety.

This develops further and we awake from sleep.
By entering into the objects and consciousness of the six senses,
Various karmic formations come to be engendered.
This is how things appear throughout the day and night.

When beings of the desire realm go to sleep, the awareness of the five gates of the senses and klesha mind gradually dissolve into the mental consciousness. As the mental consciousness dissolves into alayavijnana, luminous non-thought arises for a little while. Those who recognize this and rest within it course without dreaming in the luminosity of dharmata. Some teachers of the new transmission say that Alayavijnana dissolves entirely into the impermanent alaya. Alaya dissolves into dharmadhatu. On the subsiding of coarse and subtle grasping, the simplicity of empty and luminous dharmata arises and, if it is recognized, confusion is eliminated. Sangwa Yeshe says in the Compendium of the Precious Tantras says:

After the seven consciousnesses dissolve into alaya
Alaya dissolves in the purity of space.
Then there is the primordial state of co-emergence,
The natural state of wisdom, emptiness/luminosity.
That is something that every yogin ought to know.

Then these unfold from wisdom again: there is alayavijnana, and by that, from the rising of the mental consciousness alone, various dreams arise. At this time, objects of habitual mind are grasped as dharmas having their own individual nature. Also the conceptually activated pranas and the pranas in the nadis that depend on the seven consciousnesses enter into the side nadis roma and kyangma, and then the central channel. Then they are known as the consciousness that is not equalized with alaya. That is because they are united with nadi and prana and equalized with them. Then they enter into the central channel in one taste. This is the time of alaya. One goes into deep sleep without dreams. Some directly experience the characteristics of dreamlessness, and rest there. Then as for alaya dissolving into dharmadhatu, in the center of the central channel there is the supreme luminosity. The elements of the coarse nadis do not become this, and the unmoving prana has the nature of its clear light. The All-illuminator says:

The nadi that exists in the center of the central channel
Does not become supreme luminosity.
The clear space of luminosity without solidity
Is spontaneously present wisdom, the true state of everything.

The essence of prana in the central channel is said to be awareness itself. At the time of its entry there luminosity arises. At that time the bindus of apparent luminosity, radiance, rainbows, and so forth arise. Empty luminosity, mind itself free from all complexity arises. The luminosity of union, the great wisdom that experiences luminous insight arises. Then, when alaya, its consciousness and mind consciousness unfold again, within the life-nadi the mind prana that depends completely on memory proliferates. Then by the entry of prana into the nadis that support the individual senses, we wake from sleep. The objects that appear by day arise in the usual unreflective grasping and fixation. Then if an object that seems to be form is conceptually apprehended,¹⁰⁹ its individual divisions will be nothingness.

g) If one divides dharmas individually

In the level of pure form, there are the four dhyana states.
These remain within the alaya consciousness.
Though sometimes a subtle consciousness may grasp at objects,
By training in samadhi, this mostly does not occur.

At the time of the actual dhyanas, each one has its own non-thought as the principal thing. Conceptions of objects are dormant and exist as a retinue. The first second, and third dhyanas have the faults of concept, analysis, and a feeling of concentrated joy.¹¹⁰ Up to the fourth some exist there with the three bases of sentient beings, death, transmigration, and the chance to listen to the dharma.¹¹¹

h) How continuity of mind depends on the four formless skandhas of name:

Consciousness of the formless level is alaya.

In its four one pointed shamathas, those on space and the rest,
Are very subtle feelings, perceptions, formations, and consciousness,
On these four skandhas of name, depends mind's continuity.
We may not awake from one-pointed samadhi or a kalpa.
When this is examined, no virtuous seeds are planted at all.

Before death, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness dissolve into alaya. These four are known as the skandhas of name. The mental body, depending on the continuity of mind, goes into the samadhi of one-pointed shamatha, resting in the four states of limitless space, time, consciousness, and of neither perception nor non-perception. Even after an entire kalpa, like lapsing into deep sleep, no good karma will have been produced. Though no actual bad karma will have been produced either, intrinsic karmic ignorance is activated, and one's natural ignorance increases.

i) How to comprehend the mind of the four formless dhyanas:

Therefore, even this, the mind of the formless dhyanas,
Is left on exhausting the karma of which it is the fruit.
Because it is ignorance, its nature is neutral.
Because it produces repeated errors of cause and effect,
Therefore we need to be liberated from it.

The Sutra on Being Without Suffering says:

By the productive power of former collection of virtue,
Fine houses of the celestial gods are reached and relinquished.
From the formless samadhis too, when their karma is exhausted,
Again one goes with those who are on or under the earth.

j) In particular, how the three-fold awareness of the desire realm of same and different, by becoming familiar to the mind of desire, also produces the cause of liberation.

As the mind of desire becomes what it is accustomed to,
It also produces the cause of being freed from its highs and lows.

Both the coarse and celestial levels are levels of karma. In particular, since one can become a vessel of practicing the Dharma, the Objects of Mindfulness says:

In the desire realm mind becomes coarsened by planting seeds of good and bad. Therefore, in particular, we should try to work with good dharmas.

i) What consciousness predominates during the day:

By day the seven consciousnesses usually dominate.
The other two natures are then the retinue of these.
Thus the grasping of form by visual consciousness
The luminous aspect, free from thought, is alaya-consciousness.
The aspect of non-thought is alaya itself.
All the other six should be known in a similar way.

The eye seeing form is the eye-consciousness. Clear awareness of luminosity and non-thought is alayavijnana. Non-thought is alaya itself. Similarly, for sound, smell, taste, and touch, and when the mind apprehends a remembered object, the consciousnesses apprehend their respective individual objects. Luminous awareness is alayavijnana. Non-thought is alaya. When there is the motionless, vivid luminosity of alayavijnana, individual objects are not hindered, and there is also awareness of them. The luminosity is alayavijnana, and the non-thought is alaya. Also one-pointed entering and dissolving into real alaya exist as latencies, just as the stars exist as latencies when the sun rises. Here is how the Commentary Examining Mind and Wisdom explains the armor of buddhahood:

Completely non-conceptual awareness rests in alaya. Its mere clarity/luminosity is alayavijnana. Apprehension of individual objects is the six consciousnesses. Entering, dissolving, and non-thought are the situations of alaya.

ii) The way in which these are the same and different

Here is the explanation of how they are the same and different:

Sleep is one-pointed, and when we awake from out of our dreams,
Alaya, the alaya consciousness, and the mind,
And then the six senses also should be known
As successively one and two in one and all in one.

In one-pointed sleep, all awareness is one in alaya. It never fails to be outwardly re-emanated. When we dream, from within that come alayavijnana and superimposed on that, the mind consciousness arises alone. At this time of no external emanation, alaya is of one essence with the consciousness rising from it, and the mind consciousness. When we wake from sleep, there is a great deal of external emanation from within alaya, but alaya and all of the eight consciousnesses are still of one nature. As for these, the Secret Commentary says that the four elements are displayed.

Now if the meaning is summarized very clearly, luminous mind is the support or source of all that arises. Within it, samsara and nirvana are completely undivided and undifferentiated. This natural state of changeless unity is sugatagarbha, the source of samsara and nirvana. The Dohakosha says:

Solitary mind itself is the seed of all.
Whatever emanates as samsara and nirvana.
It bestows the fruition of whatever is desired.
I prostrate to mind, which is like a wish-fulfilling gem.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

To describe the special cause, from which arising occurs,
It is not without causation. It is also not without action,
Not different from appearance; not different from alaya.

If phenomenal appearances were different from it,
In that case, alaya would not be something eternal.
Unmanifested, undestroyed, and permanent,
Alaya completely excludes the four extremes
Existing as the purity of sugatagarbha,
It is said to be the emanation of wisdom.

It and the essence are mutually not different
It is like a finger, pointing to the essence.
The various levels and alaya are also sugatagarbha.
Alaya is that essence, the Sugata has taught.
Though the essence thus is known as alaya.
Those whose minds are weak have no knowledge of this.

The nature pure of causation, the kayas and wisdoms and so forth, is known as the undefiled, true alaya. When it is made into the support of samsara, it is designated as the defiled alaya of the various habitual patterns. The different kinds of supported dharmas are of one nature with the supporting ground. The *Abhisamayalankara*¹¹² says:

By particular kinds of supported dharmas
Its divisions are completely to be expressed.

That is the same approach. When there is defilement, it also exists by a different name as our enlightened family nature or essence, in itself pure of every defilement, but needing to be purified of separable stains. The above text says:

Just as in the conception of those who do not know
The moon is thought to wax to fullness and wane away.
Though actually the moon neither grows nor diminishes,
That is how it seems to people in the world.

Similarly within the alayavijnana,
Foolish, ignorant beings who do not know how things are
Think that things are always growing and diminishing.
Not thinking in this way is known as buddhahood.

Alaya as the ground of all the various dharmas,
Has habitual patterns of pride and all the rest
And so is disturbed by concepts and discursive thoughts.

If it becomes otherwise, it is undefiled.
If it ever attains its natural non-defilement,
Since this is eternal, it will always have it.

The actual moon neither waxes nor wanes; but by the power of time it appears do so. The luminous nature of mind itself is buddhahood. It does not have the characteristics of joy and sorrow. Yet samsaric beings see the celestial realms, the lower realms, and so forth. If the real nature is purified, one reaches the real alaya. That is what is being said.

That completes the explanation of the arising of alayavijnana and the eight consciousnesses from alaya. These are included within the ignorant confusion of the mind-consciousness. The Sutras say:

Mind, the chief, is very quick.
It precedes all the dharmas.

When we do not know the changeless nature, the perfectly established, there is false conception. Various kinds of impure, confused appearance arise, produced within relativity. When these dreamlike confusions of samsara are eliminated, there is the perfectly established, mind itself. By meditation on the true path of upaya and prajna in the developing and perfecting stages; the primordial ground, the essence, is made to manifest and is realized as it is. That completes the explanation of the ground, the support of karma.

2) The explanation of the supported, karma,

a) The root, ignorance:

The root of karma, dependent dharmas, is ignorance.
Its threefold essence is passion, aggression, and ignorance.
These produce the board of samsara, black and white.

Primordially luminous mind-itself, by not apprehending its own nature, propagates confusions of grasping and fixation all over the ground, so that all the sentient beings of samsara are confused. The *Prajnaparamitasamgatha*¹¹³ says:

As many sentient beings as there are, low, middle, and high,
They have arisen from ignorance. So the Sugata taught.

The lower ones are those in the lower realms. The middle ones are human beings. The higher ones are the gods. Each experiences the joys and sorrows of their own particular kind of karma. The root of this is ignorance. They all equally possess the three poisons. They all equally possess unwholesomeness. In accord with their virtues and merits, they all produce fruitions of happiness.

The section on the producer, the wholesome or virtuous, has two divisions, the ground and divisions of wholesomeness. As for the explanation of the ground: by the wholesome, happiness and the higher realms are established. By the unwholesome, suffering and the lower realms are produced.

b) The producer, unwholesomeness

As for the explanation of the unwholesome:

Since we can fall from high to low within samsara
There are the unvirtuous actions, divided into ten.
There are three of body, four of speech, and three of mind.

The ten unwholesome actions that produce falling from the higher realms into the lower ones, and nothing but suffering are as follows:

The three unwholesome actions of body

1. Cutting off life.
2. Taking what is not given.
3. Sexual transgression.

The four unwholesome actions of speech

1. Lying.
2. Divisive speech.
3. Sophistic speech.¹¹⁴
4. Harsh words.

The three unwholesome actions of mind

1. Covetice.
2. Ill-will.
3. Wrong view.

c) The divisions,

i) The actions of body:

Cutting off life is intentional killing of another
Related is endangering life through beating and such.
Taking what is not given is stealing another's goods.
Related to this is getting them by using fraud.
Transgressions in sex are with persons committed to others.
Related are dharmas like improper sexual acts.

Everything from maliciously killing worms and insects, knowingly cutting off their lives, and striking them, chopping them up, and so forth is included in cutting off life.

Taking what is not given is stealing the wealth of others, and related is using fraud to have them given.

Sexual transgression, refers to another's spouse, those who are close relatives, or not in their right minds, or deliberately having sex at an improper place or time. Included are intercourse in forbidden parts of the body, such as the hands.

The *Abhidharmakosha*¹¹⁵ says:

Cutting off life, as we rightly think, is killing others.
Taking what is not given makes another's wealth one's own;
Including acquisition of it through force or deceit.
Forbidden desires, comprise the four kinds of wrongful sex.

The commentary on the Drowa Namje says:

What is like the actual thing, is related to it. Having arisen similarly, it is like it; like beating someone with a stick and relying on magical ceremonies to that end.

ii) The four actions of speech:

Speaking false words is lying to change another's opinion.

Related is devious words that others will receive falsely.

Slander is speaking words that bring about dissention.

Related is saying one thing here, another there.

Idle talk is evil teachings and frivolous words.

Related is disconnected or fallacious speech.

Harsh language is abusive words that denigrate others.

Related is gentle words that are displeasing to others.

To make speech a gate of entering the Dharma, actions of speech are explained. To speak words that are not true to change the perceptions of others is false speech. Related to that is if one sees that another has been deceived by literally true words. Saying slanderous words that bring dissension to others is divisive speech. To say one thing to one person, and something else to another is related.

To start, spread, and listen to gossip; and to talk disconnectedly and frivolously, saying various things that contradict dharma; is idle or sophistic speech. To say something inappropriate at the time is related.

Harsh language is saying things unpleasant to the ears of others and insulting them. Related is saying things gently to make them unhappy. The Abhidharmakosha says:

False words change the perception of another person

By their understanding of their meaning of the words.

Divisive words are those that bring dissent to others,

These are the words of a mind that has the kleshas.

Rough words are those that are not pleasant when they are heard.

All that have the kleshas are words of idle talk.

The commentary says:

True words that are deceptive, to repeat such words, to speak at a time when one should not, and to speak pleasantly, but make others unhappy are the related actions.

iii) The three actions of mind:

Covetice finds another's wealth unbearable.

Therefore it makes an attempt to make it into one's own.

Related is longing for others' glories, such as learning.

Malice is the angry mind that harms another.

Related is anger that does not want their benefit.

Wrong views include eternalism and nihilism,

Or the view that says that cause and effect do not exist.

Related are errors of glorification and denigration.

Inappropriately wishing that another's belongings were one's own is covetousness. Getting angry at the learning and so forth of another and wishing it were one's own is related. Wishing to harm another is malice. Being unhappy and angry with their benefits is related. Denigrating karmic cause and effect and falling into the extremes of eternalism and nihilism are wrong views. Exaggeratedly glorifying and denigrating the true dharma, the spiritual friends who teach it, and others who are in accord with the dharma is related. The Abhidharmakosha says:

Covetice wrongly craves another's wealth

Malice is hostility to beings.

Wrong views say there is no good and evil

The commentary on the Drowa Namje says:

To be angry at learning and so forth and covet it, to be angry and displeased at others' benefits, to disparage true spiritual friends and others according with dharma are the related actions.

In this case, though it does not call denigration of the dharma and individuals a related action, the Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

Subhuti, those who accumulate the karma of depriving others of the Dharma will be born as beings of the lower realms or among those who have fallen into wrong views. They will suffer among the beings of the great hell, the Avici Hell. Having been contained in its fires for a kalpa, they will be born in the great hells of other world systems. There too, when they have been contained in fire for a kalpa, It is taught that they will go to another, and so forth beyond measure.

The Sutra of the Miracle of Ascertaining Complete Peace says:

For 500 kalpas they will have five hundred heads.
Every one of these heads with not less than five hundred tongues,
And every tongue with plows, five hundred and not less,
Of hotly blazing iron, will be repeatedly plowed,
And all because of the evil deed of denigration.

The Examination of the three Jewels says:

Kashyapa, If some individual says that I or one like me who has grasped the Dharma and grasped the measure of individual beings, has not grasped the measure of the dharma and grasped the measure of individual beings, that individual will fall.

3) the fruition,

There are three sections

a) The brief teaching of the nature.

Now the fruition of these is explained:¹¹⁶

With bad object, motive, thoughts, and their application.
As for the fruitions of the ten unwholesome actions,
There are ripening, and according with their causes, power, and action.

When these unwholesome actions are produced by an unwholesome object, motivation, thought, and application, a fruition ripens in accord with the causes and the dominant nature or power. So it is said in the great texts, and moreover, in the oral instructions, the fruition of action is explained additionally.

b) The four divisions

i) The ripening of the fruition:

The lesser fruition of the ten actions is birth as an animal.
The middle as a preta, and the great to suffer in hell.

The Objects of Mindfulness says:

Of these ripenings, the lesser is to be born as an animal. The intermediate is to be born as a preta. The great is to be born among the hell beings.

ii) Fruition according with the cause,

There are two kinds

1)) Accord with the cause of action.

According with the cause is said to be twofold.
One is born in a situation like that of one's former action.
Then there is the fruition of such a situation.

The Hundred Actions says:

Those who have become accustomed to unwholesome conduct, will again be dependent on unwholesomeness and will act unwholesomely. They will continue in their unwholesomeness.

2)) Accord with the cause of experience:

Even if such beings attain the higher realms,
Their lives are short and they will suffer from many diseases.
They will not be rich in possessions, and have to share them with enemies.
Their spouses will be ugly, and still there will be rivals.
They will be often slandered and cheated by other people.
Their servants will always be intractable and bad.
They will hear unpleasantness and quarrelsome words.
No one will heed their words; their ventures will be uncertain Desire will grow. They will not know what is enough.
Not acquiring benefits, they will be harmed by others.
Their views will be wrong, and therefore, they will be much deceived.

The ten unwholesome actions have two stages of fruition
The fruition fits the cause, then one experiences that.

The Hundred Actions says:

Those who cut off life can be among gods and humans, but their lives will be short with much sickness. Those who take what is not given will be anxious about possessions, impoverished, and have to share with enemies.

Sexual transgressors will have an unpleasant spouse shared with others. Those who speak falsely will often be slandered and cheated. Divisive people will have bad servants and retinue with whom they cannot be reconciled. Those who speak harshly will hear unpleasant and quarrelsome words. Idle talkers will not have their words heeded and trusted. The desires of covetous persons will increase, and they will never know what is enough. Malicious people will get nothing beneficial and be objects of harm. Those with wrong views will have bad views and be much deceived.

The Precious Mala says:

For those who cut off life, their own lives will be short.
By taking what is not given we are separated from wealth.
Those who engage in imprudent sex will make enemies.
Those who speak falsely thereafter will often be reviled.

By divisiveness, we will never have companions.
By harsh words, we will hear unpleasant things.
By idle talk our speech will always go unheeded
By covetice the hopes of mind will be destroyed
By malice we will be given the gift of being destroyed.

iii) the fruition of power

As for the dominant result¹¹⁷

The power of the effect ripens externally.
Here with impure dependence on the power of other,

Takers of life will live in a place that is very drab.
Medicinal herbs and trees, leaves and fruits and flowers,
Food and drink and are insipid with little potency.
Also hard to digest, they make obstacles to life.

From taking what is not given, crops will never ripen.
We are born in a fearful region of cold, with hail and famine.

Sexual transgressors are born in crowded places,
Miry swamps that are full of urine and excrement,
Nasty places of stinking filth and sticky defilement.
They are cramped and depressed in places without joy.

Liars are born in inhospitable, fearful places.
Wealth soon shifts as one is cheated by all the others.

Slanderers are blocked by impassible heights and depths,
Cliffs and ravines, and deep defiles block all progress
With a unpleasant variety of irregular surfaces.

Those who use harsh language are born among stones and thorns.
In places that are hot or otherwise unpleasant¹¹⁸

By idle talk we are born where harvests do not ripen,
Places where the flow of seasons is disrupted.
We cannot stay anywhere long, as things are so unstable.

By covetice we see meager grain and copious chaff,
Born where the better times of year are changeable.

By malice we are born in places naturally harmful
Crops and grain are pungent & bitter to the taste
There are thieves and imperious rulers, savage natives and snakes.

By wrong view we have no source of precious things.
Medicinal herbs and trees, flowers, and grain are few.
There is no refuge and we are without any friends or protection.

The resolution is as presented. The Commentary on the Center and Limit says:

By the power of being a vessel, virtue predominates

iv) The fruition of action:

Whatever people may do, there is an unhappy result.
Whatever is done, by its spreading, suffering is produced.

the Objects of Mindfulness says tersely:

Ignorant ones who do evil deeds will do them again.
Evil deeds proliferate, and there is tremendous suffering.

c. The final summary:

In short these ten actions by their nature are unwholesome.
They are like poison and anyone who ever performs them
Heavy, light, or medium, will make great suffering.

Therefore we should try to avoid them like enemies.

The instructions to the noble one Gyebu Nor¹¹⁹ in the Dulwa Lung say:

The unwholesome is like poison, because a little produces great suffering. It is like a wild man, because it destroys the assembly of wholesomeness. Therefore it should be abandoned and one should try to do what is wholesome.

The Precious Mala says:

What is unwholesome in body, speech, and mind
Should entirely be eliminated.
What is wholesome should always be pursued.
By that the above two dharmas are explained.

c. How to eliminate the unwholesome,

There are three sections

1) Producing the benefits of the higher realms:

The ten kinds of wholesome actions lead to the higher realms.
Their wholesome intention avoids the ten unwholesome ones.
Cutting off life is avoided, and taking what is not given.
Wrongful sex is avoided, and also lies and slander.
Speech is not harsh or frivolous. Thoughts are not covetous.
We keep far away from malice and wrong views.

Merely by abandoning the unwholesome actions, the ten wholesome ones will occur. This is because they are related as opposites. Therefore, the attitude that abandons the ten unwholesome actions is that of the ten wholesome ones, the Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

"I have abandoned the taking of life," and so forth. These ten are said.

2) The ripening of their fruition:

If these actions are small, we are born in the human realm.
If more, we are born among the gods of the realm of desire.
Great ones connect us to the samadhi of formless dhyanas.
Thus, we can grasp the pleasures of the two higher realms.
The four results are the opposite of the previous ones.
The fruition should be known to be birth in the higher realms.

By lesser wholesome conduct, we are born among the human beings and gods of the desire realm. If it is great, we are born in the samadhi realms. These are the two higher realms the realm of pure form, and the formless realm. The higher realms are attained, and entrance into the lower realms is cut off. The Precious Mala says:

By these dharmas we are completely liberated
From being a being in hell, a preta, or animal.
After birth among gods or else among human beings
Increasing glory and happiness is easily attained.
One experiences the bliss of Bhrama and so forth
Or the measureless samadhis of the formless realm.

3) How we should choose what to accept and reject:

Thus, by the merit of these ten wholesome actions
We are led to happiness, but the ten of unwholesome nature

Lead instead to falling into the lower realms.
Accept the white cause and effect, and likewise reject the black.
This will be the path to worldly happiness,
Taught to be the fine vehicle of divine and human birth.
By establishing subsequent lives in happy forms,
We truly lay a foundation for our liberation.
Therefore, fortunate beings should depend on doing so.

The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, by accepting the true path of these ten wholesome actions, we are born in the higher realms. By remaining on the path of the ten unwholesome actions, we are born in the lower realms.

The White Lotus of Holy Dharma says:

The vehicle of gods and human beings has the ten virtues.

The Supreme Essence says:

The vehicle of gods is the four dhyanas and the four formless attainments. The vehicle of human beings is the ten virtues. The latter depends on good dharmas.

Yana means vehicle, mount, or means of conveyance. When we ride them, each one brings us to its particular fruition. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says 304.3

Riding them does away with the sufferings of beings.
These vehicles are a great house, immeasurable as space.
The highest yana produces joy, happiness, and well-being.

Depending on different levels of mind, different vehicles are taught. For example, one is taught for those who aim at complete peace. The White Lotus says:

That one vehicle does not have the three vehicles.
It is taught as provisional skillful means.

Two are also taught. the Immaculate Space Sutra says:

In accord with the affinities of sentient beings,
I have bestowed the teachings of the two vehicles.

These are the mahayana and hinayana. Three are also taught. The White Lotus says:

Teaching how to tame the kleshas the gates of Dharma
Are said to be eighty-four thousand, but the true intent of the buddhas
Is the one inseparable essence. That I have taught three vehicles
Is explained by different capacities of sentient beings.

In brief, the levels of mind are limitless, and not all of them perceive the true meaning. The *Lankavatara*¹²⁰ Sutra says:

Not all the minds as enter finish the vehicle.
Once mind has done that, there is no mind nor vehicle.

In this case the vehicle of gods and men is being discussed. The same text says:

Likewise I explained all the different vehicles.
The vehicle of the shravakas, and that of the pratyekabuddhas.

Within the vehicle of gods and human beings
Samsaric suffering can be eliminated.
However, what comes later is not seen at all.

2. the second section of the extended explanation of karma and being joined to peace,

There are six sections

a. the general explanation of the wholesome being associated with liberation.

Now, as for the wholesome being associated with liberation, good is certainly established. If the details are explained:

The happiness of freedom puts samsara far away.
It leads to peace beyond the game of black and white,
Forming the array of the heights and depths of samsara.
Included within the five paths that lead to this liberation
Are the ten wholesome actions, and the four dhyana states of form,
The five formless dhyana attainments, the six perfections and so on.
Realizing that persons and dharmas have no self,
By the happy combination of prajna and upaya,
Dwelling neither in samsara or nirvana,
We shall produce great benefits for all sentient beings.
Attaining the limitless state of the Victorious One,
By the wholesomeness of yoga we pass beyond all worlds.

The previously taught merit completely transcends both the good and evil associated with it. As for the good which completely liberates us from defilement, the cause of being born in the cycles of samsara, the phenomenal accumulation of merit, the ten virtues, the first five paramitas, and so forth are relative. The non-phenomenal accumulation of wisdom, prajna, does not dwell in the two extremes. When, by the stages of the five paths, these are united, we apprehend the level of buddhahood beyond the world's goodness.

Worldly goodness is grasped in terms of things and characteristics. This is beyond things and characteristics. From the very time the good action is done, it is liberated from the mind of merit and non-merit. It is awareness of the empty, compassionate essence. As to the details, the Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

If they are able to carve a well-formed woman's image,
Wood-workers who are skilled can make anything else as well.
Likewise, bodhisattvas skillfully trained in prajna
Can do whatever is done by the wisdom of non-thought.

The Precious Mala says:

Whoever pacifies having knowledge and being without it,
Thereby has gone beyond both merit and evil deeds.
Liberation from the higher and lower realms,
Is what is explained as being truly liberated.

Also it says there:

Having the essence of emptiness and compassion,
One has been established in enlightenment.

With the mind of truth, in apparent goodness without entangling attachments, like emanations and illusions, we act for the benefit of others. However, if the space-like goodness established by prajna does not establish the path of liberation, this will not take place. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

If a billion blind persons with no one to lead them
Tried to get to a city, though they did not know the way,

Attaining the first five perfections of the Victorious One,
Without attaining the eye of prajna is like that.

The Essence of the Eight Instructions says:

The time when the five first paramitas are completed by the perfection of prajna is the time of entering into the city of omniscience.

Thus, since all dharmas are natureless, the good too is natureless, and in this way beginners and those of inferior mind abandon it. The Precious Mala says:

Though these dharmas are truly good and very wholesome,
With the air of being profound and subtle beings
Childish individuals who are without true learning
Will try to avoid them, so the Victorious One has said.

The Instruction on Prajna says:

Subhuti, All dharmas are without essence. The six perfections are also without essence.
Neither examined or the examiner are found. They are not perceived. They are not really seen.
That is how it should be known.

This should not be told to those of the families of those who have newly entered into the vehicle, of shravakas, and of pratyekabuddhas.

Why? They will be so fearful and terrified that their hair stands on end. By this being said, for this reason, they will abandon this perfection of prajna.

b. comprehending this: the goodness of liberation

If it is asked what is the goodness of liberation:

The accumulation of merit is involved with particular objects.
The accumulation of wisdom is not. By these combined,
Cleansed of the two obscurations, the two kayas manifest.
The stages of meditation and post-meditation are practiced.
These are corruptible in ordinary beings,
But in the noble ones they are immutable
In meditation and the state that follows it
By such a pattern of practice liberation will be attained.

The five first perfections, generosity, discipline, patience, exertion, and meditation, are the accumulation of merit. Prajna is the accumulation of wisdom. By their unification, the two kayas, dharmakaya and rupakaya will manifest. The Precious Mala says:

As for the rupakaya possessed by all the buddhas,
It arises from the accumulation of merit.
Dharmakaya is born, to give a brief summary,
From accumulating the wisdom of the conquerors.
By these two accumulations, buddhahood is attained
If this is what we want, we should always rely
On these two accumulations, those of merit and of wisdom.

The major and minor marks of the Buddha's rupakaya are established by these two accumulations in a way that is highly exalted. As much merit as ordinary beings, shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas may have, a single body hair of the buddhas has ten times more. A hundred times as much as exists in such a hair exists in the minor marks. A hundred times the amount in each of the eighty minor marks is that of one of the major marks. The merit of each of the thirty-two major marks increased by a thousand is that of the tuft between the eyebrows. A hundred thousand times the collective merit of the tuft between the eyebrows is that of the ushnisha tuft at the top of the Buddha's head. A thousand times the merit of the hair-tuft is taught to be that established by the conch of spoken dharma. The same text says:

As merit is beyond the scope of thought,
So the major marks of the Buddha rise.
The great scriptural treasury of the mahayana
Says he is a great being like a king.

All the merit of the pratyekabuddhas,
All merit in the world without remainder
That of both the learned and non-learned
If it should be increased to ten times more,
Would be as much as in one of the Buddha's pores.
The hair-pores of a Buddha are all like that.

As for all the merit of these hair-pores,
That amount increased a hundred times,
Would be the merit of one of the minor marks.
That many times that same degree of merit
Is that of each of the royal major marks.
These merits of the thirty two major marks,
If they are multiplied a thousand times,
Are those of the brow-tuft like the sun and moon.

The merits of the brow, increased by a hundred
Would not appear as much as the tuft of the head.
As much as is produced at the crown of the head,
If that were made hundred times as much,
That of the conch of dharma would still be ten times more.

Below the supreme dharma, is the defiled, worldly dharma. Above that is the world-transcending, undefiled dharma. The border is between what is corruptible and what is immutable. The wisdom of meditation is undefiled, while that of post-meditation is defiled. They are the corruptible and immutable paths. The first five paramitas, generosity and so forth, are defiled,¹²¹ and prajna is undefiled. They are corruptible and immutable goodness.

c. How the cause of liberation is produced,

If it is asked on what these goodnesses depend, and from what they are produced, the real goodness in accord with liberation, the true path, is accumulated as a cause of separation. Therefore, it depends on the alaya of the various habitual patterns. The fruition of separation attained by this cause of separation, depends on the gotra or the essence, which therefore, is the true cause of changeless liberation. That is the main point:

The gotra is the support of the goodness of liberation. In having this we have the luminous nature of mind.

Spotless dharmadhatu is the naturally present gotra.

In its apparent aspect this is the two rupakayas.

These are described by the Uttaratantra's nine examples.

This nature of compassion exists eternally.

The Sugata has said that this is the "growable" gotra:

Its root is the luminosity of insight-wisdom.

Its essence is wholesomeness, that does not have the three poisons.

This is taught as it is in final word of the true meaning sutras, the great teaching of all the buddhas. These are The Sutra of the Questions of King Dharantsvara, The Glorious Mala of the Lion's Roar Sutra, The Sutra Requested by the Girl Precious One, The Sutra Requested by the Goddess Immaculate One, The Sutra of the Dwarf Angulamala, The Noble Complete, Great Nirvana Sutra, The Sutra requested by Maitreya, The Tathagatagarbha Sutra, *The Sutra of the Wheel Curing Sickness*¹²² These say that within all sentient beings is the primordially existing dharmadhatu, the naturally pure space which is the nature of mind. This is tathagatagarbha. It exists primordially. It is changeless. Its apparent aspect is rupakaya, the source of the major and minor marks. Its aspect of emptiness is dharmakaya, free from all the extremes of complexity, primordially and spontaneously present. Its qualities, in their spontaneous presence are exemplified by a jewel; in their changelessness, by space; In moistening and pervading all sentient beings, it is exemplified by pure water. The Uttaratantra says: 21

Like a jewel, space, or pure water;
Its nature has never had the kleshas.

At the very time it is obscured by defilements, its essence is undefiled suchness. The nature of mind is primordial luminosity. The *Gyu Tongpa*¹²³ says:

Mind is not mind. The nature of mind is luminosity.

That is the dhatu of buddhahood, the gotra or enlightened family which all sentient beings possess. The Uttaratantra says: 21

Because the perfect buddha kaya radiates
Because of suchness being inseparable,
And because of possessing the dhatu every sentient being Always possesses the very essence of buddhahood.

This should be known to be the good dhatu of the Dharma. It is fundamentally enlightened from the beginning. The Expressor of Marks says:

Buddhahood is without beginning and end.
The primordial buddha is without any bias.

The Two Examinations says:

Sentient beings are buddhas, in actuality.
But they are obscured by incidental obscurations.
When these are cleared away, then they are buddhas.

Even at the time of being a sentient being, the nature of mind has the apparent buddha qualities of rupakaya and the buddha qualities of the emptiness aspect as dharmakaya; but since they are obscured by unremoved defilements, this is called the dhatu or enlightened family. At the time of buddhahood, since mind is free from all defilements, it is called enlightenment. This occurs merely by the appearance or non-appearance of the perfected power of the nature, mind itself. It is not maintained that first, at the time of being a sentient being, the qualities are non-existent, and later they are newly produced. This is because they are changeless. The Sutra of the Supreme Appearance of the Essence says:

The dhatu has no temporal beginning.
It exists as the true state of all dharmas.
Since it exists, all beings have attained nirvana.
As it was before, it will be later.
This is the changelessness of suchness.

The luminous nature of mind is not obscured by the kleshas. The Uttaratantra says: 26

The nature of the mind is luminosity.
It is just as changeless as the space of the sky.
By the rising of false conceptions, desire and so forth obscure it,
But its nature is not obscured by incidental defilements.

The divisions are the primordial gotra and the removable gotra, whose arising depends on clearing away incidental defilements.

As for their beginningless existence as dharmin and dharmata, the Nirvana Sutra says:

O son of noble family, as for the nature of mind, naturally luminous and naturally essenceless, the way naturally pure mind appears is by participating in buddha qualities that blaze with the major and minor marks, and not being separate from them. Nevertheless its empty and apparent natures are distinguished.

The established gotra, superimposed on the primordial gotra is the incidental upaya and prajna of the four paths of learning, produced by mind and so forth. Purification occurs through the activities of the two accumulations of merit and wisdom. the Gandavyuha Sutra says:

Kye, sons of the Victorious One! This which is called the gotra of enlightenment is genuine¹²⁴
dharmadhatu
It is vast like the sky. When its naturally luminous nature has been seen, training in accord with the great accumulations of merit and wisdom is purified.

The Uttaratantra says: 39

Like the buried treasure and the fruit
The two aspects of the gotra should be known
They are the beginningless natural presence
And supremacy that has been truly received.

As is taught, arising from these two gotras,
The trikaya of the Buddha is attained.
By the first arises the first of the kayas,¹²⁵
By the second arise the subsequent two.¹²⁶

All the splendor of svabhavikakaya,
Like the precious statue of the Buddha.
Is self-arising and therefore unproduced.
It is a mine of precious qualities.

Because it has great dominion over the dharmin
It is fully expressed, like a universal monarch.
Its phenomenal nature is like a reflection,
With emanation-bodies like forms of gold.

Svabhavikakaya is mind itself, the naturally existing gotra. This is like a naturally existing jewel. From within it comes the gotra with the nature of the dharmin. Here there are the universal monarch of sambhogakaya, and its reflected emanation, arising in dependence on it, nirmanakaya, the supreme emanation for those who are to be tamed. At the time of existing as a sentient being, these do not appear, because defilement obscures them.

By accumulating merit through visualization and so forth, defilements that obscure rupakaya are cleared away. By the accumulation of wisdom through emptiness meditation and so forth, obscurations are cleared away from the dharmata-svabhavikakaya, the body of the self-existing-essence, the nature of dharmas.

The support, the naturally existing gotra, is like clear water. Within it the supported, the established gotra, rises like a variety of reflections. The two exist primordially, like reflector and reflection.

Within the gotra that exists as the ground, as knowable objects, the incidentally established gotra exists as the phenomena of knowing mind. These are respectively support and supported.

The dharmin exists separably with dharmata, the naturally existing gotra. As a separable fruition, it is non-existent. The produced gotra is an antidote to purify defilements. Though the two kayas exist as if they were produced effect and producing cause, there is no actual causation. That gotra makes the perfect buddha qualities to be born as the realization of the paths of learning. This is their liberation or ripening as the level of buddhahood. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

The nature and the vast extent of its blossoming;
That these exist as support and what is supported;
Their existence and non-existence; their buddha qualities.
Are what should be known as the meaning of liberation.

Sugatagarbha pervades all sentient beings. By the nine examples it is taught to exist within the covering of the kleshas. The Uttaratantra says: 31

A buddha in a decaying lotus, bees and honey.
Gold within a covering of an unclean nature.
Treasure in the earth, the germ within a fruit,
An image of the buddha that is covered with rags.
A king within the belly of a poor and ugly woman.
Jewels in the earth, in such a form,
Obscured by the incidental defilements of the kleshas,
This dhatu exists within sentient beings.

These nine examples are related to the obscured dhatu as it exists in ordinary individuals, arhats among the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas dwelling on the paths of seeing and meditation. Ordinary people are those who have not entered into the path; or those who have entered but their being is obscured by to the assembly of the four obscurations, passion, aggression, ignorance, and all of these together. From the four examples of the dhatu within them, first, as for the example of how the essence exists, when it is obscured by propensities of desire, the Uttaratantra says: @@@

Existing in a lotus that is evil-colored,
A tathagata-statue, blazing with a thousand marks,
Having been seen with the undefiled eye of the gods,
The statue would be removed from its mud-born lotus cover.
For tathagatas dwelling in places without torment
The intrinsic buddha eye sees what will later be unobscured.¹²⁷
Their intrinsic endless compassion will free them from obscuration.

Second, the example of the dhatu existing in a covering characterized by propensities of aggression: @@@

Like honey that is surrounded by a swarm of bees,
Capable persons have a wish that they could acquire it
Having seen it is there, by using skillful means,
They completely separate it from the swarm of insects,

By the all-knowing eye of the great sage himself
Having seen the honey of the dhatu or gotra,
Having obscurations like the swarm of bees,
He makes them be completely abandoned and disappear.

Third, the example of the dhatu existing in a covering characterized by propensities of stupidity: @@@

Just as kernels of grain still covered by their husks
Are not usable in that form by human beings,
They remove the grain from out of the covering husk.
Using the part they want for food and otherwise

Just so, mixed with defiling kleshas of sentient beings,
As many victorious ones as there are in the three worlds,
If they are not liberated from being mixed with these kleshas,
So many will not be made into victorious ones.

Fourth, the example of the essence existing in a covering manifesting kleshas characterized by the arising of passion, aggression and stupidity all together: @@@

Just as on a journey someone's treasured gold
In the confusion might fall into a filthy place,
That dharmin by falling there, would not have been destroyed,
Remaining there like that for many hundreds of years.

By a god who had the pure eye of the gods,
If the gold existing there was seen and found
People would say the god established that precious thing,
This supremely precious thing, that actually was abandoned,

So the buddha qualities of sentient beings.
Have sunk and disappeared among the filth-like kleshas.
Having been seen by the Sage, to purify them that filth,
For all beings he caused the dharma to arise.

As for the example of the dhatu existing in a covering of habitual patterns of ignorance, in the arhats of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas: @@@

Just as in the house of a poor man, under the floor,
An inexhaustible treasure might be lying buried;
But he would not know the existence of this treasure,
Nor would the treasure say to him that it was there.

So with the precious treasure that is within the mind,
Spotless dharmata, with no adding or taking away,
When it is not realized, we experience
The poverties of suffering, continuously arising.

if the covering is abandoned when seen, here is the first of the two examples of how the essence is: @@@

Just as in a mango or in other fruits
There are undestroyed dharmas of seed and germination,
And then if there should be plowed earth, and water and such,
The stuff of a king of trees will gradually be established.
So in the fruit of the ignorance of sentient beings,
Inside the covering skin is the good dharma-element
Which similarly depending on the condition of goodness
Will gradually be the stuff of the King of Sages.

As for the second example: @@@

As a precious statue of the Victorious One Might be covered up in dirty tattered rags,
But still a divine one on the path might seen and uncover it,
And then it would be said, "He really dwells on the path."

So the sugata nature, wrapped in beginningless kleshas,
Having once been seen, even within an animal,
There would be a real means of by which it could be set free.

From the two examples of how, within the covering of defilements that is to be abandoned by cultivation, there exists the splendor of the good dhatu of dharmas, as for the first: @@@

Just as an ugly woman with no one to protect her
Staying in a shelter for the poor and homeless
Might hold a splendid king in the confines her womb.
And would not know this lord of men was in her belly.

In the refuge mission of life within this world,
Impure sentient beings are like that pregnant woman.
With only what she has, she will one day have a protector.
Gestation of the spotless dhatu is similar.

As for the second example: @@@

Just as gold ore that has a big nugget inside of it¹²⁸
Has a external nature that is very drab,
Having seen it those who know it for what it is,
In order to purify the gold that is inside,
Undertake to remove the outer covering.

Having seen the luminous nature that is within us,
Although it has been covered up by the incidental;
Likewise the source of seeing what is precious in sentient beings
Removes the obscurations of supreme enlightenment.

Though the obscurations to the pure ground are many, the same text says: @@@

Passion, aggression, and ignorance; active or as an imprint;
That to be abandoned by seeing and meditation;
The higher bhumis relatively impure and pure,¹²⁹
Many defilements are taught by the covering lotus and so forth.
Transcending all the divisions of closely-connecting kleshas,

By these defilements fools and those with the learning of arhats,
Are meant by respectively four and one of these examples.
Seeing and cultivation, and the pure and impure levels
Have two and two comparisons of their impurities.

Joining these examples of defilements and the essence to a determination of their meaning, the same text says: @@@

Just as when a lotus arises from the mud,
When it first manifests the mind is very joyful,
But afterward it decays and then there is no more joy.
The joy arising from desire is like that.

Just as delicious honey is completely crawling
With irritated bees that sting like an army of spears;
Just so, if aggression rises, and swarms within our minds
Suffering will be produced within our hearts.

Just as the essence, the kernels rice and other grain
Is hidden by an external husk which covers it,
So sight of the essential meaning buddhahood
Has been obscured within the egg of ignorance.

Just as filth is something that is unsuitable,
So are those who have desire for these poisons
That is because depending on the cause of their desire,
What is like filth will be arising everywhere.

Just as when wealth is hidden underneath the ground,
One who does not know this will not attain the treasure,
So the self-arising treasure of the nature
Is hidden in the ground of habitual patterns of ignorance.

Just as by gradual growing of the sprout and so forth
The shell of the seed is cut apart and falls away,
So by seeing the suchness of the natural state

What is to be abandoned by seeing is reversed.

Those who conquer the essence of transitory collections
Through being connected to the path of the noble ones,
Make wisdom the thing to abandon on the path of meditation.
This is taught to be like being wrapped in rags.¹³⁰

The defilements supported by the first seven bhumis,
Are like the defilement found in the covering of a womb.
Non-thought is like being free of the covering of the womb,
This completes the ripening of the insight of wisdom.

Defilements associated with the three highest bhumis
Should be known to like a covering of mud and clay.
By a great being's having attained the vajra view,
The vajra-like samadhi destroys that covering.

Thus the many defilements of desire and so forth
Are like the examples of a decaying lotus and so forth.

The Enumeration of Dharmas of the Complete Passing Beyond Suffering of the Noble Ones says:

Then the bhagavan spoke to Kashyapa. O son of noble family, It is, for example, like this. A wealthy king had on his forehead a vajra jewel. With other wealthy ones, radiating power, it touched the heads of those other wealthy ones.

The jewel on the forehead sunk inside his flesh, and he did not know where it had gone. Because a wound arose, he asked a doctor, "Cure me." From this instruction, a very capable doctor would not treat him for that wound of the jewel going into his flesh, saying these words,

"Kye most powerful one, why are you asking about your forehead-jewel?"

That wealthy one, from aversion, would say to the doctor, "Because my forehead jewel should not go anywhere." he would think, "Is it an illusion that it is not there?" This would produce much suffering.

Then that doctor producing joy in that wealthy one would say, "Thus do not produce suffering. If you emanate power, the jewel will sink into your flesh, a mere reflection will appear externally. If you emanate power, hatred will arise. Though the power of the jewel has sunk into your flesh you did not feel it."

Not believing these words that were said, the king would say, "Doctor don't lie. If it sinks into my flesh, which is matter and blood that is very opaque, it is not reasonable that a reflection would appear."

Then the doctor would say, "A mirror is likewise opaque, but the jewel will also clearly appear in it. When you have seen that this is like that, a wondrous, marvelous perception will arise.

O son of noble family, all sentient beings are like that. Since they do not venerate the spiritual friend, though they have the buddha nature they cannot see it. It is obscured by passion, aggression, and ignorance. Many different beings who have so been overcome are within samsara and suffering.

From that nature, O son of noble family, within the bodies of all sentient beings there are the ten powers, the thirty-two major marks, and the eighty excellent minor marks.

This has been taught in many ways. The Hevajra says:

Within the body there exists the great wisdom
The truth of this has abandoned all conceptions.
Universal, it pervades all things.
Embodied existence does not arise from the body.

The Precious Mala says:

I and limitless sentient beings are primordial buddhas.

By the power of discursive thoughts there is samsara.
From that I shall produce the supreme mind of enlightenment.

The Wisdom of the Moment of Death says:

Since whoever realizes mind is a buddha, produce the supreme perception by not searching anywhere else.

The Praise of the Vajra of Mind says:

Water that exists within the earth
Exists there pure without defilement.
Just so, within the covering of the kleshas,
Wisdom exists without defilement.

The Secret Essence says:

Throughout the ten directions and four times,
Perfected buddhas are nowhere to be found.
Except for the perfect buddha, the nature of mind,
Do not look for any other buddha.
The victorious ones themselves, if they should search,
Would never find it anywhere at all.

So it is taught, there and elsewhere. In brief, by the example of the great billion-fold expanse of the three-fold thousand worlds it should be known that within all sentient beings primordially exists the kayas and wisdoms of buddhahood, without adding and subtracting, like the sun and its light. That dhatu is always naturally pure. Its self-nature does not change. Its defilements are false conceptions and temporary changes. The commentary on the Uttaratantra says:

O great rishi, The kleshas are darkness. Complete purity is light. The kleshas are weak. Clear seeing is powerful. The kleshas are temporary. Natural purity is the root.

So it is taught there and elsewhere. Since the dhatu is primordially without defilement, it is pure. Since it is changeless, it is the true self, since it always exists, it is permanent. Though it falls into the sufferings of samsara, it is not overcome by them, and this is the perfection of bliss. The Uttaratantra says: 22

Purity, self-nature, bliss, and permanence
Are the perfect qualities of the fruition.

The dhatu of the tathagata pervades all sentient beings.. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Just as space is maintained as eternal and omnipresent,
This too is maintained to be eternal and omnipresent.
Just as space is an aspect found within all forms,
This too is in all the assembly of sentient beings.

When this essence is obscured by clouds, they do not stain it, any more than when the sun is obscured by clouds. At the time of primordial buddhahood, the dhatu exists indestructibly and inseparably. The commentary to the Uttaratantra says

The dhatu of the tathagata existing in the three occasions is present within all beings. All their kleshas and phenomenal appearances are composed of this changeless reality.

As regards the three occasions, the Uttaratantra says: 24

These are the three-fold stages of impurity,
Both pure and impure, and being completely pure.

They are said to be the stage of sentient beings,
And those of bodhisattvas, and of tathagatas.

The impure situation is that of sentient beings. That which is both pure and impure is that of bodhisattvas. Complete purity is the situation of the buddhas. As nothing is like the gotra, it cannot be exemplified by anything at all.

The same text says: @@@

Since it is completely beyond the world
No example is seen within the world.
Therefore the tathagata and the dhatu
Are taught to be similar in this respect.

As to how it is incomparable, it is essentially single. Therefore, to explain it by many examples from different situations would be merely partial characterization of it.

It may be asked, "How can this gotra be seen as it is? Beings who do not see the natural state are accepted by the spiritual friend. Those who have devotion to the vehicles of the shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas; and also beings dwelling on the bhumis realize it in a single way. This realization is one with that of the bodhisattvas dwelling on the tenth bhumi. As for this being the way it really is, it is not seen otherwise even by the buddhas themselves. The commentary to the Uttaratantra says:

Seeing clouds and the sun, whether from here on the earth or from the sky above the clouds, we have a similar apprehension. The noble ones whose eye of the mind is pure also see all this very clearly. Bhagavan, your completely pure understanding of dharmakaya sees all the limitless knowable objects pervading the space of the sky.

The dhatu or essence is the buddha field of the three kayas of one's own mind itself, along with their wisdoms, existing as the circle of the ornament. How is this seen? Since this is buddhahood, it is properly explained in these texts. By having faith in the paths of learning it is entirely apprehended. The former text says:

The absolute truth of the self-arisen ones
Has to be realized by means of faith.
The blazing light in the circle of the sun
Is not seen by those who have no eyes.

The Sutra on the Essence of Buddhahood says:

No matter what they rely on, individual sentient beings, shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas do not see the essence of the buddhas as it is. For example, a blind man cannot see what is painted by others in oil colors. When they say, "it is like this pillar, and he touches the pillar with his hands and grasps it as cold. They say, "it is like the wings of a swan." By hearing the sound of the wings of a swan the color of a pillar is grasped as a fluttering sound. He asks, "what is the color of those wings like?" "It is like a conch." By touching a smooth conch, he grasps it as smooth. Just as a blind person does not know colors as they are, seeing the highest nature of buddhahood is very difficult.

It is also very hard for sentient beings to realize it. The same text says:

A king assembled many blind men, and having shown them an elephant. Asked to describe the characteristics of an elephant, those who had touched the trunk said, "it is like a hook." Those who touched the eye said, "It is like a bowl. Those who touched the ear said, "It is like a winnowing basket. Those who touched the back said, "It is like a tray. Those who touched the tail said, "It is like a rope." These blind men were not talking about anything other than an elephant, but they had not understood its totality.

The buddha nature is also like that. Those who have said different things, that it is emptiness, like illusion, luminous and so forth, have not realized its totality.

Beings who are noble ones have a little realization of it, but not as it is. The Nirvana Sutra says:

O son of noble family For example, it is like this. A blind man in order to have his eyes healed went to a capable physician. The physician holding a gold knife removed the hindrance. Having cut off the opaque part that obscured the eye. He lifted up a finger. {{328..}} When he showed it, the blind man said, "I do not see it." If he showed two or three fingers, the patient would say, "I see a little bit."

O son of noble family, if this Sutra of Complete great Nirvana is not taught, as many are not among the bodhisattvas, even after they have perfected the ten paramitas, even when they exist on the tenth bhumi, they will not see the nature of buddhahood. It is like that. When this is taught by the Tathagata, they will see it a little.

The birds soaring in the sky above must examine where the pure sky is. If a swan is in the top of a tree it examines whether it is a tree or water, and thinking about the top of a ship on the ocean, or in space, also knowing the top of the second. Though by such examples the essence is not seen, it is taught to be the manner of non-ascertaining seeing.

If it is asked, "what is the use of teaching this essence that is subtle and difficult to examine, not seen with certainty while one is a sentient being?:"

By teaching that the essence of buddhahood exists within the being of oneself and others, having reversed one's own discouragement, knowing that establishing liberation is not difficult, we gain confidence.

Eliminating contempt for other sentient beings, we respect everyone equally with the teacher as buddhas.

Having eliminated not knowing that realization of the kayas and wisdoms exists within one as true reality, prajna realizes the space of the absolute.

Knowing the natural state like that, it eliminates glorifications and deprecations of is and is not, eternalism and nihilism.

Then wisdom realizes true reality, and the supreme self. Having eliminated pride and desire for anything more, it sees self and other as equal.

It is taught that these are the five necessities for the arising of the great kindness for others. The Uttaratantra says: 40

Like clouds, dreams, and illusions, and the other examples
All the dharmas of knowables are always emptiness.
When this has been taught by victorious ones to sentient beings
Why do they also teach them that they have the essence.

To answer that question:¹³¹

Contempt for lesser ones and disheartened beings,
Joining those who grasp untruth to the truth of dharma,
For those who have abundant faults of ego-grasping
It is taught so that those like that will abandon them.

As for those who wrongly slight the body and are enslaved by the golden net of wrong view, or who support realization of the true meaning of the sutras and secret mantra with partialities, their "essential meanings" are really provisional. They teach the intention that, "If the cause occurs, the fruition will arise."

It is not like that. This is like the eternal self of the Hindu extremists. "The two kayas of buddhahood arise from the two accumulations. This should be stated as definitely true."

O you with your lotus net of eternalism, you truly do not know the intention of saying that there were three turnings to the wheel of dharma. You are truly grasping the extreme of emptiness.

The first turning of the word, intended for beginners and those of weak mind, made the four noble truths and renunciation into an antidote. This was so that these beings could eliminate samsara as a means of complete liberation from what is to be abandoned.

In the second turning, intended for them eventually when they had completely abandoned this and for those of intermediate capacity of mind, he taught the eight examples of illusion and emptiness like space. This was a means of liberating them from the bondage of grasping the antidote.

For those who reached that goal and from the viewpoint of those of the highest powers, he taught the self-nature of knowables as it really is. This is not like the self of the heretics. Their impossible self is a nonexistent, exaggerated nature. They make measures of greater and lesser, and therefore they do not maintain the dharmas of the kayas and wisdoms.

It is not the true meaning that self and non-emptiness were taught simply as an antidote for you who are attached to egolessness and emptiness. The Nirvana Sutra says:

O son of noble family, moreover it is like this. For example a woman was nursing her small child who was afflicted by mouth rot,¹³² and when the child was struck by sickness, that woman too was tormented by suffering, and sought out a physician. The physician gave her as medicine, oil and milk and shakara. When the child was given this to drink, he instructed the woman with these words. "Because we are giving medicine to this child, for a little while until you, the mother, are cured, it shouldn't be given your milk to drink. So he would instruct her.

Then so that it would not nurse, he put bile on the nipples; the child would have said that her nipple was smeared with poison and not suitable for sucking. The child, tormented by thirst, desired the breast, but having tasted it, would not take it.

After being treated by the physician the woman would wash her breast clean. When the child cried she would go to it. "Now take the breast and nurse," she would say. That child, though tormented with thirst, because of the former taste it experienced, would not come when called.

In this instance the mother would give these instructions. "You have drunk the medicine I gave you before. With this medicine, until the mother is cured, since it is not proper that the nipple be given for nursing, it was smeared with bile. Now, even taking your medicine, the nipple will have no taste in your mouth." When she said that, gradually approaching as before, it would drink.

Son of noble family, The tathagata also, in order to liberate all sentient beings, is the persistent teacher of egolessness to sentient beings. By his having persistently done that, the attitude of "ego" is non-existent. Suffering is completely eliminated. This is in order to clear away the bad views of the worldly charvakas. By meditating on the dharma of egolessness, the body will become completely pure.

Just as that woman, because of her son, smeared bile on her breast, the tathagata too is like that. So that there will be emptiness meditation, he teaches that all dharmas are selfless.

Just as that woman later washed off the bile and called her child, saying take the nipple and nurse, my teaching tathagatagarbha is like that. O monks so that you will not be afraid, as the mother called the child, and it gradually drank her milk, O monks, you too should make a distinction. Tathagatagarbha should not be said to be non-existent. In my former sayings in the prajnaparamita sutras, which taught emptiness, understand that the intention was merely naturelessness. Otherwise by meditating on the emptiness of nothing at all, the fruition produced would accord with the cause, and the kayas and wisdoms would not arise.

Emptiness expresses the idea that the apparent dharmin, from the time it appears, is empty of complexities grasped as one and many, and empty of individual existences, like the reflections in a mirror, that all extremes are completely non-existent, and that non-existent now and primordially, things are not like their confused appearance. The Heart Sutra says:

Form is emptiness. Emptiness is form. Emptiness is nothing other than form. Form is nothing other than emptiness. Similarly, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness are empty.

The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Every dharmin in its own turn is taught to be empty of essence. But if it is formless, how will there be the view that form is empty?

The Uttaratantra says:

@@@

The emptiness that has the supreme of all aspects
Is emptiness that is expressed as form.

And also: 39-40

Here there is nothing at all that is to be cleared away,
And nothing that is to be added to what there is.

Within reality the real is what is seen.
If thus one sees the truth, one will be liberated.

Of what has the characteristic of separability
The dhatu, pure of the incidental, is empty.
Of that which has the characteristic of being inseparable,
The unsurpassable dharmas, it is not empty.

Its commentary says:

Why is this taught here? For the reason that it is not contradictory with saying that this dhatu of the tathagata is by nature completely pure from all the kleshas that are to be cleared away. It is free from incidental obscurations because it is its nature to be so. Within this there is nothing to be added for reasons of phenomenal appearance. Completely undivided dharmata is also its nature. Therefore, sugatagarbha having divisions and what is separable is empty of all the separable coverings of the kleshas. What is indivisible and inseparable from it is the buddha dharmas beyond being encompassed by thought, surpassing the grains of sand in the Ganges. They are not empty.

When something does not exist in something, the latter is said to be empty of the former but we must subsequently assert that whatever remains there eternally exists and is known truly as it is.

Though obscurations of the two primordial kayas of buddhahood, are cleared away by the two accumulations, they are not producing cause and produced effect. If they were, dharmakaya and sambhogakaya would be composite productions, and hence impermanent. However, dharmakaya is changeless. The Madhyamakavatara says:

The kaya of peace is like a wish fulfilling tree,
Like a wish-fulfilling, gem it is inconceivable.
Till beings are liberated, it is always in the world,
And it will appear without complexity.

The Uttaratantra says: 52

The Mara of death has been conquered by the lord of Dharma.
Being without essence, he is the permanent lord of the world.

Contradicting this idea that it has cause and effect it also says: 11

Uncompounded and self-existing,
Not realized by other conditions,
Having wise and compassionate power,
Buddhahood has the two benefits.

That refutes its having a producing cause and produced effect. Saying it is "egoless," "emptiness," "non-dual," and so forth should be understood in this way. The Great Nirvana of the Noble Ones says:

The secret essence of the tathagata is shown to be the completely pure buddha nature that neither changes nor transmigrates. If it so exists, it is unreasonable for those who are skilled in prajna not to maintain that. To say it is non-existent would be false speaking, and likewise that it has development or succession. Those of the race of fools espouse nihilism, not knowing the secret essence of the tathagata.

If it is said to suffer, the blissful nature could not be within the body. Stupid fools think, "All bodies are impermanent." This is like sending the freshness of awareness into clay. Those who are skilled in prajna make distinctions. They do not say that everything is impermanent in every way. Why? Because within our bodies there exists the seed of buddha nature. Stupid fools grasp the thought that all the dharmas of buddhahood are selfless. For those skilled in prajna, selflessness is just an abstract label. It should be discriminated as having no true existence. Knowing this, one will produce no doubts about the matter. When someone says that tathagatagarbha is empty, stupid fools give rise to views of nihilism and non-existence. Those who are skilled in prajna make a distinction. Within human beings there is the single tathagata. It is said to be eternally existent, unchanging, and does not transmigrate.

If by the condition of ignorance, composite things are said to arise, stupid fools when they have heard this think that insight and ignorance are to be distinguished as two. Those who are skilled in prajna realize that their natures are non-dual. That which is non-dual is reality.

When someone says that by formations consciousness arises, stupid fools grasp formations and consciousness as two. Those who are skilled in prajna realize their natures as non-dual. Non-duality is purity.

All dharmas have no self, and tathagatagarbha also has no self. When this is said, stupid fools grasp it dualistically. Those who are skilled in prajna realize that their natures are non-dual. Self and selflessness are intrinsically non-dual. Tathagatagarbha has been supremely praised by the buddha bhagavats as immeasurable, beyond evaluation, and limitless. I too have taught this in all the sutras about the qualities it possesses.

So it should be known. The Sutra of Miraculous Display says:

Those who have wrong craving have the characteristic of never transcending suffering.

When this is taught regarding these and those of the cut off family, we may think that not all beings are pervaded by the garbha; but it is not like that. The intention is that those with wrong craving who abandon the mahayana dharma will not be liberated for a long time. Those who are reversed from the path are only temporarily cut off from the family of those in whom the path is established. They are not cut off from the dhatu, the luminous nature of mind. The commentary to the Uttaratantra says:

"Those who have wrong craving have the characteristic of never transcending suffering." This teaches that wrong craving causes hostility towards the dharma of the mahayana. This is said with the intention that this hostility to the mahayana dharma will be reversed at another time. Because the dhatu exists with a nature that is completely pure, it is not proper to say that some will never become pure. Therefore the bhagavat's intention was that all sentient beings without distinction are capable of being completely purified. Though samsara is beginningless, it does have an end. The naturally pure and eternal is obscured by a covering of beginningless obscurations, and therefore not seen, just as gold might be hidden.

Since within the dhatu of dharmas all goodness exists, it can always be purified. Though, samsara is beginningless, it has an end. By that it is established.

The reasons that the two gotras are awakened are two. As for the reason that dharmakaya, the naturally-existing gotra, is awakened, the Madhyamakavatara says:

When someone hears about emptiness, as an ordinary person,
The highest joy will arise within them again and again.
Their eyes are wet with tears that flow because of this joy.
The hairs of their body arise with wonder and stand on end.

Within them the seed of attaining buddhahood exists
They have become the vessels of direct and straightforward teachings.
Now the absolute truth has really been taught to them.

As for the reason that the dharmin-gotra of rupakaya is awakened, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

As for why one becomes a connected vessel,
Practicing compassion, and devotion,
And dedication to what is truly good
Is truly explained as being due to the gotra.

Regarding the benefits of awakening the gotra, the same text says:

The lower realms are far off, and liberation is quick.
When that occurs, one experiences little suffering.

By sadness sentient beings will then be quickly ripened.

Once the gotra is awakened, from then on one is liberated from the lower realms like growing jasmine naturally falling to the ground. There is little suffering. By strong weariness sentient beings will be ripened.

If there were no such gotra within sentient beings, no matter what sufferings arose, they would not be saddened. The attitude that aspires to nirvana and rejects samsara would not arise. The attitude of desiring liberation could also not arise. That in some, without being taught by anyone, compassion for the suffering of others arises, and that some who experience suffering develop renunciation and so forth is due to the power of goodness of the beginningless dhatu of dharmas. The Uttaratantra says: 23

If there were no dhatu of buddhahood,
Suffering would never make us sad.
There would be no desire for nirvana,
Or effort and aspiration to that goal.

Being able to see the comparative attractiveness of samsara and nirvana, seeing their faults and virtues is therefore due to the existence of the gotra. If the gotra did not exist, neither would these.

Thus from the extensive teaching that by having the gotra the essence of buddhahood exists within us, now some summary verses are interposed:

Without exception all sentient beings have sugatagarbha.
In the covering veil of incidental obscurations,
Exists the primordial lamp, the luminous dhatu of dharmas.
This is the kayas and wisdoms, this itself is the Dharma.
Within it nothing is added, and nothing is taken away.

Existing within us, this itself is self-existing.
By devoting ourselves to this essence of emptiness and compassion,
Having attained this dhatu, called by the name "enlightenment,"
We will benefit all the host of beings without remainder.

Primordially self-arising, like the sun in space,
When it is obscured by clouds, temporarily dimming the daylight,
Then we experience the dreamlike sufferings of samsara.
So make a powerful effort to clear away obscuration.

Confused incidental appearance, appearances of the six realms,
Are emanated like dreams, from habitual patterns and karma,
Appearing as what never was, nor is, and shall not be.
The spontaneous presence of wisdom primordially exists.
It always exists, but nevertheless it is not seen.

As what we perceive in sleep, is not seen to be within us.
Dharmas defiled with false conceptions are vain and futile.
Do not grasp them, but train in the luminous nature of mind.
Grasp the two benefits, bringing wealth to oneself and others.

"If this gotra exists in everyone, why, pray tell, are we wandering in samsara?" We exist this way, not knowing our own face, because of the futile grasping of a meaningless ego. As lineage-holders of our kleshas from earlier to later, we are in bad company. We have poverty-mentality. Conditioning is produced by relative reference point.¹³³ This is samsara. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Well-practiced in our kleshas, and in bad company.
With impoverished attitude, and relative reference point;
Briefly stated, these are the four that should be known.
These are the degradations that have defiled the gotra.

The Details of Light says:

Primordial luminosity itself is ignorant.
So-called "rising" of mind produces attachment to ego.
By these objects having been grasped as so-called "others,"
Beings become confused, within the realm of samsara.
Because of their karma of inappropriate joys and sorrows,
They have the experience of individual beings.

The All-Creating King says

This phenomenal play, which is wonderful and marvelous,
Is actionless existence, like the space of the sky.
Ignorance without apprehension of anything,
Rises immediately from nothing but itself.

This is the path that is alike for everyone.
This is the nature as it is within all beings.
Defiled by the removable, it therefore is confused.

Also it says there:

By gathering in the light that exists in all directions
To the limits of the four directions, above and below,
In an unpredictable rainbow whose colors are not fixed
The different kinds of gotra will manifest in appearance.
Suchness moves and particles never move at all.
This is the principle one of all the five elements.

The primordial, luminous nature of mind, empty/luminous self-arising wisdom, is in essence emptiness like the sky. Its nature is luminosity like the sun and moon. The radiance of its compassion arises ceaselessly, like reflections in the surface of an untarnished mirror. The natures of dharmakaya, sambhogakaya, and nirmanakaya come from within sugatagarbha, which is entirely without bias and partiality. The empty essence is also the accommodating space of arising. The luminous nature naturally abides as the five lights, and these naturally appear as objects. Arising as compassion, cognitive knowledge of insight-wisdom is maintained to be confusion. The Secret Essence says:

E MA HO! from out of sugatagarbha,
From out of our karmic relationships comes confusion.

At this time, the aspect that does not know its intrinsic wisdom to be its own nature is co-emergent ignorance.¹³⁴ The aspect that fixates its own projections as other is the ignorance of false conception.¹³⁵ Because of not knowing that all this has arisen within the natural state, by the power of attachment of ego-fixation to its objects, habitual patterns of the vessel, the external world, ripen as body. Habitual patterns of the essence, sentient beings within the world, ripen as mind. This is confusion, the various phenomena of the five poisons. The All-Creating King says

When the nature of me, the doer of all, is not realized,
The dharmas created by me are imputed with fixed existence.
By the power of desire and craving, apparent things exist.
And so their impermanent nature as illusion is destroyed.
The partless nature becomes like colors to the blind.

The root of confusion is not knowing what we are. The Prajnapramitsamgatha says:

As many sentient beings as there may be,
Of lesser, middle, or of higher rank,
All of these have arisen from ignorance.
So it has been taught by the Sugata.

The Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines teaches that confusion is conditioned by dualistic grasping:

Grasping an I and a mine, beings whirl in samsara.

The Prajnaparamita in Twenty Thousand Lines says:

Childish sentient beings perceive the non-existence of skandhas as skandhas. They perceive the non-existence of ayatanas as ayatanas. They perceive the non-existence of things that arise interdependently as interdependent arising. Therefore, they are completely within the grasp of the ripening karma of all these dharmas that are wrongly perceived as interdependent arising.

As to how these dharmas arise, from the two ignorances come samsaric formations. From that comes the succession of births of individual beings. Name and form are established. When the body has been established by the embryonic stages from an oval to birth, there are contact, perception, feeling, the six ayatanas, and old age and death. So with the twelve links of interdependent arising, we cycle in samsara.

"The primordial natural state does not exist within samsara. It is not proper that sugatagarbha should be samsaric."

Not so! It is like clear, unmuddied water becoming solid rock-like ice, in a transparent winter wind. From the primordial state, conditioned by the arising of grasping and fixation, confused appearance displays itself as a variety of solid things. A song from the Dohakosha says:

When the wind gets into water and thereby stirs it up
The softness of the water becomes as hard as rock.
Having been stupefied through being disturbed by concepts,
What was formless becomes completely hard and solid.

Sugatagarbha is the primordially pure, changeless essence, dharmakaya, designated as the alaya of reality. When this becomes confused, it and the connected wealth of the nature of mind, rupakaya and the buddha fields, the perfect entities of wisdom, are obscured through the confused grasping and fixation of ignorance. This is due to the alaya of the various habitual patterns. Within this, since beginningless time, have been planted the various seeds or habitual patterns of confusion. Their great power becomes individual experiences of the higher and lower realms, and so forth. When we are within dream-like samsara, fixating I and ego, experiencing desire, aggression, and the five poisons, collecting karma and kleshas, from meaningless confusion, we live with a variety of attachments to truly existing entities.

Day and night the wheel of confused appearance continuously turns, and since its succession is groundless, we are never liberated from it. It is like the confusion of a dream. Wandering because of kleshas, because of good and evil, is like a prince wandering along a road, separated from his kingdom. It is intrinsically a time of suffering. Since he was born into a royal family, the happiness of true wealth is naturally within him; but now he suffers temporarily. As to what is taught by this example, the Song of the Oral Instruction of the Inexhaustible Treasury, says:

Beings bound in samsara, as if they were tangled in vines,
In the desert of ego-grasping are completely mad with thirst:
Like a prince without a kingdom, separate from his father,
Without a chance for happiness, he gives in to despair.

As to the way that tathagatagarbha exists at this time of wandering futilely on the plan of samsara, the Tathagatagarbha Sutra says:

Kye, Son of the Victorious One, it is like this. For example, the measure of a three-fold thousand world system is one billion. That billion perfectly records the number of all worlds of the three-fold great thousand world system. Similarly the measure of the great surrounding wall of the world is written "the great surrounding wall of the world." The measure of characteristics is written "characteristics." The measure of the second or middle thousand world realms is "the second or middle thousand world realm." The measure of a thousand world realms, is "a thousand world realms."

The fourth thousand world realms is "the fourth thousand world realms." The measure of the great ocean is "the great ocean." The measure of Jambuling is "Jambuling." The measure of the eastern continent Videha is "Videha." The measure of the western continent, Aparagodaniya is "Aparagodaniya." The measure of the northern continent Kurava is "Kurava." The measure of mount Meru is "Mount Meru." The measure of the palaces of the gods of the terrestrial realm is written "the palaces of the gods of the terrestrial realm." The measure of the palaces of the gods of the desire realm is "the palaces of the gods of the desire realm." The measure of the palaces of the gods who course in the form-realm is written "the palaces of the gods who course in the form-realm."

A billion is the measure of worlds in a threefold-thousand world system. A billion is also the measure of such worlds that enter into an atom. Just as an atom enters into those billion worlds, similarly all the particles of atoms without remainder enter into the measure of that billion.

Then living, active beings are born on middle earth, learned and wise with clear minds. Their eye is the divine eye. Everything is completely pure and luminous. By their divine eye they view phenomena, seeing those billion within this small atom. Some sentient beings cannot fully understand that. They think, "Kye ma, by what mother, by great force of effort was this billion later put in this atom?" All such beings, thinking that, invented a powerful agent. They thought that atom particle had been opened by a subtle vajra to that billion-fold world system in which all sentient beings lived. From one like that, the rest did the same.

Kye Son of the Victorious One, like that the measureless wisdom of the Tathagata dwells within all sentient beings. Within the mind-continuum of all sentient beings it dwells without deception. These mental continuums of sentient beings do not have a measure like that of the wisdom of the Tathagata. Fools bound by grasping perception do not know the wisdom of the Tathagata. They do not know it at all. They have never experienced or manifested it. Seeing how each sentient being is within dharmadhatu is the perception of a master, the desireless wisdom of the Tathagata. Kye ma, these sentient beings do not know the wisdom of the Tathagata as it is. Those sentient beings in whom the Tathagata's wisdom continues to function were directly taught the path of the noble ones. All the perception-created bonds were cleared away. They were eliminated.

d. How by awakening the gotras liberation is attained:

The wakening of these gotras arouses the two bodhicittas.

Establishing the manifestations of compassion

As accumulation of merit, within the relative.

This is the three abhishekas of the pure developing stage.

Establishing realization of the nature of emptiness

Is accumulation of wisdom, within the absolute.

This is the fourth empowerment, fulfillment, and mahamudra.

When we meditate well, by the growing of the two stages,

Kleshas turn into wisdom. Happiness grows and grows.

By this the obscurations of dharmadhatu are cleansed.

The sun of dharmakaya and rupakaya is seen.

In naturally pure and essentially spotless mind itself, the holy wisdom of buddhahood, the primordially existing spontaneous presence of the luminous nature of mind, the apparent aspect, exists as the qualities of the rupakaya of buddhahood. This is taught by many examples. The qualities of the aspect of emptiness, dharmakaya, are explained everywhere in the sutras and tantras by the example "being like space."

The inseparability of these two is the good dhatu of dharmas. Since it is changeless it is the "naturally existing gotra." After its defilements are purified, by manifesting its full-blown buddha qualities, it is called the "developed gotra." Its root, self-awareness wisdom, is luminosity.

When those two gotras are awakened, by the two accumulations being accumulated, defilements of the two gotras are purified. The buddha qualities are made capable of appearing. Ultimate rupakaya with its buddha qualities is attained.

Just as the six perfections are classified in terms of the two accumulations, so are the stages of development and fulfillment. The Net of Illusion says:

Development and fulfillment are the two accumulations,

Those of merit and wisdom, as well as the three empowerments,
Plus the fourth, which is the nature of suchness itself.
There are other ways of dividing beyond all measure.

The first three empowerments, or abhishekas, are the vase, secret, and prajñajñana abhishekas. Producing the purity of the developing stage, these are the accumulation of merit. The developing stage includes all meditations with complexity on the mandalas of deities and so forth.

The fourth, the precious word-empowerment, producing the purity of the fulfillment stage, is the accumulation of wisdom. The fulfillment stage includes all meditations on luminosity and so forth that are without complexity.

By these purifying defilements of the goṭra, as the sun emerges from dark clouds, self-existing buddhahood comes forth from the coverings of the kleśhas.

As for the extensive explanation, the goṭras were previously taught. The stages of secret mantra will be explained below, so we shall not deal with them here.

e. The related explanation of the virtues

There are three sections

1) How the unification of the two accumulations is perfected

The actions of the ten virtues are the best dharmas in the world
The formed and formless dhyānas are part of gathering merit,
That is concerned with relativity and appearance.
What is completely without the complexities of the world
Is accumulation of wisdom, which is the absolute.
These are the objects of meditation and post-meditation.
By practicing the unification of these two,
Everything that is excellent will be established.

As previously taught, the ten virtues, dhyānas, and formless attainments are in accord with merit; but when a being has aroused bodhicitta and attained prajñā and upāya; the ten virtues, dhyānas, formless attainments, and so forth become causes of liberation. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

O Subhūti, those who develop the conduct of the ten virtues, the four samādhis, and the four formless attainments, when they also arouse bodhicitta, aspiration to unsurpassable enlightenment, at that time, since this is in accord with liberation, it becomes a cause of omniscience. This should be performed. By being mastered, this should be established.

2) How one does not dwell in saṃsāra or nirvāṇa:

Just like wholesome actions that are saṃsāric formations,
Formations of nirvāṇa are explained as karmic actions.
But since the latter are a means of transcending saṃsāra,
They are also a means of liberation from karma.

The ten wholesome actions that accord with merit are saṃsāric confusions. However, if one thinks that with these, we will become confused, it is not so. These activities lead to liberation when we know that karma is natureless, as is taught by similar examples. Insofar as these activities are a means of being liberated from saṃsāra, they do not produce saṃsāric formations. In any case, the great compassion by which we become saddened with saṃsāra exists within saṃsāra without being covered by its defects. While it knows all dharmas to be unborn, and by skillful means, the great compassion does not fall into one-sided peace. The Abhisamskāyalankāra says:

By knowledge we do not dwell within saṃsāra,
By compassion we do not dwell in peace.

The Precious Mala says:

Exponents of nothingness go to the lower realms.
Exponents of being will go to the higher ones.
By knowing reality exactly as it is,
Without dualistic dependence, we will be liberated.

And that is how it is.

3) The explanation of the fruition

From the brief and extended teachings,

a) The brief teachings

Now the fruition of entering into the ten virtues of the path is explained:

For those who are on the path, the fruit of the ten wholesome actions
Has ripening, concordant cause, the power, and action.

These are its four aspects.

b) The extensive explanation,

There are nine sections

i) Ripening

As for the fruition of ripening:

Depending on whether such practice is small, between, or great,
We will be born as human beings or as gods,
Elsewhere we will attain to ultimate truth and goodness.

The aspect according with merit is not exhausted. Temporally we experience the happiness of gods and human beings. Ultimately, we will attain the level of buddhahood. The Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

O noble Shariputra, what is gained by virtuous roots is that after going among gods and human beings, we become unsurpassably enlightened. What are virtuous roots? There are the ten virtues, which possess the single arousal of bodhicitta, the aspiration to supreme enlightenment, the four dhyanas, the four formless attainments, and the six paramitas. These never have any gaps and never become non-existent.

ii) Karmic fruition that accords with the cause

As for the fruition according with the cause:

Actions that have compatibility with the cause
Are those of one who is by nature inclined to the wholesome.
Experience of this is of long life and great enjoyment.
We have a compatible consort and is without enemies.
We is not reviled. Relationships are friendly.
Our words are taken to heart, and people gladly hear them.
Satisfied, we are kind to others, and have good views.

The Sutra Teaching the Ten Purities says:

Because of the karma of these ten virtues, the field is ennobled by our efforts. Our lives are lengthened. Our enjoyments are greater. We have compatible spouses and no enemies. We are not disparaged. Everyone is pleasant to us. Our words are considered worthy of being heeded.

Everyone is glad to hear them. We become contented. There is mutual kindness. There are good views.

iii) The fruition of its power

As for mastery or power:

We are born by its power in rich and brilliant countries.
Potent food, drink, and herbs are easily digested.
We are born in clean places of medicinal herbs and such.
The odor and atmosphere is good and agreeable.
Others do not cheat us, and we are not in fear.
There are no harmful obstacles or danger to our lives.
People suit us and contact with them is very happy.
The flow of the seasons is good, and grain is plentiful.
We live in level places, adorned by lakes and ponds.
The many flourishing flowers and fruits are very good.
Vegetables, fruits, and herbs are delicious with fine aromas.
Everything grows well and there are friends and protectors.

By giving up cutting off life, we are born in good and pleasant countries. By giving up taking what is not given, we are born in places where food and drink are good-tasting and easily digested and medicinal herbs are potentially effective. By abandoning inappropriate sex, we are born in clean and good-smelling places. By abandoning false speaking, the places in which we are born are without danger of harm from enemies, thieves, and so on, and we are not deceived.

By abandoning divisive speaking, we are born in places with many compatible people, with few rocks, stones, and thorns. By abandoning harsh language, we are born in a place where the seasons are regular, and grain ripens at a good time. By abandoning sophistic speech, we are born in level places ornamented with lakes and ponds.

By abandoning covetice we are born with places where many flowers and fruits and abundant good harvests are seen. We have excellent protectors, relatives, and friends. This is taught in the Sutra of the Ten Purities

iv) The fruition of action:

The actions of beings spread happiness on happiness.
All good thoughts are established just as one desires.

The Vast Play says:

By good behavior one's stock of merit is increased.
We are made holders of that which is excellent,
The supreme accumulation of enlightenment.

The Excellent Action says:

These excellencies occur even within this human life.

v) The fruition of the six perfections:

Generosity brings enjoyment, and discipline happiness.
Patience brings beauty, and diligence brilliant qualities.
Meditation brings peace of mind, and prajna liberation.

The accomplishments of bodhicitta are that possessiveness is renounced, harmful behavior is checked, anger is abandoned, we exert ourselves in what is wholesome, the mind is one-pointed in virtue, and the nature of the two truths is known. By good actions of the six paramitas, true fruition is attained. The Precious Mala says:

Generosity, discipline, patience, and exertion
Meditation and prajna, and compassion are cultivated.

Generosity completely bestows our intrinsic wealth.
 Discipline performs beneficial actions for others.
 Patience is the way that we abandon aggression.
 Exertion is enthusiastic, wholesome action.
 Meditation is one-pointedness, without the kleshas.
 Prajna is resolving the meaning of the truth.
 Compassion is a heartfelt noble identification
 With all other sentient beings as of one taste with ourselves.
 Generosity brings enjoyment, discipline happiness;
 Patience radiance and exertion brilliancy.
 Meditation brings peace, and prajna liberation.
 Their essential kindness is the accomplishing of all goals.
 When all of these seven activities, without remainder,
 Have been brought to complete perfection all at once,
 There is the sphere of wisdom beyond the compass of thought.
 We have attained the being of a world-honored one.

The six paramitas are essentially kindness. This is the accomplisher of the deeds of bodhicitta. The extensive explanation is below.

vi) The fruition of the Four Immeasurables

As for the benefits of the four immeasurables:

Kindness makes us pleasant, and compassion beneficial.
Joy fulfills, and equanimity makes us sublime.
In short the ultimate fruit of the two accumulations
Is that incidentally higher states are manifested.
Ultimately truth and goodness are established.
This excellent path is the chariot of the mahayana.
It establishes the perfection of the buddhas of the three times.

Through kindness, we are pleasant to everyone. Through compassion we perform limitless benefits. Joy brings perfect wealth. Equanimity makes the mind workable. The sutras say:

By having kindness mind is vast, the seven activities have been performed.¹³⁶ One's knowledge is certain. Shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and extraordinary ones will attain the pleasures of gods and human beings and be colorfully adorned.

The Precious Mala says:

Food of fish for three hundred
 Offered three times each day
 Cannot match the pure merit
 Of just a minute of kindness

Kind ones will be gods and humans.
 They will be well-restrained.
 Unharmd by poison and weapons,
 Their minds will be good and happy.
 Born in the world of Bhrama,
 Their success will be effortless,

Even if not liberated,
 They will attain the eight qualities.¹³⁷
 Beings will be made to produce
 The mind of bodhicitta.

Having relied on that,
They will become as solid
As the lord of mountains.
Within them bodhicitta
Will be forever attained.

It will never happen
That they have no chance for faith.
By custom becoming excellent,
By emptiness and so forth,
Without desiring dharmas,
Carefully they will attain
To everything that is wholesome.
By their motionlessness,
They will gain mindfulness.

Producing discursive thoughts
They will gain intellect.
By offering and homage,
they will realize the meaning.

By carefully guarding Dharma
They will develop prajna.
Those listeners to the Dharma
Who have the gift of faith,

By having no obscurations,
Will accompany the buddhas.
Everything they wish for
Will quickly be obtained.

Without even wanting to do so
They will accomplish their goals.
As they are not miserly,
Enjoyments will increase.
Since they have no pride,
They will be principal ones.
By patience in the Dharma,
They will grasp its power.

With essential generosity
And fearless generosity
Unharmd by all the maras.
They will gain the highest powers.

Stupas strung with lamps,
Lamps to those in darkness
By these generous lamps and ships
The divine eye will be gained.

By offerings of stupas,
Services, music, and bells,
Excellent yak tails and conches,
The divine ear will be gained.

Not discussing confusions of others,
Not mentioning injured limbs,

Because they guard their minds,
They know the minds of others.

Giving boots and horses,
Growing humble and reverent,
Giving mounts to the guru,
They gain miraculous power

For the sake of Dharma and such
They remember the meanings of texts.
By spotless generous Dharma
Remembering former lives.

Knowing things as they are,
They know that things are essenceless.
They gain the six higher perceptions,
Exhausting all defilements.

To accomplish the liberation
Of limitless sentient beings,
They possess equanimity,
Knowing the nature of suchness,

Because their meditation
Is moistened with compassion,
Having the supreme aspects,
They are victorious ones.

By various pure aspirations,
The buddha field is purified.
Giving precious things to the sages,
They emanate limitless light

With such pure karma and fruit,
Always thinking of beings,
They will always do benefit.
That will benefit you.

Just those are the realm means of crossing over to the level of buddhahood. The Succession of Beings says:

Of the two accumulations of merit and wisdom
The highest fruit is entering holy liberation
No other way of entering was ever known to exist.
Descending from the gathering clouds of purity
Make the cool rain of excellent dharmas now appear.

vii) The fruition of the two truths:

Thus the formative actions of samsara and nirvana
Depend on mind whose nature is luminosity.
Simplicity like the sky, it does not think of a doer,
The meaning of both the two truths is dependent origination.

All karma depends on mind; if we examine mind, it is essenceless and luminous. The supreme distinction of the relative and absolute truths, because of the nature of interdependent arising is completely pure. The Shri-Samadhiraja Sutra says:

At that time without evil deeds, and with the ten powers,
There is the supreme samadhi of the Victorious One.
Beings in samsara are like beings in a dream.
None of them is ever born or ever dies.

Though in transmigration we go to other worlds,
None our karmic actions is ever left behind.
Within samsara their black and white fruitions ripen.
They are not permanent, nor are they nothingness.

Without any gathered karma, there would be no pure lands.
Even if they were created, they could not be reached.
If another produced them, they could not be seen.
Without any transmigration, there is no rebirth.

Nothing at all exists, and nothing is non-existent,
Or it would not be pure to enter the natural state.
There would be no entering perfect pacification
Of all the activities of deluded sentient beings.

The three worlds like a dream are utterly essenceless.
Quickly vanishing, they are impermanent like illusion.
Because there is no coming, there also is no going.
Constant things, eternally empty, have no marks.

This is what is realized by the sugatas--
With the excellent buddha qualities of the victorious ones,
The markless natural state is the peace of the unborn.
Its powers and strengths are powers of buddha qualities.

This itself is the Buddha, supreme among all leaders.
By collecting the qualities of excellent white dharmas
We attain the power of wisdom and buddha qualities
And the excellences of miracle and higher perception.

viii) The individual fruitions of virtue and evil deeds

Appearing even while it is nothingness, karma is explained by the example of being like a dream:

Primordial purity appearing as nothingness,
Like a painter, karma produces everything.
It follows us everywhere, as a shadow does the body.
Like physical pleasure and pain, it never slips away.
Like a waterfall, it is difficult to deflect.
Making beings rise or fall, it is like the ruler of beings.
It is extremely vast, like the endless space of the sky.
Whether black or white, it never changes at all,
Any more than the white kunda lotus becomes the blue utpala.

Though karmas and kleshas are natureless, they ceaselessly appear. Therefore, they depend on ignorance as their root. The condition is the arising of objects. The cause is connection with the three poisons. The Objects of Mindfulness says:

The ground of karma is ignorance, and if there is insight, one will not come into the power of karma. It is like a skilled and confident painter, who produces a variety of works. The condition is thoughts of objects. Like a monkey, it is very active. Like a fish, it dwells in the ocean of samsara. Like a householder, it collects a variety of habitual patterns. Like illusion, something that does not exist still appears. Like a shadow, it always follows us. Like joy and sorrow, it does not transmigrate. Like a river, it is hard to turn back. Like a king, it can exchange happiness and unhappiness. Like the sky, it is vast. Like utpala and kumut lotuses, one does not become another.

ix) The fruition of profound interdependent arising:

Though examining karmas, they have no nature at all,
Like dreams they are still creators of various joys and sorrows.
Except as mere projections, they have no substance or quality.
Profound dependent arising, infallible cause and effect,
Neither existent nor nothing, they are non-duality.
They ripen as something like the action that was done.
This is the vision of things in their nature and extent.
As it was well-taught by the Omniscient One.

The inner and outer realms are false conceptions. If they are analyzed, even if we look for them, no karma and kleshas are found. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 4.47

If the kleshas are not in objects, the senses, between, or elsewhere,
Where are these harmers of beings? They are like illusion.
Abandon the fear in your heart and try to rely on prajna.

In the absolute there is no karma; but here in the dream-like relative, there is happiness and unhappiness and joy and sorrow are distinguished. If it is discriminated and examined by the mind, karma, beyond existence and non-existence, is like space. Since there is no karma to be accumulated, do not accumulate karma by the mind being confused over and over again. That is the instruction. This presentation is known and taught only by the Omniscient One, and not by the traditions of others. The teacher Bhajya says in his Precious Lamp of Madhyamaka:

Karmas with non-deceptive cause and effect,
As it has been taught, are like a dream.
Bhagavan this is taught by you alone.
Aside from that, it is not explained in treatises.

f. Refuting other wrong conceptions,

There are four sections

1) Eliminating denial of cause and effect.

Now other sorts of wrong conceptions are eliminated:

Those who deny the validity of cause and effect
Are students of the heretics and the nihilists.
Whoever has confidence merely in emptiness
Falls into the extreme of the nihilistic view.
These go lower and lower upon an evil path.
Never liberated from the lower states of being,
They are ever more distant from the happy ones.

Such fools are conspicuous in their pride. Some who do not know the intent of the Dharma say there is no karma and no fruition of karma--within suchness like space they do not exist at all. Giving up virtue, they practice the evil deeds that are natural to them. The Good Army Sutra says:¹³⁸

Those who say there is no karma and no ripening of karma are fools who have only the literal meaning. Those who say this and rely on a great collection of unwholesomeness may promise this Dharma with their mouths, but are not within this Dharma. They rely on the path of the worldly charvakas. They say, "It should be understood as a delusion of Mara."

The Precious Mala says:

In short, a view like this is nihilism.
They say there is no such thing as fruition of karma.
Having no merit, they go to the lower realms.
They are said to be persons with wrong view.

Also it says:

Nihilists like these will go to the lower realms.

2) Refuting the view of emptiness.

Some also say:

"Cause, and effect, and compassion, and the gathering of merit.
With these childish literal Dharmas one will never get enlightened."
They do not speak the truth, whose meaning is like the sky.
The story great yogins tell is "Go and do your practice!"

As for those who say such words:

Such a view is more nihilistic than nihilism.
They are on a path that goes ever lower and lower.
To deny the cause and affirm the effect is very strange!

Even such outsider materialist extremists as the charvaka nihilists do not say that perceived appearances are without cause and effect; you deny a cause of liberation, but still maintain the effect. This is strange. You do this by maintaining that there is liberation because of actionless meditation.

3) Refuting those having the mind of the summit of samsara

When people claim, "it is like space," we should say:

If space is reality, why do we need to meditate?
If not, then meditation is useless drudgery.
If liberation is gained by meditating on nothingness,
Those who have a vacuous mind will get enlightened.
But proclaiming such meditation establishes cause and effect.
Therefore, put aside this bad and inferior path.

Some people claim, "It is like space." If so, and if it is already established, we do not need to meditate. If it is not established, meditation will be of no use. This non-existent thing will never become an existent thing, just as empty space will not later become something else. This is a reply to those who say, "Liberation from the kleshas is attainment of liberation altogether."

Saying it is attained by this alone, postulates that this occurs by cause and effect. Therefore, they cannot say that there is no cause and effect. If it is maintained that there is liberation by meditating on nothingness, even worldly hedonists could be liberated by doing that. The Dohakosha says:

Someone who says, "I have been pierced by an arrow,"
Will never be liberated by having a mind like space.

This refutes such a view, so do not think like that.

4) The true explanation of cause and effect.

Now the true meaning is explained:

The genuine path has interdependence and cause and effect.
This is spontaneous union of prajna and upaya.
Using the means of apparent but natureless cause and effect,
There is the apparent natureless path of meditation.
And thus the apparent natureless fruit can be attained.
Apparent but natureless benefit for sentient beings
Is produced in a way that is apparent but natureless.
This is pure cause and effect, profound in its interdependence.
Therefore, the essence of sutras and tantras of the true meaning
Is that by having united the two accumulations,
And by the two stages of development and completion,
Perfect buddhahood will quickly be established.

From the two accumulations, whose illusion-like appearance is natureless, buddhahood is established. The Knowledge of Illusion Sutra Requested by Supreme Goodness Lady says:

By gathering the illusion-like accumulations,
There will be illusion-like enlightenment.
There will be a performance that is like illusion
Of illusion-like benefits for the sake of sentient beings.

The sutras of the true meaning and all the tantras explain it in the same way. In the tantras, the stages of development and fulfillment establish the two accumulations, and by that one becomes enlightened within the mandala.

C. the final summary:

Therefore, abandon all the aspects of cause and fruition
That have a part in constructing formations of samsara.
But then we should produce with wholehearted diligence
The cause and fruition of the state of liberation.
By that the highest truth and goodness will manifest,
There will be the establishment of enlightenment.

All virtues are to be established. All evil deeds are to be left behind. The goal of life must be made to exist, since one should quickly go to it. The Spiritual Letter says:

With many harms, this life is blown away on the wind.
If even a river of water is impermanent,
Exhaling and inhaling, when we go to sleep,
That we ever awake is really miraculous.

For that reason to do evil to oneself and others is not suitable. To go so far as to do evil deeds for the sake of khenpos, loppöns, and the three jewels, is senseless, since by the evil ripening within us, we will not be able to participate in them. The same text says:

Practice virtue. For the sake of brahmins and gods
For feasting,¹³⁹ fathers and mothers, queen and retinue,
Even for their sake do not do evil deeds,
You will get no reward but ripening in hell.

As for doing any sort of evil deeds,
If this is not cut off at once, as if with a weapon,
When the time of death arrives, then there will manifest
The karmic fruition of all these various evil deeds.

Therefore, even with the elimination of evil actions, it also says:

As for the seeds of these unwholesome activities,
By purifying defilements of body, speech, and mind,
We should earnestly strive with all our present skill.
Not to create an atom of these for any reason,

This cannot be established by anything other than our own powers, or by any association with others.
Accepting good and rejecting evil must come from themselves alone. It is said:

As for liberation depending on oneself,
It does not come from association with another,
If we have learning, discipline, and meditation,
A purified world will thus attain to happiness.
Let us attain a happiness like that of the Bhrama realms.

Completely abandoning through practice of the four dhyanas,
The happiness and sorrow of desiring and acting,
Let us make an effort in the four noble truths.

As to how this should be done, it says:

The proper noble master always day and night
Transcends the ordinary kind of highs and lows.
Not without fruition even in the womb,
By being mindful, anything else will become weaker.
One will always experience kindness, joy, and compassion.
And always meditate in genuine absorption.

Even if it does not please superior ones,
May we attain the happiness of the Bhrama realms.
The happiness and sorrow of desiring and acting,
Completely being abandoned through practice of the four dhyanas,
May purity, radiance, and happiness increase,
And our fortune of fruition be equal to the gods.

Without conception, without attachment and antidotes,
Having the principal virtues of the four dhyana states,
As for the five great virtues and the five non-virtues,
Let us strive to perform the ones that are virtuous.

In a bit of water, a bit of salt will change its taste;
But this is not the case with the stream of the river Ganges.
Similarly, though our evil deeds are very few,
They will be known within the scope of our virtuous roots.

Wild discursiveness and sinking in sluggish depression
Are states that will be harmful to dark and murky minds.
Sleepiness and doubt and yearning with desire,
These five obscurations are thieves of happiness.

However as for faith, pure effort, and mindfulness
The supreme dharmas of samadhi, and the five good prajnas
We should make an effort to manifest all of these.
Then there will be the highest powers and faculties.¹⁴⁰

In that way much that is to be transcended will be transcended, and good dharmas that are true and excellent will be established.

D. the dedication of the merit of this extensive explanation of the aspects of the meaning and what is proper:

Thus with the cooling Dharma rain of mahasukha
May the two accumulations, merit and wisdom,
Grow and flourish widely within the fertile soil,
Of well-manured minds of limitless sentient beings.
Here in samsara, completely filled with karma and kleshas,
May the weary nature of mind today find ease from fatigue.

That is the good aspiration. By the cooling dharma rain of words and meaning, in the field of the minds of sentient beings, by the increase of the good harvest of happiness, may whatever kleshas there may be cleared away, removing the impoverishment of those who have been deprived with accumulating happiness. By the wealth of the sky-treasury of buddha qualities, may our weariness be eased.

By these present teachings the gates of Dharma are opened.
The profound and precious meaning is there to be received.
With the thought that they would benefit others, this was composed.
By them may all sentient beings encounter supreme enlightenment.

Within the sky of mind, the planets and stars of the kleshas,
Improper mental creations, produce the white glow or appearance.
By merit overcoming their luminous/empty nature,
May there come the daylight of the dawn of wisdom.

May the wishes of beings for joy and happiness be fulfilled.
May we cross over the ocean of karma and the kleshas.
May there be effortless increase of all that is good and happy.

Chapter V: Relying on the Spiritual Friend

By the four ordinary preliminaries, one's continuum of mind has been made workable, and by the explanation of the qualities of our enlightened family, the gotra, joy has been produced. Now there is the fifth chapter on the spiritual friend, the one who properly teaches their meaning. Here there are six sections:

- A. Fully relating to the one who teaches the path without error.
- B. The source of all truth and goodness.
- C. The instruction to rely on the holy ones and abandon what is evil.
- D. Avoiding those to be avoided, with those associated with them
- E. Knowing what to accept and reject, and how siddhi is to be received.
- F. The dedication of the merit of the situation.

A. fully relating to the one who teaches the path without error.

Now there is the teaching of the characteristics of the spiritual friend who teaches the way of doing what has just been explained:

Thus the unerring cause and effect of the excellent path
Arises from relating to the holy ones.

Knowing Dharma and adharma, and wholesome and unwholesome, comes from relying on the spiritual friend, or in Sanskrit kalyana mitra. The Sutra of the Display of Noble Ones says:

Kye, O son of noble family, by you the spiritual friend should be pleased. Since he completely knows the collections of merit and non-merit, when there is samsara, he completely clears away its causes.

B. the source of all truth and goodness:

Thus the unerring cause and effect of the excellent path
Arises from relating to the holy ones.
Attainment of the three kinds of enlightenment,
That of victorious ones, together with their sons,
That of the shravakas, and that of the pratyekabuddhas,
Arises from a relationship to spiritual friends.
Also the higher manifestations of samsara,
And whatever happiness may be involved in them,
Arises from relating to the holy ones.
Therefore, we should rely upon the holy ones.

The Sutra requested by Maitreya says:

The liberation of those who are shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and supremely enlightened ones, and as many with the skandha of wisdom as there may be, all these should be understood to arise from relying on the spiritual friend.

Maitreya says:

Moreover, as much benefit and happiness as there may be for sentient beings, it all arises from one's virtuous roots. This should also be understood to arise from the spiritual friend.

C. The instruction to rely on the holy ones and abandon what is evil,

Within this section there are

1. the brief teaching
 2. the extended explanation.
1. the brief teaching

Now there is the instruction to rely on the spiritual friend and abandon evil:

As vines that grow on a sandalwood tree assume its odor,
By relating with holy ones, we ourselves become holy.
Like kusha grass that has its roots in a putrid swamp,
By keeping to bad company, we ourselves go bad.
Therefore sincerely try to relate with holy persons.
And also to abandon evil spiritual friends.

A vine that clings to a sandalwood tree, because of that is tall and fragrant. Kusha grass growing in filth of decayed fish and so on itself becomes nasty. Just so, having seen the benefit and harm that come from relying on holy and unholy ones, as for the instruction to rely on holy ones, the Vinaya says:

As a vine that relies on a sala tree
Will grow to be strong with an aromatic smell
The person who relies on the holy ones
Will be embraced by goodness and shine with splendor.

Also it says there:

When kusha grass is entwined with rotten fish,
And they have not been kept quite far away,
The kusha too will begin to be like the fish.
And similarly what people will become Relying on unholy persons is like that.

2. The extended explanation

There are three sections.

- a. The characteristics of the one to be relied upon;
- b. how one should rely on such a person;
- c. the characteristics of the student who is to be accepted.

- a. the characteristics of the one to be relied upon,

There are eight sections.

- 1) the characteristics of the spiritual friend in general,

Briefly, as for the characteristics of spiritual friends, if it is asked what they should properly be like, first generally, and then in the paramita tradition

What is the proper manner of these holy ones?
As leaders of the world, they cooperate with all.
In going beyond the world, they cooperate with nothing.
In actions of the three gates, they are more noble than anyone.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

If it is asked what spiritual friends should be like, insofar as they are perfect leaders of many sentient beings, if they are seen, it is not inappropriate. Since they are beyond the world, they have nothing in common with anything. Since what they undertake is always beneficial, they accomplish immeasurable benefit.

- 2) Their virtues

If it is asked what their virtues are like:

They are peaceful in body, their actions pure and faultless.
They are skilled in cutting through doubt. Their speech is faultless and pleasant.
Their deep and peaceful minds are a treasury of omniscience.
Compassionate and learned, they are limitless in their virtues.
Vast in ñ, their vision and action are like the sky.
In their buddha activity they are limitless.
All who have a connection with them are benefited.
In kindness they abandon sadness and fatigue,
And for that reason they are constantly diligent.
Beings rely on spiritual friends as ennobling guides.

They benefit sentient beings by many virtues of body, speech, and mind. Their prajña and realization are as deep as space. The undertakings of their Buddha activity plant seeds of liberation in all who are connected with them. By their compassion they look on every one of them like an only child. By the wealth of good qualities of the teachings, they turn the wheel of Dharma of any vehicle to which someone may have devotion. The Madhyamakalankara says:

Spiritual friends are tamed and peaceful--very peaceful.
Replete with effort and qualities, they are rich in teachings.
Having supremely realized these, they are skilled in speech.
Guarding the nature of kindness, they rely on renunciation.

- 3) Their particular characteristics.

In addition to these qualities, among others that they have, the guru of secret mantra also has these:

In particular, as for the marks of gurus of secret mantra,
 They keep their empowerments, vows, and samayas pure and unbroken.
 They reach the other shore of the ocean of tantric instructions.
 They have mastered the four aspects of sadhana
 Propitiation, practice, transforming,¹⁴¹ and buddha activity.
 They have perfected view, meditation, action, and fruit,
 And the nyams, the signs, and heat that accompany realization.
 Very kind, with an excellent grasp of skillful means,
 They establish students in ripening and liberation.
 They are undiminishing cloud-banks of the rain of lineage blessings.
 Rely on such a skilled and accomplished, glorious guru.
 The commentary of the great teacher Vimalamitra, The Mirror-like Net of Miracles says:

Such gurus also have completely attained the empowerments of the outer and inner mandalas. Their vows and samayas are pure. They are learned in the individual meanings of the tantras. They have trained in propitiation and practice, together with the karmic applications. Their view of realization is not obscured. In their meditation, they are familiar with the experiences of the nyams. They are connected to a variety of actions. By compassion they lead students. They have these eight characteristics.

The guru, in addition, because the lineage is unbroken, diffuses an atmosphere of blessings. Therefore this ninth characteristic is taught.

4) The praise by means of examples,

If it is asked how many virtues such a guru has, this is the explanation:

Their buddha qualities are utterly limitless.
 To give only part of the praise that is due to such friends of beings,
 They steer the great ship that crosses the ocean of samsara.
 Incomparable captains of those who journey on that path.
 They remove poverty, like wish fulfilling gems.
 They are the amrita that puts out the fire of karma and kleshas.
 They are the excellent clouds of the cooling rain of Dharma.
 They are celestial thunder, delighting all sentient beings.
 Kings of physicians, they cure the sickness of the three poisons.
 They are a radiant lamp, dispelling the darkness of ignorance.
 They are like a great tree that can fulfill all wishes.
 All the joy of sentient beings arises from them.
 Like an "excellent vase"¹⁴² or a wish-fulfilling gem,
 They spontaneously grant whatever is desired.
 They are the measureless rays that shine from the sun of kindness.
 Removing affliction, they are the light of the moon of benefits.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

Kye, O son of noble family, moreover, because they liberate from the ocean of samsara, they are like ships. They are like captains of those who dwell on the path of liberation. Since they clear away the deteriorations of samsara, they are like a king of wish-fulfilling gems. Since they remove the fires of karma and the kleshas, they are like a river. Since they cause the great rain of Dharma to descend, they are like excellent clouds. Since they make all beings rejoice, they are like the great drum of the gods. Because they clear away the sickness of the kleshas, they are like a king of physicians. Because they clear away all the darkness of ignorance, they are like a lamp. Because they fulfill the hopes of all desires, they are like a wish-fulfilling tree. Because they accomplish all that is wished for, they are like an excellent wishing vase. By their measureless kindness they are like the disk of the sun. Since they cool the torment of the kleshas, they are like the disk of the moon. Since they bestow the wealth of the buddha qualities, they are like the god of wealth

Vaishravana.

5) The praise of their being in accord with the goal.

Vast in realization, they are like an unbroken sky.
Like planets and stars, their samadhi is self-luminous.
The ocean of their kindness is utterly measureless.
Their great waves of compassion flow like the stream of a river.
They are like a snow mountain in their immovable splendor.
They are supremely immovable, like the mass of Mount Meru.
Like lotuses growing in mud, they are not obscured by samsara.
They are kind and loving like a father or mother,
With equanimity toward every sentient being.

Their limitless qualities are a precious treasury.
As leaders of the world, they resemble powerful kings.

The sutra of the supremely vast garland of buddhahood, the Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Kye, sons of the Victorious one, these virtues arising from the spiritual friend are measureless. Since they arise because of opportunities for compassion, they are like the sky. Their collection of many samadhis and dharanis is like the stars. Their immeasurable compassion is like a great, full ocean. Their loving-kindness is immeasurable like a river. Never disturbed by agitation, they are like a snow mountain. Not being moved from suchness, they are like Mount Meru. Since, even when they exist within samsara, they are not obscured by defilements, they are like a great lotus. In the equality of unobscured compassion, they are like a father or mother. Because of their immeasurable buddha qualities, they are like a precious treasure source. Since they completely liberate from all wandering within samsara, they are like the Tathagata. This host of their buddha qualities is beyond measure and limit.

6) The summary.

As for further qualities:

Wherever these gurus dwell, who are the lords of Dharma,
They are the equals of all the buddhas of the world.
By seeing, hearing, or contact, or by remembering them,
Samsara will be subsequently overthrown.
In the immensity of their great waves of buddha activity,
Their burden, like the great earth, supports all sentient beings.

When buddhas arrive in the world, all who see, hear, or remember them, will eventually be established in happiness. Since this is also established by those gurus, they have the same kind of buddha activity. As emanations of the Victorious One, they are explained in the same way. The Great Drum Sutra says:

Do not produce any suffering, be all-joyful.
Do not wail laments, but be all-joyful.
I in later time, will emanate
In the form of the spiritual friend himself,
Producing benefits for you and others.

The Tantra of the Vajra Mirror says:

Chief of the Vajrasattva mandala,
The guru is the equal of all the buddhas.

Without sadness and weariness, like the earth, they produce benefits for sentient beings. Though they see peace, the benefit for oneself, they are not concerned with it, undertaking the benefit of others, even when it is very difficult. The Letter to Students says:

These who strive to do benefits for other persons
Those beings are attentive in their majesty;
They are noble ones who have the power to make beings happy.
Riding on the horse of the splendid, radiant sun,
Those who are bringers of light, proceed in such a way.

Though not piling up burdens, the earth supports the world;
Such, without self-benefit, is the nature of the great ones,
Regarding the tastes of happiness and benefit as one.

By heaped dark clouds of ignorance, beings are disturbed.
Seeing them fall helpless into blazing fires of suffering,
Attentively striving as if those fires flared on their foreheads,
In such matters these those persons are also very skilled.
They know how to benefit other sentient beings.

Even in the Avici Hell, full of tongues of flame,
They enter as joyfully, as if it were snow and moonlight.
As if they swam in a pleasant lake of lotus blossoms
They burn with longing for these collected tongues of flame.

Those who are skilled in dharmic benefits for others,
Have comfort even in a grove with leaves of swords.
The company of divine maidens in a pleasure grove,
Would not produce such happiness as a moment of this.

In order that beings who cannot cross over may cross over,
Entering into the unfordable river Vaitravani¹⁴³
By being touched by the flowing waves of a heavenly river
They would not get the nature of such happiness.

Ornamented by such jewels of good conduct,
In luminosity radiant, with the amrita of peace
Producing the joy of joys, unremembered and hard to find,
Auspiciousness of auspiciousness, they keep the cause of peace.
The flower of speech of the Sugata is always reliable.
From the flower of that tree arises a vast fruition.
The flowers of the Sugata's speech can be relied on.
As bees on honey, they depend on producing joy.

7) The Buddhas' supreme view

The buddha-guru is a fourth to the three jewels.
The guru is Sri Heruka, lord of the mandala.
In benefits of taming beings of this dark age,
Even better than the Buddha, for beings to be tamed.
The vajra master is the root of all the siddhis.
Bow the three gates purely, without hypocrisy.

The Unified Sameness of the Continuums of All the Buddhas says:

With the Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha
The guru is a fourth.

The Universal Secret says:

The heruka who is the lord of the mandala,
The supreme guru's siddhi is very great.

The Immaculate Sky Sutra says:

Ananda, though the sugatas do not appear to all sentient beings, spiritual friends have appeared everywhere, teaching the Dharma and sowing seeds of liberation. Therefore, think of spiritual friends as better than the sugatas.

The Dohakosha says:

The root of all the siddhis is the vajra master himself.

The Great Display of the Wish-fulfilling Gem says:

Thus with devotion and fear to the holy guru,
Always offering all the offerings,
By pleasing him, let us serve the truth itself.

8) the benefits attending on this service

If it is asked what other benefits it has:

Having blocked the path that leads to the lower realms,
They establish us in the fortune of the higher realms.
They benefit us within this life and those to come.
They bless our minds, and so reveal reality.
We are set on the path that ripens and frees within this life.
Therefore with a faith that is always firm and changeless
Always rely on the guru, without fatigue or regret.

They block the lower realms and teach the higher realms. They lead to the level of buddhahood and are always the source of all buddha qualities without deceit or pretence, without holding back or reversing. If one is respectful and reverent to them, special qualities will arise within this life. The Tantra of Subtle Wisdom says:

By always being without hypocrisy
To gurus having all excellent qualities,
If even small offerings are made to them,
This life will be long, and one will have no sickness,
Having excellent and pleasant enjoyments.
Later liberation will be mastered.

The Song of the Oral Instructions of the Inexhaustible Treasury says

E ma! The secret teaching of the dakinis.
All the various Dharmas have but a single meaning.
Embodied in the teacher, the holy guru himself.
Like the lips of faith this supreme Jetsun,
With devoted mind should be received on the heads of virtuous ones.

The guru points to mind collected into one.

What is pointed out is the essence of students themselves.
By realizing all this as suffering in an instant
As for that these conquering heroes by their kindness
See the possible benefit, to actualize their kindness
We should always hold to these kings of all physicians.

From the ocean of samsara so very deep and wide,

There is no other excellent ship that liberates.
Having relied on that holy ship of excellent bliss
The motionless antidote which is esteemed by all.

By the pure rays of the light of wisdom like the sun,
Such an excellent being makes ignorance into insight.
Transforming all dharmas to bliss, like changing grass to gold
Always rely on the guru's wheel turning upaya.

By their mind like rivers dualistic views are overcome.
If we never abandon anything at all,
Unobscured wisdom will thereby fully be possessed.
Resting in uncontrived mind and its phenomena.
Arises from the amrita-presence of the guru.

What to convention is only mind and mental events
These labeled designations in the companions of yogins
Undergo transformation in the guru's lotus presence.
All who abandon the tantras by conventional thinking
Will never know the secret teaching of all the Buddhas

The oral instructions are actually visible to the eye.
They completely pervade the realm of the physical senses.
If one merely touches the dust of the guru's feet,
One will later gain understanding of all wisdom.

The guru releases a thousand¹⁴⁴ arrows of piercing dharmas
A thousand empty apparent transforming skillful actions.
By prajña appearances to be comprehended¹⁴⁵ are seen
As for that prajña, it arises from the pure master.

The kleshas are supremely transformed by skillful means
Any tormenting thoughts that cannot be transformed
From the essence instructions are able to be renounced.
This too will be attained by the power of the jetsun.
Therefore whatever lineage blessings we may have,
Let us always rely on them with skillful means.

b. how one should rely on the guru

There are two sections,

the teaching by example:

1) If it is asked why one should rely on such a guru:

Just as those who are ill are in need of a king of physicians,
As the people need a ruler, and travelers need companions,
As merchants needs captains, and different sailors need each other.
In order to calm the kleshas and render evil harmless,
So that birth and death will be annihilated,
So that the two benefits are established spontaneously,
So that we can cross the ocean of samsara,
Therefore we should place our reliance on the guru.

As in sickness we rely on a physician, we rely on the guru pacify the illness arising from the kleshas; As ordinary people rely on a king, the guru guards against harm. As travelers rely on a guide, the guru liberates from the dangers of birth and death. As merchants rely on a ship-captain, the guru accomplishes benefit for self and other. As mariners rely on companions, the guru helps beings cross the river of samsara.

2) The explanation of how one should rely on the guru in relying on the guru as on a physician, first as for relying on the guru as one relies on a physician because of illness:

The physician is the guru; the medicine of instructions,
Should be applied to the sickness of our samsaric perception.
Serious effort is the way of using it.
Peace and happiness are the fruit of curing the illness.
Such a way of reliance is of higher measure than others.
Therefore, rely on the guru with these four comprehensions.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

O son of noble family, you should guard yourself from perception of disease. Perception of the medicine of Dharma should be guarded. The perception should be produced that in diligent practice, the disease is completely cured. Perception of the spiritual friend as a capable physician should be produced.

Also, son of noble family, you should produce the perception of yourself as ordinary. You should produce the perception of fearlessness in the Dharma. You should produce the perception that in diligent practice, torments are completely pacified. You should produce the perception of the spiritual friend as a king. Also, son of noble family, You should produce the perception of yourself as a traveler. You should produce perception of the gift of fearlessness in the Dharma. You should produce the perception that in diligent practice you are liberated from all fear. You should produce the perception of the spiritual friend as a warrior-escort.

Also, son of noble family, you should produce the perception of yourself as a merchant. You should produce the perception of the Dharma as your wares. You should produce the perception that in diligent practice you are making great profits. You should produce the perception of the spiritual friend as your ship-captain.

Also, son of noble family, you should perceive yourself as a ship-passenger. You should perceive the Dharma as a ship. You should perceive that in diligent practice you reach the other shore of the river. You should produce the perception of the spiritual friend as a skillful friend.

Also it says there:

Son of noble family, with all reverence toward the spiritual friend, produce a mind immune to sadness like the earth, a mind like vajra, which is not susceptible to any harm, a mind like a student who never closes the mind against any speech, the mind of a servant who does not go against any command that is heard, and produce a mind without arrogance like cutting off the horns of a bull.

Of these the Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.102

As for spiritual friends, who are ever-virtuous
They are skilled in the meaning of mahayana
And the excellent discipline of a bodhisattva
Even to save one's life, one should never forsake them.

Within the Biography of Shri Sambhava
It is taught how we should rely upon the guru...

c. the characteristics of students that are to be accepted

There are two sections concerning

- 1) Students to be rejected
- 2) Students to be accepted.

- 1) Students to be rejected

There are two topics.

- a) those who are bad vessels:

On the other hand, Ill-starred disciples will be the ground of all evils.
 They are without shame and they are without faith.
 Having no decency, they have but little compassion.
 Both by nature and nurture, their behavior is ill-starred.
 Their actions, thoughts, and emotions are coarsened by the five poisons.
 With crazed distortions of Dharma, Adharma, good, and evil.
 Not keeping their vows and samayas, they have no antidote.
 Utterly stupid, all but mindless, nearly insatiable,
 Their angry words and hostility are forever-increasing.
 They relate to gurus with five perverted perceptions.
 They see the gurus as musk-deer, and Dharma as musk.
 They see themselves as hunters. Their efforts are shot like arrows.
 As for the fruition of having accomplished Dharma,
 They think they will profit by selling their prize to someone else.
 But without samaya, they will suffer here and hereafter.

Students of bad fortune are vessels of many defilements. They have little shame or faith. They have little decency or compassion. Their family and nature are bad. Their conduct and fortune are bad. Their minds and kleshas are coarse. They reverse virtue and vice and turn the instructions upside down. They do not keep their vows and samayas. Not shutting the doors of the kleshas, they obscure the antidotes. With little prajña, they are hard to please. Their anger, harsh speech, and selfish attitudes always increase. They strive in adharmic actions. They shame the Buddha. They disgrace the Dharma. Their secret mutilations of the sangha undermines the life of the guru. Completely unpacified, they endanger everyone. In particular, in their murderousness, they are like hunters. They receive precepts from the loppon with this approach alone, if there are others, they think " With this and that faults, they are like animals." Saying, "that Dharma is one I have heard over and over," they think they are better than anyone else, and regard it as like musk. They delight in shaming others who are not perfect in the learning of that Dharma and especially in killing them. Because they have few resources they sell and barter so that this life is not auspicious for them. Later they wander in the lower realms.

The commentary to the Tantra of the Presentation of Samaya says:

They disparage the vajra master of the secret mantra
 They like to sell the Dharma for power, food, and wealth.
 By their family nature, they do not keep samaya.
 For them this life will be short, as they damage glory and fortune.
 By the dakinis' retribution, they will suffer.
 Later they will fall into the lower realms.

- b. What occurs if there is no examining .

Also if students are ill-starred:

Some enter students at random, without examination.
 At first they speak virtuously; but later they disparage.
 With black-motivated mixtures of public and private actions,
 They deviously slander the retinue of the guru.
 In fruition they will go to the Avici Hell.

Without first examining the continuum of student and guru, a teacher may accept such students. When they are newly associated, they speak reverently and respectfully. Then, angered by some little slight, they blame, speak harshly, and when alone, they indulge in frivolous faults. They disparage everyone in the guru's retinue. Some publicly make a false display of praise and respect, but mentally nurse their lack of faith and respect. As they revile the guru with hidden agendas and deceitful wiles, there is immeasurable harm. The Fifty Verses on the Guru says:

In the Avici Hell and similar fearful places
Those unfortunate beings inhabiting such hells
Are those who have denigrated and cursed the guru
That they stay there long is well and truly taught.

2) students who should be accepted.

There are twelve sections about the characteristics of good students

a) Those who are special vessels:

Students of good fortune live in faith and prajña.
Diligent and careful, always conscious of evil.
Not going beyond the command, guarding their vows and samayas.
The three gates, body, speech, and mind, are tamed.
They are always very compassionate in their thoughts.
Spacious, forbearing, and generous; great in sacred outlook.

Steadfast and very devoted, the benefits of their having pleased the guru are measureless. The Sutra of the Ornament of the Wisdom of Maitreya says:

O sons or daughters of noble family, some who have excellent faith, if they have reverence for the guru, have an immeasurable heap of merit more limitless than that of those who have made offerings to all the buddhas for as many kalpas as there are grains of sand in the Ganges River.

The Holy Wisdom Tantra says:

Compared to offering to the buddhas for kalpas,
If part of a single body-hair of the guru is anointed with a single drop of oil,
The heap of merit is much higher than that.

This is because the guru is a special object. The Embodiment of the Intention says

More than the buddhas of a thousand kalpas
The guru should be known to be a friend.
Why? Because All of the buddhas of those kalpas
Arise in dependence on the guru's virtues.
Previously, before there was a guru,
Even the name of "Buddha" did not exist.

b) Thinking of the guru's virtues, confessing, and vowing to refrain

Such students:

They are always mindful of the virtues of the teacher.
They never think of the teacher as having any faults.
Even if they see some, they think of them as virtues.
They think from their hearts that surely these are their projections, Confession and vows to refrain serve as their antidote.

If there is the slightest non-faith, they think of it as a projection with the nature of a dream. They think that certainly the guru does not really have these faults. If even in a dream they do not have faith in the conduct of the guru, as soon as they awaken from sleep they confess it. The Play of the Waterfall of Samsara says:

If even in a dream, faults are seen in the guru,
As soon as one awakes, if one does not confess,
This will proliferate as the cause of the Avici Hell.

If such thoughts arise during the day, instantly, or within a minute or a day, one should confess. Then for every fault in one's mind one should think of a hundred virtues. Likewise one should express them all.

c) Abandoning what does not please the guru and asking what is to be done

What does not please the guru and anything like it should be abandoned. One should try to do what will be pleasing:

They reject every aspect of what does not please the guru.
And try to please the teacher in any way they can.
Neither do they ever break the teacher's command.
They always treat the teacher's retinue like the teacher.
They do so even in cases where they are personally lower.
They do not take these or the teacher's servants as their students.
Instead they request empowerments and explanations of Dharma.

They abandon what does not please the teacher and accomplish what does. What is taught by these words must be done. The former text says:

Even if one has faults, if one's acts accord with these words
There will be real benefit. Why mention this should be done? In the retinue even those who one would say are below one
Are treated like the guru. They are not gathered as students. Instead one asks them for Dharma-teachings and empowerments, Requesting ordinations, fire-offerings, and such.

Another text says:

The lesser ones of the guru, are treated like the guru

It is as is said here and elsewhere.

As for the discipline of bodily behavior in his presence,

d) Their behavior:

Their body, speech, and mind are controlled before the teacher.
They sit respectfully and never turn their backs
They smile and do not show any black and angry looks.

The Three Stages says:

In the guru's presence, proper bodily action
Is to sit cross-legged and never turn one's back.
Faces should be smiling, never angry or sinister.
In brief we should be mindful of our every action.

e) They control all faults of speech.

Moreover, as for frivolous speech and so forth:

They do not speak frivolously, nor utter lies and slander.
They do not tell others' faults with harsh and unpleasant speech,
Nor speak any words that are not considered or to the point.

They have nothing to do with joking and humorous banter and idle chatter, repeating rumors, divisive false words, running down other people and so forth. Even if these are true, the speaker will attain great unhappiness. Why so? The guru will condemn them, and there will be quarrels. By quarrelling with the guru, even momentarily, great damage will be produced. The same text says:

Anything connected with careless words
Should not ever be said before the guru.
An ordinary person, if he is angered,
Will fall by that into the occasional hells.

Whoever contradicts the mind of the guru
Will be boiled in deep black utter darkness
For a hundred thousand times ten million kalpas.

As for controlling wrong conceptions in their motivation

f) As for mind:

They are not covetous about the teachers things.
They sheathe the claws of any kind of harmful thoughts.
The various miracles of the guru's actions and conduct
Are not conceived to be a hypocritical sham.
They reject wrong views of the slightest faults and defects
That would be in contradiction with such a view,
By thinking, "This is not right, but the teacher still is doing it.":

They do not greedily think, "if only this which is the guru's were mine! They do not say anything harmful about the guru's retinue, students, patrons, and so forth, since if this came to attention of the guru himself, it would not please him. They are not hypocritical about actions done for the guru's purposes, whether peaceful or harsh, or whether or not they are in accord with worldly convention. They do not think, "This is wrong," or "That is not the proper way," or that the guru's earlier and later words and actions have even the slightest contradiction. The Root Tantra Establishing Wisdom says:

Covetice for the gurus things and retinue
And refuting his close retinue is abandoned.
For sentient beings all his various actions
As beneficial upaya are great miracles.
For the limitless ocean of his intentions and actions
Put aside wrong views, since they do harm.

g) examining one's own faults

Respectfully meditating, reflections arise that because of being unmindful, such actions were done through one's own faults:

Whenever they have shown any anger toward the teacher,
Certain that they have faults, they, therefore examine themselves.
Having confessed their faults they vow to abandon them
Bowing their heads in meditation, they supplicate.
Pleasing the teacher thus, they quickly become accomplished.

Anger toward true spiritual friends is not good. Since when we does evil deeds the spiritual friend is not pleased, thinking, "how did we go wrong," we examines ourselves. We confess and strongly vow to refrain. Generally, anger at anyone certainly depends on ourselves. If we did not exist, this would not arise, like the anger of the people of our continent Jambuling and the northern continent Kurava. Since they see and hear each other and so forth, they are like a drum and a stick. Anger is not proper. One will become the eye-condition of others' evil deeds, and by one's own anger and hatred always arising the seed of hell will be produced.

Therefore, if we are angry with anyone, we should meditate on them above the head. In a few days anger and obscuration will certainly be purified. In particular when there has been improper feelings toward the guru, meditate on him on the top of the head. Having done prostrations and offerings, with complete repentance, shed tears and joining the palms saying, "Kye, kye precious guru,

For me there is no other hope but you.
I supplicate you to look down on me
With your eye of kindness and compassion.
I am oppressed by confusions of ignorance.

Why mention that the three gates are impaired
With complete remorse and repentance I confess.
My three vows have been transgressed and broken.
My mind is covered with damaging defilements

May you purify that by your compassion.
As for me, by unknowing stupidity,
Though I did not seek to, I did wrong,
Previously too I wandered in samsara.

Now by you who are the compassionate guru,
May all my obscurations be cleared away.
For such an unknowing fool as I am now
If when you have seen my abundant faults,
I am not part of your intended kindness,
What other intention could arise for me?

Former victorious ones beyond all counting
Abandoned us and went to liberation.
Now the victorious ones of the ten directions
Having urged you, for our benefit,
When you have emanated as the guru,
If you reject us now and abandon us
Who live as if seduced to a fearful place,
You today will fail us terribly.
Or like a precious wish-fulfilling gem
If we make our supplication to you,
Will you grant whatever is desired?
You are very kind and skilled in means.
Why do not look on us with kindness?
Offerings are made even to flesh-eating demons.

As soon as our true words have been expressed,
If even former anger is put aside,
As for you, compassionate father of beings,
With devoted homage, overwhelmed with longing,
If I confess my faults with sincerity,
Will you not consider me with compassion?
Not all my evil deeds are purified.
If I should go on to other lives,
I shall only burn in the fires of hell.
If you do not purify these deeds,
Compassionate master, how will it be done?
Kye ma Kye 'ud these faults and evil deeds
I supplicate you, purify them all
Instantly when viewed by your compassion
I will receive empowerment and blessing.
The supreme and worldly siddhis will be bestowed.
Obstructing spirits and agents of perversion

And obstacles will all be cleared away,
Establishing all my wishes in this life,
Free from suffering at the moment of death
Immediately when life has been cut off,
I will be free from the terrors of the bardo.
If I do not rectify transgressions,
There will not be this main point of the teachings.

h) Adopting pure and respectful conduct

Further, regarding conduct:

When they see the teacher they arise and prostrate.
They offer the teacher a seat or whatever else is needed.
Joining their palms they praise the teacher with pleasant speech.
Everyone arises as the teacher is departing.
To face in the teacher's direction as a way of showing respect.

They spread out the guru's seat and praise him and join their palms, and when he enters and departs they rise and go to meet him and see him off. This is said in the Vinaya of Holy Dharma

As soon as the preceptor¹⁴⁶ is seen, they should rise from their seats. If they do not rise, they will be born as serpents or creeping things for five hundred generations. This is said in hundreds of places. If they rise and serve him even moderately well they will attain the major and minor marks.

The commentary to the Abhisamayalankara says:

By going to meet the guru, seeing him off, and so forth, they will possess the marks such as the palms of the hands and soles of the feet being marked with wheels.

As for practicing mindfulness and careful attention

As for practicing mindfulness and careful attention

i) when they are with the guru:

Always mindful, very careful, fully aware
With apprehensive awe they stay devotedly,
As shy before the teacher as a new bride with her husband.
Uplifted and not disturbed by an agitated mind,
Not biased and partial, Not seeking profit or fame.
They are not deceitful nor are they dishonest.
By the same token they are not hypocritical.
They do not act differently in private and in public.
They are not pleasant to those who are close, disparaging others.

In the guru's presence, they are completely mindful. They control infractions of body, speech, and mind. Their minds watch their minds, keeping careful control so that they do not become lost in the power of the kleshas. Tamed and peaceful like a new bride or a new monk, their wishes will be established. The Bodhicharyavatara says:
5.40

As for the drunken elephant of mind,
To the great pillar of contemplating Dharma
Tie it so that it does not escape.
With such an effort examine everything.

Keep mind one-pointed any way you can¹⁴⁷

Not losing it for even the space of an instant,
Analyze just what the mind is like;
Thus the mind will be discriminated.

And also: 5.23

As for those who wish to guard the mind,
As for being mindful and aware,
May I guard them even if I die.¹⁴⁸
Thus I join my palms in supplication.

Even alone in one's own house, one should not behave carelessly. One should keep mindful and aware. The buddhas who have the divine eye see us even when we are hidden. The same text says: 5-31-2

The buddhas and their sons the bodhisattvas
Have unobstructed vision of everything.
In the five eyes¹⁴⁹ of these I shall remain.

Thinking that, I feel shame, and reverence,
As well as fear, and these remain with me.

Even at other times and occasions the mind should not move from virtue. The same text says: 5.45ff

As for frivolous talk, there are various kinds.
There are many kinds of wondrous shows.¹⁵⁰
If we enter into every one
Desire¹⁵¹ for that will surely be abandoned.

Uselessly digging the ground will cut the roots¹⁵²
If questions and so forth furrow up the earth,
Having remembered the precepts of the Sugata,
We will surely let them go from fear.¹⁵³

When we want to fidget and move around
Also if we have a desire to talk,
First having examined our own minds,
We should be stable in the proper way.¹⁵⁴

When the mind has any kind of wishes
Or it wants to be angry, at that time,
We should not act and should not speak at all.
We should stay there like a piece of wood.

When we have wildness and discursiveness¹⁵⁵
If we have pride and self-infatuation,
And secret negative thoughts are cultivated,
Or if there is an deceptiveness¹⁵⁶ and cunning.

When we become preoccupied with self-praise,
Or there is disparagement of others,
When we become regretful¹⁵⁷ of such abuse,
We should stay there like a piece of wood.

If we desire possessions, rank, and fame,
If we aspires to servants and retinue,
Or when the mind desires to be served,
we should stay there like a piece of wood.

Wishing decrease or rejection of others' good
And cultivation of our benefit,
When a thought of speaking out arises,
We should stay there like a piece of wood.

When there is fear of impatience or laziness
Similarly of shamelessness, or nonsense,
Or mind attached to partialities,
We should stay there like a piece of wood.

Having examined thoroughly the mind
Of bitter kleshas and useless meaningless struggle,
Then heroically by the antidote,
One should hold the mind completely steady.¹⁵⁸

Completely certain and completely faithful,
Trustworthy,¹⁵⁹ devoted, and respectful.
Having shame and modesty and fear,¹⁶⁰
Try to be peaceful, bringing joy to others.

Not saddened at the mutual discord
Of the desires of children and of fools,
Think, "Produced by kleshas these arise."
Then we feel kindness for these people.

Having in our mouths no senseless thing
Able to handle oneself and sentient beings,
We should always firmly keep the mind.¹⁶¹
As if it were a selfless emanation.¹⁶²

"After so long this is the highest freedom,"
Thinking again and again of that attainment,
Such a mind, remaining like Mount Meru,
Should hold to that completely motionless.

Adharma should not move us from this even for an instant. Since one is devoted to the practice of Dharma because of the guru, one's companions, the khenpo's instructions, fear of the lower realms, and the misery of samsara; by one's effort, mindfulness, awareness, conscientiousness, and many virtues will arise. The same text says: 5.30

Through association with the guru,
And all that has been taught by the preceptor
And devotion coming from the good fortune of fear,
Mindfulness will easily arise.

Having produced virtue and veneration for the guru, and eliminated partiality, desire for wealth and fame, hypocrisy, deceitfulness, and saying different things when people are near and far away, one will always be the same to everyone. Therefore one will perfect the accumulations and purify the obscurations without distinction.

j) Showing reverence by the three pleasings:

If they are wealthy, they make offerings to the guru
Otherwise serving with body and speech, respect and reverence.
They abandon this life's values and please the teacher with practice.

The best is to serve with practice. The intermediate with body and speech, and the lesser with material things. One should truly do any of these that are appropriate.

They reverse the strayings of others through skillful means:

If others insult the guru, they refute their words.
If they cannot, they think of his virtues again and again.
They cover their ears, but try to benefit these with compassion.
They will not gladly speak any words that do not support him.

If anyone says something bad, they reverse it through skillful means. If they do not have the power to do so, they think of the guru's virtues, and covering their ears with their fingers, they will not attend, listen, or ask about it. The Tantra of the Arising of Amrita says:

If people should insult the vajra master,
By peaceful or wrathful action they reverse it.
If they do not have the power to do so,
They will cover their ears with mindfulness.
They do not pay attention or talk with them.
If they ask any questions about these things,
They will be boiled in the lower realms.

As for telling the benefits of having done this

These are the benefits:

Thus they accomplish benefits in all their lives.
They meet with holy persons and hear the highest Dharma.
They are perfectly filled with the wealth of various qualities
Of the paths and bhūmis, dharanis, and samadhis,
Providing beings with a feast of happiness and peace.

The Gandavyūha Sutra says:

Kye, son of noble family, because one is supported by the spiritual friend, one always feels reverence, and therefore there is mindfulness. For the host of sentient beings benefit and happiness is produced. Spiritual friends are encountered. The holy bhūmis, paths, and samadhis are accomplished.

D. Beings to be avoided, along with those associated with them

There are six sections.

1. the instruction to abandon evil spiritual friends.

Now there is the instruction to abandon evil spiritual friends together with those associated with them:

Thus by proper relationship with holy persons,
Abandon all evil people and evil spiritual friends.
A teacher without the qualities described above
Gone wrong because of faults, breaking vows and samayas,
With little kindness, compassion, prajña or learned knowledge,
Is indolent and lazy, unaware and ignorant.
Proud and arrogant, with harsh and vicious disdain,
They are coarsened by kleshas and venomous with the five poisons.
Concerned with this life only, they throw the next away.
Although they may seem to be teachers of the holy Dharma,
In fact they are of the deceitful family of adharma.
As bees are driven far away by a heap of filth,
Such gurus drive students, however many, far away.
Trusting them leads on perverted paths to the lower realms.

Whoever wants liberation should not rely on them.

Such persons break their vows and samayas and have little compassion or learning. They are as lazy as they are proud. Their jealous disdain and five poisons are rude and coarse. They seek retinue, possessions, and fame in this life. Even when they stay alone, a rain of distracting activities and kleshas falls around them everywhere. They throw concern with the next life far away. They disparage everyone but themselves, and all dharmas but their own. Their language is that of the Dharma, and they make a display of being extremely skilful, but in reality, no one's mind is benefited. Therefore, both their words and sense are in error. Theirs is the family of charlatans. Like someone piling up a dung heap, they collect a numerous retinue like bees. However since they lead those who have faith and want liberation to the lower realms, give them a wide berth. The Sutra of the Treasury of Buddhahood says:

Worldly enemies only rob us of our lives. We only lose our bodies, and do not also fall into the lower realms. Ignorant persons who dwell on wrong paths lead those who aspire to virtue into hell for a thousand kalpas. Why so? Because practicing a Dharma of things and characteristics, they teach a mistaken Dharma.

They take the lives of all sentient beings, and when they teach their mistaken Dharma, they do great evil.

2. Abandoning friends and associates who are evil-doers

Following that is the instruction to abandon evil friends:

Evil-doer companions should also be abandoned.

The more we are their companions, the farther evil spreads.

The wholesome is obscured, and kleshas fall like rain.

The upper realms are blocked and the lower cultivated.

Holy ones are reviled with hatred for white Dharmas.

Evil is praised and there is reliance on black Dharmas.

They praise those who are equal to them in the fortune of evil.

They always lead on perverted paths to the lower realms.

Those who have sense and vision should keep them far away.

To the extent one deals with them, evil deeds increase, and evil-doers are supported and praised. Since these people have left virtue far behind, they will fall into the lower realms, and so they must be abandoned. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

What are evil companions? They are those who decrease virtue and are joined to non-virtue. One should not associate with them. One should not attend on them. One should not even see them.

Also it says there:

The shravakas are those who benefit themselves.

In benefiting themselves they abandon others' benefit.

Attending them will lead to materialistic gathering.

This will never produce accumulation of Dharma.

Those are bad spiritual friends and their students bad companions.

One should abandon them, and keep them far away.

3. The benefits of abandoning evil spiritual friends and companions

Here are the benefits of abandoning and not associating with them:

By abandoning evil companions and evil spiritual friends,

Happy and virtuous qualities are established here and hereafter.

Happiness never diminishes, but always increases farther.

The path of profundity, liberation, is completed.

We will never see any persons who are evil.

But instead will see the lord sugatas, with their retinue of their sons.
Thinking of us considerably, they will give us blessings.
When we live a wholesome, life we go to the higher realms.
Having such qualities as thought cannot encompass.

The Instruction in 8,000 Lines says:

Subhuti, the virtues of abandoning evil companions are beyond the scope of thought. Virtue will always be performed. Tathagatas will be seen. Happiness will be produced during our lives. Afterwards we shall be born in the higher celestial realms. In all our lives, we will never be separated from apprehension of bodhicitta. Unsurpassable, complete, perfect enlightenment will manifest continually.

4. The summary:

We should always relate with virtuous and holy friends.
Because of them our wholesome karma will increase.
Karma and kleshas diminish and evil will be stopped.
We reach the end of samsara, and higher things manifest.
Then what is good and true will come to be established.
In this life there is happiness, and afterwards fruition.
We are ever-successful leaders of gods and human beings.

The Vinaya says:

Conduct like that of Bhrama is holy association. One reaches the activity of Bhrama. By the increase of virtuous roots, there will be a cause according with complete liberation. There will be respect from those who possess life.

And along with that:

One should attend them with fear.

The Sutra on Going to Mindfulness of Dharma says:

By relying on spiritual friends, mindfulness and awareness will be completely pure. The virtuous roots will be completely perfected.

5. The instruction to attend on spiritual companions:

By relying on wholesome companions and wholesome spiritual friends,
Wholesomeness increases and wholesome fruitions are gained.
One is not afraid of samsara, having measureless benefits.
The limitless wealth of beings' two benefits is established.
A leader is emanated by the victorious one,
Having such an appearance in this time of the dark age.
Therefore, until we attain the essence of enlightenment,
We should rely on holy persons, such as these.

The Sutra on Supreme Ultimate Samadhi

O son of noble family, Moreover, in later lives, at a later time, I myself, will emanate as spiritual friends and display these samadhis. Therefore, since the spiritual friend is your teacher, until being within the complete essence of enlightenment, one should rely on the spiritual friend, offering respect and due ceremony.

6. The explanation of the virtues of properly relying on them

As for the virtues of this:

By that unbiased sacred outlook will arise.

We will be versed in kindness, compassion and bodhicitta. There will be increase of the nyams and realization.

Whatever measureless benefits for others one can think of

Will thereby be accomplished in the proper way.

The Sutra requested by Jewel-Crown says:

O son of the gods, by attending on the spiritual friend and showing him veneration, all the buddha fields will be seen. The holy samadhi of the great compassion will be attained. One will become inseparable from the prajñāparamita. One will completely ripen sentient beings. One will attain complete accomplishment of all hopes.

By these teaching one should know how to rely on the nature of the guru.

E. Knowing what is to be abandoned and accepted, and how the siddhis are received.

There are five sections:

1. How to practice,
2. How to propitiate,
3. The accumulation of action,
4. The particular details,
5. The benefits.

1. How to practice.

- a. how, after this is known, the siddhis are received:

Here is how to supplicate and meditate:

We should constantly gather the two accumulations.

Also the two obscurations should constantly be cleansed.

By day on top of the head, at night within the heart,

Mentally offer and make supplications to the root guru,

Ornamented with all the major and minor marks,

As being non-dual with the yidam that you venerate

And with the assembly of the dakinis.

Surrounded by lineage gurus, dakas, and dakinis.

The Embodiment of Everything Precious Tantra says:

More than one who for a hundred thousand kalpas

Meditates on a hundred thousand deities

It is better to think of the guru just a little.

The merit of this is utterly limitless.

The great master Padmasambhava bestowed this teaching as an oral instruction. As to how this should be done, if one continually supplicates, the unity of guru, yidam, and dakini will be established. The guru there blesses. The yidam bestows supreme siddhi. The dakinis remove obstacles and are the chief establishers of the ordinary siddhis.

Sitting on a comfortable seat, after taking refuge and arousing bodhicitta, from emptiness visualize yourself vividly as your yidam. Adorning the crown of the head, on a lion, sun, and moon throne, is the root guru, blazing with radiance and splendor, surrounded by the gurus of the ultimate lineage and all who have a Dharma connection with it. Visualize that heaps of clouds of dakinis gather. When one has rejoiced in the elaborations, invite the jñānasattvas, make offerings and praises, and confess evil deeds. In brief:

Guru, you who are the precious Buddha
Yidam, with the host of dakinis,
Devotedly we prostrate and go for refuge.
We make the outer, inner, and secret offerings.
We confess our evil deeds without remainder.
We rejoice in all the host of virtues,
We ask the turning of the wheel of dharma.
We ask the gurus not to pass into nirvana.
And to bestow the supreme and worldly siddhis.
Clear away gekes and agents of perversion.
May complete enlightenment be established.

say that three times.

b. The manner of propitiation.

Then when one recites the mantra:

First say O_ and then the guru's sanskrit name.
Next say AH H__, followed by what it is you want.

OM AH H__, are the primordial, spontaneous presence of the essence of the body, speech, and mind of all the buddhas. After inserting this into your meditation, recite it. If you know how to translate the guru's name into sanskrit, do so. If you do not know, having inserted the name itself, afterward say what you wish for.

For pacifying say SHANTI_ KU RU YE SVAHA; for enriching PUSTI_ KURU YE SVAHA; for magnetizing, VASHA_ KURU YE SVAHA; for destroying MARAYA PHAT. For example, for guru Padmasambhava and enriching you would say: OM VAJRA GURU PADMASAMBHAVA A H__ KARMA PUSTI_ KURU YE SVAHA. Moreover practice externally for peaceful; innerly for semi-wrathful, and secretly for wrathful practice. The intention is nirmanakaya, sambhogakaya, and dharmakaya.

c. The activity practices

Within the activity practices are pacifying, cultivating and enriching, magnetizing and drawing in, and destroying, with their visualizations, post-meditation, and signs of accomplishment.

1) Pacifying

As for the first, now from the teachings of applying the four karmas, as for the first:

To pacify sickness and dōns, obscurations and evil deeds,
Visualize that you emanate white light rays everywhere.
Think that the desired siddhi has been attained,
While everything that is contrary has been pacified.

At the time of pacifying, from white gurus, from all points emanate white light rays. Gurus and yidams fill the sky. By the murmur of mantra, think that the siddhi of pacifying is attained.

2) Enriching:

For the karma that increases splendor, life, and wealth,
Visualize yellow rain that falls as all you desire.

Think of everything as yellow. A rain of wealth, life, and so forth falls. Thinking that our dwelling places and bodies are pervaded, do the recitation.

3) Magnetizing:

As for the powers that can summon and magnetize,

Visualize rays of a vivid red in the shape of hooks.

For subjugating, drawing in, making enter, and all such powers of magnetizing, light rays of karma like hooks invite whatever one desires. Thinking that they are beneath one's feet, recite the mantra.

4) Destroying:

For the action of destroying gekes and harm,
Visualize blue-black rays, that emanate as weapons
Or a conquering wheel of fire that has a thousand spokes.

If obstructions of dōns, gekes and so forth arise, blue-black light rays emanating everywhere as a collection of weapons make the dōns and gekes into dust. Where you are, in the space of the sky visualize a wheel of fire with a thousand radiating spokes. Having heaped up and drawn in the harmful spirits, it pulverizes them into dust.

5) In particular:

Visualize that the billion worlds are in trembling motion,
Quaking with the vibration of the recitation of mantra.
Perform the appropriate practice of the developing stage,
To facilitate and accomplish these various desired karmas.

Visualize that by the self-existing vibration of the sound of mantra roaring like fire or water all the worlds tremble and are disrupted. This should accord with the particular complete visualization of the developing stage for the individual one of the four karmas being practiced.

6) Afterward:

At the end collect the details in conceptionless emptiness.
Then you should relax for just a little while,
Dedicating the merit to enlightenment.

The external world is gathered into the form of the deity. That is gathered into oneself. Oneself is gathered into the guru on top of the head. That too rests in the conceptionless state of the mere completion stage. After that the merit is dedicated to enlightenment.

At night, one meditates within the essence, so that afterwards the confused dreams of sleep will arise as luminosity.

7) How by meditating in this way signs of with the individual karmas arise:

For each of the karmas, there are particular signs of success.
This is the path of profundity, ocean of mahasukha.

The signs of sickness and dōns being pacified are dreams of bathing, dripping pus and blood, wearing white clothes, and so forth. The signs of enriched life are heaps of grain, good harvests, the sun and moon rising, and so forth. The signs of increasing enjoyment are a rain of jewels, symbols of birth, harvest and so forth. The signs of magnetizing are many people prostrating, praises and so forth. The signs of pacifying harm are great blazing fires, sentient beings being killed and boiled, victory in battle, and so forth. In reality, what accords with what one wants actually arises.

4. The particular details.

There are six sections.

a. Emanating the buddha field.

Now from the explanation of the particular details, in particular, when sickness, dōns, obstacles, and premonitions of death arise:

In particular, when you encounter sickness and dōns,
 When obstacles arise or premonitions of death,
 Visualize the guru in the space in front,
 Inseparable from the Buddha, with a radiantly smiling face.
 Seated on a lotus throne supported by lions,
 Which arouses within one a state of fearlessness,
 The guru is surrounded by the teachers of the lineage,
 As well as by the dakinis and bodhisattvas.
 Below the affectionate and compassionate lord guru
 Are the various the samsaric beings within the six realms,
 Who throughout the three times have been ones fathers and mothers.

When one sees one's death or when strong attacks of sickness or dōns occur, visualize the guru in the space in front of you, inseparable from the Buddha, surrounded by the lineage gurus and hosts of dakas and dakinis. Below them are the beings of the six realms who have been one's fathers and mothers, together with the harmful dōns and gekes. Invite the jñanasattvas. Perform abbreviated offerings and praises.

b. increasing and purifying the substances:

A syllable H__ at the crown of the head is one's own mind.
 From it there emerges the body of a heruka.
 Holding in his hands a razor-knife and a skull cup.
 He cuts off one's skull, beginning with the forehead,
 By the little tuft of hair that grows between the brows.
 It is placed on a hearth that is made of a tripod of skulls,
 And then it is filled with one's body's flesh and blood and bones.
 From above falls a rain of amrita; below a fire blazes.
 The skull fills up with amrita, that equals the billion worlds.

Visualize that from a white syllable H__ at the top of the head, which is one's own mind, emerges a white heruka. In his right hand is a sword,¹⁶³ and in his left a skull cup. With the sword, he cuts one's body in two, starting from between the eyes. The skull is placed on a hearth made from a tripod of skulls and filled with the body's flesh and blood. Below, from YA_, wind stirs. From RA_ fire blazes so that the contents of the skull boil. From above, amrita continuously falls, equaling the billion worlds.

c. Inviting the guests:

One's own mind by emanating countless herukas,
 Distributes amrita to all at once, from out of the skull.
 When the enlightened guests have all been satisfied,
 The accumulations are perfect and siddhi is attained.
 When the samsaric guests have all been satisfied,
 The beginningless production of samsara is pacified.
 In particular when the harmful dōns are satisfied,
 The blockage of obstacles will be pacified.
 As all-satisfying light rays penetrate into oneself,
 Sickness and dōns are pacified, and obstacles, just as they are.
 One thinks that death is thwarted, and siddhi is attained.

Visualize that one emanates as many graceful hands as there are guests, and by making offerings to all of them at once they enjoy it. The buddhas and so forth beyond the world are pleased, and siddhi is attained. The six lokas are pleased and karmic debts are paid. Dōns are pleased and their afflictions cease. By the light rays of the enjoyment of all these beings penetrating oneself, all sickness, dōns, and obstacles are pacified.

d. The dedication:

Afterwards rest the mind in objectless meditation

In dharmadhatu, the state of mind without conception,
Let things go into their natural purity as illusion.

The guests, the offerings, and the one who offers are all one's own mind. Just so, when one knows that all dharmas are not other than the simplicity of one's own mind, one should meditate and let all dharmas go into¹⁶⁴ to their illusion-like state.

e. The virtues of this inner feast offering of the kusulu yogins:

By this unfavorable conditions are pacified.
We perfect the accumulations, and remove the obscurations.
Limitless blessings and realizations are born within us.
With no grasping ego, the mind renounces and focuses Everything that one has wished for has been accomplished.
Now the phenomenal world arises as the guru.
With sickness annihilated, there is clear luminosity
The realized state of the moment of death has been established.
One is liberated within the bardo-state,
And the wealth of the two benefits have been perfected.
Therefore, wholeheartedly try to establish this realm of the guru.

That is the instruction. As for other benefits, all violations are appeased. The supreme divine offering occurs. Since the mind of ego-grasping is removed, the destruction of the confusions of dualistic grasping is immeasurable.

f. The reason,

Now, to set forth the reason for these great benefits:

It has been said that remembering the guru for a moment,
Is better than a kalpa of the developing stage.

The Play of the Perfected Sphere says:

Though some person for ten million kalpas
Meditates on the bodies of deities,
One who remembers the guru, the master of all,
Is still better, so it is explained.

5. The benefits,

a. Since the guru is the ground of all virtues, there is the admonishment rely on him

This is the instruction to rely on such a guru:

This is the actual basis of splendor and of wealth,
From which arise clouds of benefit and happiness.
Whoever wants amrita-rain throughout the three levels,
Should rely on those who are compassionate.

The omniscient Buddhas are the true glory of themselves and others. By the deathless wealth of Dharma they protect beings, and they possess limitless good qualities. From these numerous clouds of benefit and happiness in the three realms falls the rain of the three turnings of the wheel of Dharma. Those who wish to obtain this should rely on the spiritual friend. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

Subhuti, Those who wish to attain omniscience should rely on the spiritual friend.

The Prajñāparamitasamgatha says:

Why should one always rely on competent gurus?
The qualities of competence rise from them.

As for the three turnings, the Buddha Bhagavat taught these dharmas after seven weeks of seven days. The first week he merely sat in cross-legged posture. The second, he saw the field of the essence, enlightenment. The third he trod nearby upon Jambuling. The fourth, he trod far away on the billion worlds. The fifth, he went to the dwelling of the king of nagas, Grasping and Rejecting. The sixth he remained in the grove of the field to be liberated.

Uncompounded, profound, peaceful, simple, and clear.
This amrita-like dharma I have obtained.
There is no one who will understand it.
Not speaking, I shall remain alone in the forest.

So he said and remained there. Bhrama offered him a melon and honey, but he did not take the vessel. Four kings offered four stone begging bowls at one time, and were blessed. After he ate, he spoke only words of auspiciousness. On the seventh day, Bhrama and Indra supplicated him, and then when he had gone to Varanasi, for the five excellent disciples he turned the wheel of the four noble truths together with the instructions on the divine eight-fold path.

At last in the dwellings of the gods and nagas, and the cities Kumuda Saljin and so forth he turned the wheel of the dharma of true meaning.

These three turnings were taught at various uncertain places. They were intended for those of lesser, intermediate and greater powers; or for those first entering the path, while they remained on it, and those who had the final goal, the essence. The three pitakas were taught in the style of the expressor and the three trainings of disciplines, samadhi, and prajña are the three subjects of learning expressed.

Some teachers say he turned the three wheels of dharma at one time, and in different appearances to different individual beings. That the sutras of existence and non-existence were explained in separate years is not right. The particular great treasury of explanation, is maintained to have continued until he was eighty years old. The Buddha' parinirvana or passing is claimed to have been at the age of eighty years and three months. The *Chörten Gyepa*¹⁶⁵ says:

Three months after he was supplicated by Tsunda
I prostrated to the nirvana-made chörten.

Some other teachers maintain that it was at eighty-two. That really it was three months and eighty years is taught in many sutras. As for the eighty, the Treasury of Explanation says:

The places of the turnings,
The city of Vaishali,
Sakarchen¹⁶⁶ and the heavens,
Jipasön¹⁶⁷ and Kaushambhi,
In verdant Highland pastures,
By stupas and in mountains,
At Radiant Grove and Drarche¹⁶⁸
The city of Kapalivastu.
In these Buddha Shakyamuni, the most excellent of beings
Dwelt from year to year.
Two in the Blazing Cave,
Three in the Medicine Grove.
Five in the royal court.
Six in ascetic practice.
Twenty three in Shravasti.
Twenty nine in elegance.
After eighty years,
The Victorious One, the Sage,
The Supreme One went beyond suffering.
To those places of merit

The dwellings of omniscience,
Ceaselessly offering bows
In body, speech and mind,
Devotedly I prostrate.

b. The instruction to do as was done formerly:

To pacify the kleshas in the space of mind,
Accustomed to their torment from beginningless time,
We should seek the dharma, as formerly was done by Sadaprarudita and Sudhana.
Abandoning sorrow and weariness, rely on spiritual friends.

Until we are without karma and the kleshas, in order to pacify these we need to attend on a guru better than ourselves. This is because we need higher qualities. As to how this is done, in the city "Arising Place of Happiness," was a master merchant Nor Rambu Ten¹⁶⁹ who had a son Sudhana who from his southern lineage went to all southern places. By his always seeking the Dharma, it was prophesied that he would become the Prince of Jambuling and so forth, and so he was blessed by fifty-four gurus. Afterwards he was taught by fifty-four more gurus, so he relied on a hundred and eight.

The bodhisattva Sadaprarudita when he was seeking the prajñāparamita squeezed his body. He stayed in a chariot with five hundred merchants' daughters. When they had come to the eastern city of Possessing Incense he made offerings to the bodhisattva Noble Dharma. We should do such reverence.

F. The dedication of the merit to sentient beings:

Wearied by the misfortune of following paths that are wrong,
Worse than those of good fortune falling to the amrita
Of the thousand stringed instrument of the lord of the gods,
Calling us to enjoyment of heavenly delights,
May the mind today come to rest in its suchness.

As for the well-arranged garland arising from the teaching-lineage of true spiritual friends who practice the true meaning, the host of beings for a long time have attended bad and defective spiritual friends, and are worn out by samsara. In the pleasure grove of the Buddha Bhagavat, the guru of gods and human beings, by wishing clouds may their weariness be cured.

Attending these spiritual friends who are not genuine,
May the numerous throng who have long gone wrong in samsara.
These many beings who long have wearied their own minds,
Rely on mahasukha, the level of the Conqueror.

Possessing a glorious body like the moon in its fullness,
Beautiful in a wreath of deities, stars, and planets,
With a beneficial white light clearing the kleshas' torment,
May all beings come to rely on that perfect glory.

The Commentary on the Sixth Chapter of the Great Perfection, the Nature of Mind, the Easer of Weariness, "Going to Refuge."

That is the purpose of depending on the authentic spiritual friend, the beginning or foundation of the whole path of the mahayana.

VI Going for Refuge

There are three sections.

- A. The stages of entering the path of mahayana
- B. The particular objects of refuge
- C. The dedication of the merit of going for refuge.

A. The stages of entering the path of mahayana,

Now from the teachings I have composed, there are the stages of how to enter into the path of the mahayana. First we should learn a bit about these:

Having properly relied upon a spiritual friend,
We should learn the stages of the path to liberation.

Why? Because it is not workable to enter all at once. If the lower virtues of the path have not arisen, it is impossible to obtain the higher ones. Therefore, if one does not ascend gradually, the higher ones will not be reached. The Nirvana Sutra says:

Just like the steps of a staircase,
My profound teachings likewise
Should be gradually thoroughly learned
Rather than all at once.

Just as for little children
Standing straight is gradually mastered,
We gradually enter this Dharma
Until it is perfected.

B. The particular objects of refuge

There are three parts.

- 1. The causal refuge,
- 2. The fruition refuge
- 3. The benefits of taking refuge.

1. The causal refuge

There are four parts.

a) For individual beings who take refuge, there is the teaching of the individual kinds of foundation of their paths.

Taking refuge is the ground of every path.
Lesser people do so fearing the lower realms.
The two intermediate kinds are afraid of the state of samsara.
The greatest have seen all the aspects of samsaric suffering,
Finding others' suffering to be unbearable.
They fear the happiness of a personal nirvana.
In entering on the great vehicle of the buddha-sons,
There are three ways of taking refuge with three kinds of intention.
These are the unsurpassed, the excellent, and the common.

If we do not take refuge, the vow will not arise. If we do not bind ourselves with the vow, there will be no path. Therefore, it is the foundation of the path. The Seventy Verses on Refuge says:

Even if we have taken all the vows,
If we have not gone to refuge, they have no power.

Beings are of three kinds. The lesser, desiring the fruition of samsaric happiness, are afraid of the lower realms. Such persons, when they take refuge with their gods or with the three jewels, do not enter into the doctrine. Even if they enter, they are not buddhists. Even if they are included among buddhists and have faith in the three jewels, they are not able to enter the path. The Sutra of the Ultimate Victory Banner says:

As for persons terrified by fear,
They take refuge on mountains and in groves,
Or in temples and stupas, or in trees.
These are not the principal refuges.
They are not the excellent refuges.
With the foundation of such refuges,
They will not be fully liberated.

It is taught that they found their path in external gods in the desire of happiness. The Vinaya says:

Ananda asked, "Is it explained by the approach of a bhraman's daughter taking refuge in the virtues of the celestial realms?"

Then the Bhagavan spoke. "Ananda, that is not it. Such aspiration to samsaric happiness is known as the refuge of vulgar persons. Therefore, profess the true qualities of liberation.

This also explains the lesser sort of refuge in the three jewels, which has impure motivation.

As for the middle kind, those of the families of shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, afraid of samsara, go to refuge because they seek nirvana as a personal benefit. The *Ngama Denyi*¹⁷⁰ says:

Whoever, at any time, should go to refuge
In the buddha, dharma, and the sangha
Is a possessor of the four noble truths:
Suffering, and the cause of suffering,
Truly passing beyond all suffering,
And the noble path with its eight branches
That leads to the condition of nirvana.

If they produce the divine eye of true prajna,
Those will be the principal refuges.
They are the refuges that are excellent.
Relying upon those very refuges
Completely liberates from suffering.

As for the greater kind, having become afraid of peace and happiness, one goes to refuge for the benefit of others. The Great Liberation says:

Some become afraid of personal peace and completely abandon it for the sake of those who have fallen into the river of samsara. Such refuge is known as that of excellent beings, the holy guides.

These three kinds of persons are distinguished on the basis of three kinds of mind. The Lamp of the Path of Enlightenment says:

By there being lesser, middle, and great,
It should be known that there are three kinds of beings.
Whoever, by whatever means is used,
Tries to accomplish only samsaric benefits
Such a being is known as being lesser.

Those who turn their backs on samsaric pleasures,
People who reverse all evil karma,
And try to attain the personal peace of nirvana,
Are those who are known as beings of the middle kind.

Those who, truly realizing their own suffering,
Wish to end all sufferings of others.
Those are beings designated as excellent.

Lesser ones, by practicing external cleanliness, non-injury, and Dharma go to the celestial realms. Having gone to refuge with the inner three jewels, by their minimal merits, they cross to the celestial realms.

Second, those who do that should also act in accord with the meritorious ten virtues and practice formless samadhi. Otherwise they will not cross to the celestial realms.

b) The time of going to refuge

Since the beings who rely in this way, will establish their three fruitions, when they go to refuge, they have three kinds of intention, ordinary, excellent, and unsurpassed. What are these?

The length of refuge accords with these various intentions.
Lesser ones do so until the happiness of the next life.
For the middle two it is as long as they live,
Or until they attain to the ultimate fruition
Of the path of the shravakas or pratyekabuddhas.
For the highest it is forever, or until they are enlightened,
Attaining the wisdom beyond all thought and evaluation.

Ordinary people take refuge until they get what they want from their gods, and in particular until they attain the celestial realms. The time is small, like the scope of their Dharma. With the middle two kinds, it is until they die, or attain their final goal of becoming arhats. The great ones do so until enlightenment or attainment of the wisdom of buddhahood.

c. The objects of refuge,

There are two parts

1. The general teaching of the ordinary and extraordinary objects of refuge

Now, regarding the supports or objects:

The two objects of refuge are the ordinary and causal,
And the extraordinary, when there is the fruition.
As for the vows that are thus concerned with cause and fruition,
The causal vehicles have a fruition established later.
But it is held by the different divisions of vajrayana
That fruition exists right now, in the form of one's own mind.
Only the name is common with the refuge teachings
That are found in the vehicles of characteristics.

The objects of refuge are of two kinds, ordinary and extraordinary. The objects of lower and intermediate beings are ordinary. Those of the greater ones are extraordinary.

Why? The lesser objects involve a personal bias. Those proclaimed as the support of the middle two kinds are temporary, and so they grasp only a temporary ultimate. The higher ones grasp the mahayana. Its buddhadharmakaya is not grasped by the lesser and middle ones. There is the Dharma of the mahayana. There is the sangha of bodhisattvas.

In the causal refuge, one is brought to the fruition. In the fruition-refuge, it is maintained that the three jewels are really already established within one's being. The rites and compassion accompanying both are equal. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

These proclaim a wish for the real thing, and so their compassion too should be understood.

In the vehicles of characteristics, desiring to attain buddhahood after three lives, countless lives, or whatever, one goes to refuge. Desiring to attain dharmakaya within one's own being is the fruition refuge. Until that is attained, one goes for refuge to the three jewels, as the transitional, temporary refuge. This is called the causal refuge, because it is the cause of obtaining the other. Here people wish to take refuge temporarily in the three jewels, as distinguished from the ultimate singularity, the buddhadharmakaya. Rupakaya, and the dharmas of scripture and realization that are involved in the four paths of a spiritual warrior, the two cessations of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, the four states of noble beings, stream-enterers etc, and the path of bodhisattvas dwelling on the ten bhūmis of the mahayana are not ultimate objects of refuge. This is because they are relative, and have not reached the ultimate, and because such persons must still rely on others in attaining enlightenment.

Because rupakaya is relative, and because the dharmas of realization gathered within the being of shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas are other than the buddhas' realization, having human signs of accomplishing and gain, they are deceptive. They and all the Dharmas of scripture have to be abandoned at the time of seeing. Having become afraid of the sangha with its obscurations and habitual tendencies, one therefore becomes afraid of being dependent on the Buddha as well. The Uttaratantra says:

Since it they are abandoned, and have deceptive dharmas;
Since they do not exist, and because of having fear
These two Dharmas and the assembly of noble ones
Are not to be taken as permanent places of refuge.

Where is there such a refuge? Ultimately only in dharmakaya.
The same text says:

The refuge is the singleness of buddhahood.
Because the Sage, the Buddha, exists as dharmakaya,
The assembly of the sangha is also that ultimate.

The Sutra Clearing away Memory says:

The venerable ones asked, "To what Buddha should we go for refuge?
The Buddha spoke, saying, "There is refuge in the dharmakaya, but not in the rupakaya. They asked, "To what Dharma should we go for refuge?"
The Buddha spoke, saying, "There is refuge in the absolute dharma, but not in the relative dharma.
They asked, "To what sangha should we go for refuge?"
The Buddha spoke, saying, "There is refuge in the absolute sangha, but not in the relative sangha.

In brief, those who wish to attain the three enlightenments of shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, or bodhisattvas, within their being, proclaim one of those goals and take a casual refuge. In the sense that what is to be accomplished by the causal refuge is the ultimate, it can also be said to be ultimate refuge.

Fearful of the teachings of productive activity of the protector-teachers of the path, Shakyamuni and so forth, as external buddhas who arrive and are established within one's being; and fearful of the Dharma taught by these, the productive activity of the path that crosses over to fearlessness, and fearful of the sangha, the companions who produce the activity of being liberated from fear, one abandons the temporary causal situation. This is the situation of establishing within one's being the establishing cause of enlightenment, the three jewels. The reason for establishing it is that if this latter kind of Dharma, also taught by the Buddha, is practiced with one's companions in the sangha, one will be liberated from fear.

Some gurus say that by the mahayana that which protects from subtle obscuration, and even subtle fear, is only the buddhadharmakaya, so that is postulated as the fruition refuge.

In the pratyekabuddhayana, the self-arising of the three jewels realized within one's being is the fruition. Then the fruition objects of refuge are established.

In the shravakayana, whose adherents will arise as pratyekabuddhas in the future, the sangha of arhats is postulated as the fruition object of refuge.

The fruition refuge objects of each of the three vehicles are different. The mahayana proclaims that if one is enlightened one's essence is one with the nature of trikaya. How is it suitable that the dharma and sangha should not arise?

Both the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas maintain that the two cessations are ultimately attained, and hence that their respective versions of absolute truth, supreme enlightenment and dharmakaya, come about as the goal; so how can the buddha and dharma jewels be non-existent for the shravakas? For the pratyekabuddhas too cessation is proclaimed as dharmata and enlightenment, and it is maintained that only the Dharma jewel is eliminated. Therefore, for both what exists in the case of the fruition is maintained to be their particular version of enlightenment. So the ultimate three jewels are attained, and these are said to be the fruition refuge. The Sutra requested by the Householder Drakshulchen says:

In going to the Buddha for refuge, it is maintained that buddhahood is attained. In going to the Dharma for refuge, it is maintained that the Dharma is attained. In going to the sangha for refuge, it is maintained that the sangha is attained.

With the goal of establishing the nature of the two truths, going to the three jewels for refuge is the causal refuge. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

O monks, whether this was done for the sake of self or others, so that oneself might be liberated from fear and torment, you are persons who have gone to refuge. That and that, which you wish and hope for, will be completely perfected.

As for the secret mantra, wishing to see manifestly that the nature of one's mind exists as buddhahood which is even now intrinsic to one, one goes to refuge with the ordinary, external three jewels. Because of that, one rests in the extraordinary nature of one's own mind, the primordial unborn.

Thus, both the three jewels of the individual tantric mandalas and the three jewels of the general teachings are maintained to be causal objects of refuge.¹⁷¹ The nature of one's own mind, self-arising wisdom, is the primordially existing three jewels. This is the object of fruition-refuge. Resting in that without accepting and rejecting or defilements of artificiality is the fruition refuge. Though indeed, for the sake of that, as its cause, grasping refuge in terms of proclamation is esteemable, since chiefly it exists intrinsically and spontaneously, resting within that without adulteration is the fruition refuge. The external causal refuges are a corresponding condition for establishing that. The Existence of Wisdom says:

All the masters of the three mandalas¹⁷²
Have a desire to gain that other perfection,
Therefore they also aspire to have its cause.
As for the luminous nature of the mind,
For the masters of the three mandalas,
Having realized that, they meditate
Within its one pointed equanimity.

This is truly explained as the supreme fruition.

Regarding these two ways of identifying the two refuges, in the lesser, ordinary vehicles, the Buddha is the supreme nirmanakaya. The Dharma is the twelve kinds of scripture of the Master of the Dharmas of scripture and realization¹⁷³ and the paths of the individual continuum, the samadhis and so on. The two sanghas are those of ordinary beings and noble ones. The lesser sangha of ordinary beings is that of male and female getsuls and genyens.¹⁷⁴ This is the field of merit of beings. The greater are those who have taken full ordination, the great sangha of monks and nuns. The sangha altogether includes these four above. Among the noble ones are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats. The main point is buddhahood.

As it is told within the mahayana, there is also the nature of the three kayas of buddhahood, possessing the two purities of nature and the incidental, the ultimate in which the two benefits are perfected. The Mahayanottaratantra says:

It is uncompounded and self-existing
It is not realized by external conditions.
It possesses knowledge, kindness, and power.
This is Buddhahood with the two benefits.

The essence of Dharma is inexpressible by speech or thought. Its nature is the path or antidote that leads to buddhahood. Its aspects are the characteristics of the five paths and two cessations of the Dharma of the meaning and the twelve limbs of the Buddha's verbal teachings. The same text says:

Without discursive thought, duality, and concept,
There are the clear and luminous aspects¹⁷⁵ of the antidote,
Wherever anyone is free from all desire,
That is known as possession of the authentic two truths.
That is the Dharma. The two desirelessnesses,
Comprise the state of cessation and the truth of the path.

In the two cessations, former defilements are cleared away by the antidote. These two are:

- 1.) cessation of discriminating awareness without complexity
- 2.) cessation of discriminating awareness that rests in the natureless meaning in which defilements or complexities are like the sky.

On the path, there is realization of the aspects of accumulation, unification, seeing, and meditation. Comprehending the characteristics of the two truths involves all the Dharmas of scripture and realization.

The sangha is the newly seen meaning of the luminous nature of mind of those dwelling on the ten bhūmis. The same text says:

Because of the inner meaning of nature and extent,
Apprehended in the pure vision that is seen by wisdom,
The assembly who are non-returning through this mind,
Have possession of all the virtues that are without mind.

What is maintained about the extraordinary topic of the vajrayana, differs in the individual tantras.

The Kriya and Caryā tantras say that the Buddha Jewel is the five wisdoms, and pure dharmatā, the nature of the three or four kayas, along with its emanations and blessing-bestowing deities. These are gathered under three families, tathagata,¹⁷⁶ padma, and vajra. The deities of the greater and lesser mandalas possess respectively the peaceful and wrathful accoutrements of sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya.

The Dharma Jewel is as before, adding the particular individual texts of each yana. The Sangha Jewel is the three-fold sangha of śrāvakas, bodhisattvas, and vidyadhāras.

In yoga tantra the Buddha Jewel is the five wisdoms and the pure dharmatā of nirvāṇa or the three kayas. This includes the continuity of the mandala which gathers all the peaceful and wrathful appearances of the five families and trikaya under Vajrasattva as the master of all mandalas. It also includes the ratna, padma, karma, and tathagata families, along with their chief deities, retinues, and root mandalas with their one or many deities, divided into the samaya, dharma, and karma mandalas; the four seals or mudras, samayamudra, dharmamudra, karmamudra, and mahāmudra, and all the great and lesser mandalas developed in one or more stages.

The Dharma and Sangha Jewels, are as already explained.

In mahāyoga, the Buddha Jewel is the Bhagavan's great buddha activity, dwelling inseparably with the vajra nature of the body, speech, and mind of all the tathagatas as the chief deity. There is also the retinue, as one, many, or deity-clusters, dwelling within the monolithic abundance of Gandavyūha, and all the many emanations emanated by them.

The Dharma Jewel is all that was previously taught. There is also the unsurpassable Sangha Jewel, blazing with the major and minor marks, whose nature is inseparable from that of the three jewels.

As to why they are called the rare and excellent three jewels,¹⁷⁷ the Mahayanottaratantra says:

Since they arise rarely and since they are undefiled;
Since they are powerful and ornament the world;
Since they are superior, and since they are excellent,
They are called the rare and excellent triple gem.

Because of these six similarities to precious gems, the Buddha, Dharma, and sangha, are known as "the three jewels," and said to be like precious jewels.

- 1) The similarity of rare occurrence

This is because even in the changes of many kalpas, their virtuous roots are not established and not encountered.

- 2) The similarity of being undefiled

This is because they are always free from defilement.

3) The similarity of being powerful

This is because the six consciousnesses and so forth have powerful virtues beyond the scope of thought.

4) The similarity of being the ornament of the world

This is because they are the cause of the wholesome thoughts of all beings.

5) The similarity of superiority to artificial gems

This is because they are beyond the world.

6) The similarity of being changeless by praise and blame and so forth

This is because their nature is uncompounded.

As for the three-fold classification, the Mahayanottaratantra says:

By the meaning of teacher, the teaching, and the students,
From the viewpoint of those persons who have devotion
For the three vehicles and the three activities,
The three occasions are presented.

1) the good qualities of the teacher, the meaning of the teachings of such a teacher, the individuals of the bodhisattva vehicle trying to enter into the reality of buddhahood, and the supreme activity of buddhahood, from the viewpoint of those who are devoted to it, is the occasion of Buddha, the most excellent of those with two legs. So it is taught and presented.

2) The good qualities taught by the teacher, as the meaning of the teaching, consist of the profound Dharma, through their own auspicious coincidence, since they are afterwards thought of as constituting it. From the viewpoint of individuals within the pratyekabuddha yana and those who have devotion for the production of supreme buddhahood, these are the occasion of the Dharma. This is because those who are free from desire are supreme. So it is taught and presented.

3) The good qualities of the students who enter into the teachings taught by the teacher, are that because they hear the meaning from others and they later understand it, they enter into it. For beings of the shravakayana and from the viewpoint of those who have devotion for making the sangha supreme, this is the occasion of the sangha, since these are the supreme ones of the assembly. So it has been taught and presented.

In brief, the temporary refuge is the three jewels. The ultimate refuge is the singularity of buddhahood. The same text says:

The holy truth which is the refuge of beings
Is the singularity of buddhahood.
Because the Sage possesses dharmakaya,
This is also the sangha and its goal.

The occasion of fruition, the ultimate goal, is like that. So it is explained.

2. The particulars of the causal object

There are three sections.

a. The general teaching of the three jewels

Now where proclaimers of the ordinary refuge have the power to take refuge, they request a refuge because they are afraid of themselves. It is explained that because they are worthy of the support of what the ritual of taking refuge proclaims, its nature was therefore taught:

The causal object is the three jewels concretely conceived.
 Here the Buddha means the supreme nirmanakaya.
 He is ornamented with the major and minor marks.
 There are two kinds of Dharma: The dharma of spotless meaning, And also its reflection in a written form.
 The meaning of sutras and tantras in the various vehicles.
 Is a reflection in letters of the ultimate teaching.

In the great and lesser vehicles, in particular the three jewels as the support of refuge are

1. The nirmanakaya ornamented with the major and minor marks
2. The Dharma, including the words and meanings of the sutras and tantras, and all their reflections in letters.
3. All perfect enjoyments.

b. the Dharma jewel

From the two Dharmas of scripture and realization, there are two sections

1) Scripture, the causal Dharma:

a) Sutra

There are twelve divisions of the sutra teachings
 General teachings, hymns and praises, and prophecies.
 Verses and aphorisms, and pragmatic narratives.
 Biographical stories and former events as examples.
 Stories of former births, and the extensive teachings.
 Narratives of marvels, and teachings of profound doctrines,

The Noble Moon Lamp Sutra says:

There are the following:

- 1) Sutras or general teachings.
 - 2) Verse summaries.
 - 3) Prophecies.
 - 4) Verse-teachings.
 - 5) Exhortations.
 - 6) Biographical tales of realization.
 - 7) Narratives of former examples.
 - 8) Conditional Declarations.
 - 9) Extensive teachings.
 - 10) Narratives of former births, jataka tales.
 - 11) Resolution teachings.
 - 12) Narratives of miraculous events.
- 1) All that is part of these various divisions taken together is known as the sutras.
 - 2) The final summary in verse of what has first been taught in full is called verse summary.
 - 3) The prophecies of the Buddha and others are the prophecy-teachings.
 - 4) Verses that occur alone are verse-teachings.
 - 5) Teachings that exhort the ones who listen to the Dharma are called exhortations.
 - 6) Blessings by particular persons' auto-biographical accounts of their own realization, are called biographical tales of realization.
 - 7) Teachings about former generations are called narratives of former examples.
 - 8) When some topic is associated with its conditions, that is called conditional declarations.

- 9) When a topic is presented very extensively that is called extensive teachings.
- 10) Tales of how the Buddha was faithful and so forth in previous births are called jataka tales.
- 11) When after a subject is briefly taught, a commentary on that is taught, that is called resolution-teachings.
- 12) Wondrous teachings of the heart essence are called miraculous teachings.

b) The fruition Dharma, tantra

Moreover, aside from the sutras:

Kriya carya and yoga are the external tantras
Within the mahayoga of the inner mantra
Are included the father, mother, and non-dual tantras,
These have non-duality of prajna and upaya.
The volumes where these are written are also known as tantras.

The chief, powerful, or external tantras establish enlightenment in dependence on external purification. Belonging to this class are kriya yoga, Upa or carya yoga, and yoga tantra.

The inner tantras are the three in which buddhahood is established by being beyond accepting and rejecting, and upaya and prajna are non-dual. All six of the above are called tantras, as are their literary manifestations.¹⁷⁸

2) The Dharma of Realization,

There are four sections

a) The general teaching of the stages of development and completion

As for the nature of the meaning:

In the dharma of realization are the paths and bhumis.
There are also the stages of developing and fulfillment.

Dharani¹⁷⁹ and samadhi having the essence of wisdom.
Of the nature of compassion, their upaya is without limit.

b) the teaching of the ten bodhisattva levels or bhumis

The support of these is the bhumis:

The bhumis are Supremely Joyful, and the Spotless,
Illumining, Radiant, and the Difficult to Conquer,
The Manifest, the Far-going, Immovable, and Good Intellect. The highest of these ten is known as Clouds of Dharma.

The Great Commentary on the Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

It is explained that these are called the bhumis or "grounds" from their being the ground or support of the virtuous qualities. There are eight bhumis of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, and ten of the bodhisattvas.

As for the first, the Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

The eight of the level of the family, seeing, restraint, desirelessness, and realization of what was done, are known as the bhumis of shravakas and pratyekabuddhas.

The Precious Mala says:

Just as within the shravakayana
Shravaka bhumis are listed as eight
Similarly in the mahayana
There are ten bhumis of bodhisattvas.

First, the path of preparation is called the family level, since it is individually described in each of these three yanas. The Prajnaparamita in Twenty Thousand Lines says:

The explanation of the bhumi of seeing the white aspect is that dharmas are seen as white.

Entering the stream, entering the fruition, continuous remaining, and remaining within the fruition, make up the eight levels up to arhatship, called the eight bhumis. Here, by being liberated from the many defilements of the one bhumi of desire, the four dhyanas of form, and the four formless attainments, one becomes an arhat.

The first fruition of wholesome practice includes entering the stream of seeing and resting within the fruition. These two are the bhumi of seeing.

Renouncing ones familiar relationships with the desire realm for the most part, one becomes restrained in the bhumi of a once returner. These two are called [entering into and resting in] the bhumi of restraint.

Free of the desire of the desire realm, one becomes a non-returner. These two are called [entering into and resting in] the bhumi of freedom from desire.

By doing what one has to do, one is an arhat. These two are called [entering into and resting in] the bhumi of realizing what has to be done.

The three levels preceding entering into being an arhat are known as the shravaka-bhumis. Their purpose is differently understood within the different yanas. By the pratyekabuddhas, these bhumis are called the four fruitions of pratyekabuddhas.

In this case, the explanation of the bodhisattva bhumis is that by the renunciations of seeing and of meditation one is protected from fear of the innumerable evil spirits of the kleshas. They are called levels or bhumis because one goes successively higher and higher. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Since one is without the fear of innumerable evil spirits,
Since one travels ever farther and higher than that,
These are therefore maintained to be the levels or bhumis.

Moreover, in dependence on eliminating miserliness and so forth, the ten inappropriate partialities, we are placed within the ten bhumis. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Kye, sons of the Victorious One, for these ten bhumis to arise, the ten inappropriate partialities must be cleared away. therefore, they are revealed by the ten perfections.

On the first bhumi, one chiefly practices the paramita of generosity, but if the others too are not practiced insofar as one can, that is not it...

Up to the tenth paramita, wisdom, the corresponding point is taught. Moreover, regarding the ten paramitas, the Center and Limit says:

Generosity, discipline, patience and energy,
Meditation and also perfection of prajna or knowledge.
Skilful means and power, aspiration and wisdom
These are what are said to be the ten perfections.

The ten to be abandoned by these are miserliness, broken discipline, aggression, laziness, distractedness, confused prajna, unskillful means, diminished power, unsuccessful aspiration, and the obscuration of knowables.

As for the ten bhumis whose revelation depends on these being cleared away:

1.) regarding the first bhumi, supremely joyful, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

We approach enlightenment

And see how to benefit beings.
As supreme joy rises from this,
It is known The Supremely Joyful.

The Ratnavali says:

The first of these is called Supremely Joyful.
Since the bodhisattva produces joy,
Thereafter the three fetters are abandoned.¹⁸⁰
We are born within the tathagata family.
By the ripening of that, generosity is supreme.
We are able to move a hundred world realms.
We become great lords in Jambuling.

We view the faces of a hundred buddhas in an instant, know how to be blessed by a hundred buddhas, send forth a hundred emanations, teach for a hundred kalpas, enter into a hundred visions of wisdoms, arouse and stabilize a hundred samadhis, ripen a hundred sentient beings, move a hundred buddha fields, open a hundred gates of Dharma, multiply our bodies a hundred times, and each of these bodies teaches surrounded by a perfect retinue of a hundred. We are able to take birth as a lord within Jambuling.

2.) As for the second bhumi, the former text says:

Because these ten aspects are completely undefiled,
Therefore, they stay that way entirely by themselves.
The ripening of that is perfection of discipline.
We possess the seven glorious royal possessions¹⁸¹
We turn the wheel of benefit for sentient beings.

Because of being without the ten unwholesome actions, we practice the ten virtues. We attain in an instant twelve thousand of the good qualities described above. We take birth as a universal monarch ruling a world system of four continents.

3.) As for the third bhumi, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Because the great light of Dharma is produced,
It is called the Producer of Radiance.

The Ratnavali says:

As for the third bhumi, Producer of Radiance,
Since the light of wisdom arises on this level,
Meditation and higher perceptions will arise,
Since all greed and aggression are completely exhausted,
As for the perfect ripening of the exhaustion of these,
We practice with the highest patience and energy.
We become great and skilful lords among the gods.
The greed and lust of desire is totally reversed.
We will have twelve hundred thousand good qualities,
Taking birth as Indra, the king of the thirty-three gods.

4.) As for the fourth bhumi, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Thus the Dharma that accords with enlightenment,
Is like a torch with fiercely blazing light.
Because we now possess that, as for this fourth bhumi,
By burning duality, it greatly illuminates.

The Ratnavali says:

The fourth is called, Possessing Emanation of Light.
Because the genuine light of wisdom now arises,
All accords with enlightenment without remainder.
In particular, when this fully ripens in meditation,
We become completely limitless kings of the gods.
We have the proper view of transitory collections.
We are skillful, and therefore we are all-victorious.

We attain a hundred and twenty million of the above qualities and take birth as a king of the twin gods.

5.) As for the fifth bhumi, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Because we completely ripen sentient beings,
We are also able to guard our minds,
For the wise this conquest is difficult,
Hence the name the Difficult to Conquer.

The Ratnavali says:

The fifth is called The One that is Difficult to Conquer,
Since all the maras are difficult to overcome.
Because skillful knowledge arises in our being
Of the subtle meaning of the four noble truths and such,
As for the full ripening of this good arising,
We will be born as kings of the Tushita gods.

A hundred and twenty billion good qualities arise, and one is made the king of the gods of the Tushita heaven.

6.) As for the sixth bhumi, the former text says:

Because with the support of the perfection of prajna
Samsara and nirvana both manifest at this time,
This is therefore called the Bhumi of Manifestation.

The Ratnavali says:

The sixth is called The Place of Manifestation.
Because the dharma of buddhahood manifest.
By practice of shamatha and vipashyana,
Cessation blossoms, and by its ripening,
We take birth as kings of the Nirmanarati gods.¹⁸²

We have ten million times twelve hundred thousand good qualities and becomes king of the Nirmanarati gods.

7.) As for the seventh bhumi, the former text says:

Related to the path of crossing all at once,
This seventh bhumi is called, "the one that is far-going."

The latter says:

The seventh is The Far Going. The way in which it goes far,
Is by entering the equilibrium of cessation
By the ripening of that instant entering,
We become lords of the Para-nirmita-vasavartin gods.¹⁸³

We have twelve times ten hundred million thousand good qualities and are made kings of the Paranirmitavasavartin gods.

8.) As for the eighth bhumi, the former text says:

Because it is not moved by dualistic perception,
It is rightly known as The Unmoving One.

The latter text says:

Similarly the eighth is called the kumara level¹⁸⁴
It is unmoving because it is complete non-thought.
Body, speech, and mind, which are the whole of one's being,
Are motionlessness in a way beyond the scope of thought.
By the ripening of that, we are born as Bhrama,
The lord of realm whose number of worlds is a thousand cubed.

Bhrama in general is lord of the first dhyana form gods in a number of heavens. As for good qualities, we see the faces of as many buddhas as there are particles in a hundred thousand thousand-fold world systems and so forth.

9.) As for the ninth bhumi, the former text says:

With good understanding that truly knows individual things
This ninth bhumi is called "the one with good understanding."

The latter says:

The ninth bhumi, "good understanding," is like a regent.
Since it truly knows individual things,
By this we attain good understanding.
As the ripening of this we are mahabhrama,
Lord of two three-thousand fold realms of worlds.¹⁸⁵
In enquiring about the wishes of sentient beings
By arhatship he is not ravished away.

As for good qualities, those on this bhumi see as many buddhas as there are particles in a hundred thousand countless three-thousand-fold world systems and so forth.

10.) As for the tenth bhumi, the former text says:

Since it pervades like clouds the realm of dualistic space,
This, the tenth bhumi, is therefore known as "The Cloud of Dharma."

The latter says:

The tenth of the bhumis is known as "The Cloud of Dharma."
Because the rain of holy Dharma falls,
And because the bodhisattvas are empowered,
By the light rays of the power of buddhahood.
As for the ripening, one is a lord of gods
In inconceivably countless wisdom realms

This is the excellence of Maheshvara. As for the good qualities, every instant we see twelve times as many buddhas as there are inexpressible numbers of atoms in the also inexpressible number of buddha fields and so forth.

In the first bhumi, by realizing that the same luminous essence of mind pervades all sentient beings, we realize the equality of oneself and others as bodhicitta, the mind of enlightenment.

In the second, realizing the excellence of those who can realize this, we work to purify the defilements of the dhatu.

In the third, realizing that learning this is the cause according with dharmadhatu, going beyond even a three thousand fold world system, becoming a single tongue of flame, one listens to the Dharma.

In the fourth, we realize that this is without ego grasping, and desire for the Dharma is abandoned.

In the fifth, realizing that this dhatu exists without difference in the being of oneself and others, we realize equality with all the buddhas by means of the ten pure thoughts¹⁸⁶

In the sixth, realizing that the dhatu is naturally completely pure, we eliminate all grasping that accepts nirvana and rejects samsara.

In the seventh, realizing that the dhatu has no differences at all, grasping of characteristics is eliminated.

In the eighth, realizing that the garbha has no faults or virtues, no decrease and increase, the unborn patience of unborn Dharma becomes utterly and completely pure.

In the ninth realizing that within the dhatu as its intrinsic attribute is the peace of the four modes of genuine individual awareness¹⁸⁷ we produce the empowerment of wisdom.

In the tenth, by realizing that the dhatu is the source of perfect buddha activity, we attain autonomy in the four empowerments. As for these four empowerments, the Center and Limit says:

The all pervasive meaning, the supreme meaning,
The excellent meaning according with the cause;
The meaning of complete non-grasping;
The meaning of non-difference;
And the meaning of non-decreasing and non-increasing;
These are the topics of the four empowerments.

If one still is asking what those might be, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

They are for the sake of transformation
Of mind, fixation, discursive thought, and non-thought.
When these become fields and wisdom pure of karma,
These are then the four empowerments.

As for these, the four empowerments
In the three bhumis of motionlessness¹⁸⁸ and so on,
In oneness they are other than duality,
So each of the empowerments is maintained.

1 By transforming the klesha-mind we attain the empowerment of complete non-thought.

2 By transforming fixation, the consciousness of the five gates, we attain the empowerment of the pure buddha fields. This second is the eighth bhumi.

3 By transforming the mind-consciousness we attain mastery of the four modes of genuine individual awareness, and by attaining the empowerment of perfect buddha activity, we ripen sentient beings. This is the ninth bhumi.

4 By transforming alayavijnana, the basis of arising of concepts and the mind consciousness, within the tenth bhumi, we attain the empowerment of the mirror-like wisdom. by the great buddha activity, buddhahood and the buddha activity existing in the sphere of activity become reconcilable. The Mahayanottaratantra says:

As for this manner of the bodhisattvas,
With the tathagatas in post meditation
And true liberation of beings
In the world they are equal.

In the eighth bhumi there are the wisdoms of equality and discriminating awareness. In the ninth there is all-accomplishing wisdom. In the tenth, having attained the mirror-like wisdom and fourth empowerment, at the end the alaya of the basis of all the various habitual patterns is transformed in the empowerment of dharmadhatu wisdom. Then one is enlightened. The tenth bhumi is empowerment in the great final¹⁸⁹ light rays. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Having attained this final familiarity,
By the great light rays we are then empowered.
By realizing the vajra-like samadhi,

Indestructibility is gained.
That is the end of other transformations.
Undefined by any obscurations
To benefit all beings everywhere,
We produce supreme accomplishment.
We attain omniscience, the highest level.

As soon as a great offering has been made to the buddhas of the ten directions by those dwelling on the ten bhumis, from the tuft of hair between the eyebrows of all the buddhas of the ten directions arise hosts of light rays. By their sinking into the foreheads of those bodhisattvas, the vajra-like samadhi and countless hundreds of thousands of others that they have not attained before are attained. The subtle obscuration of knowables has been purified, and then they are enlightened.

c. The outer and inner divisions

How?:

Coming after these, which are the ten levels of learning,
Is the level of total illumination, prabhasvara.
For the causal vehicles this is the level of nirmanakaya.
Vajrayana divisions go on by family and quality.
There are a twelfth and other levels beyond all measure.

For the vehicle of the perfections, at that time the former dhatus become enlightened. All dharmas are gathered into non-defilement and the wisdom of non-thought alone. The Establishment of Trikaya says:

Except undefined suchness
And the wisdom of non-thought,
For the buddhas other dharmas
Do not exist at all.

The undefined kaya is dharmata-svabhavikakaya. Though it has that nature, it also has aspects of the wisdom of non-thought, the powers, and so forth, and this is called dharmakaya. That same wisdom, appearing ornamented with the major and minor marks, for the sattvas of the ten bhumis, is sambhogakaya. That same wisdom, appearing to students as other, taming whatever needs to be tamed, is nirmanakaya. That same wisdom continuous and unbroken, as long as samsara lasts, spontaneously doing benefit for others is buddha activity. As for svabhavikakaya, the Abhisamayalankara says:

As for the svabhavikakaya of the Sage,
Whatever undefined dharmas are attained
These will always be complete in purity.
These will always have the true and genuine nature

As for dharmakaya, the same text says: [see categories below]

Measureless aspects come with enlightenment.
There are all the natures of the nine dhyanas,
As well as those of ultimate liberation,¹⁹⁰
The various natures of the ten exhaustions,
And the eight-fold set of conquered ayatanas.

Being without kleshas and knowing one's aspirations,
Each higher perception is truly apprehended,
Along with the four ever-present purities,
The ten powers of a buddha and the ten masteries,
The four kinds of fearlessnesses and the three non-guardings
As well as the three pillars of mindfulness.¹⁹¹

Awareness of dharmata that is never-bewildered¹⁹²
By the true enemy habitual patterns.
There is arising of the great compassion,
And the 18 unshared dharmas of only the Sage
And the all pervading knowledge of omniscience.
So dharmakaya has been described.

As for the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment there are the four objects of mindfulness,

the four correct actions, abandonment etc,
the four legs of miracle,
the five controlling powers,
the five powers,
the seven branches of enlightenment,
the eight-fold noble path.

The four objects of mindfulness are the essential recollections of

- 1.) body
- 2.) feeling
- 3.) mind,
- 4.) dharmas.

The four correct trainings, abandonments etc on the path of accumulation of the shravakas are

- 1.) abandoning non-virtuous actions before they occur,
- 2.) abandoning non-virtuous actions which occur to the mind,
- 3.) developing virtuous actions which have not yet occurred to the mind,
- 4.) cultivating virtuous actions that have already been developed.

The four legs of miracle or four stages of miraculous ability are the stage of miraculous ability which trains in the contemplation of

- 1.) yearning or aspiration,
- 2.) mind
- 3.) effort
- 4.) investigation

The five faculties are

- 1.) faith
- 2.) perserverence
- 3.) recollection
- 4.) concentration
- 5.) discrimination.

The five powers are intensifications of these same five.

The seven branches of enlightenment are authentic or genuine

- 1.) mindfulness
- 2.) investigation of truth
- 3.) effort
- 4.) joy
- 5.) flexibility, shinjang.
- 6.) one-pointed contemplation.

7.) equanimity.

The eight-fold noble path is

- 1.) right view
- 2.) right thought
- 3.) right speech
- 4.) right action
- 5.) right livelihood
- 6.) right effort
- 7.) right mindfulness
- 8.) right meditation

The four immeasurables are

- 1.) kindness
- 2.) compassion
- 3.) joy
- 4.) equanimity.

The eight liberations, are

- 1.) liberation of form possessing liberation that looks at form
- 2.) liberation of non-form possessing liberation that looks at form
- 3.) liberation of what is attractive
- 4.) liberation of the formless perception of space
- 5.) liberation of the formless perception of consciousness
- 6.) liberation of the formless perception of nothing whatsoever,
- 7.) liberation of the formless perception of neither perception nor non-perception
- 8.) the liberation of cessation.

The nine samapattis, are

- 1.) the four dhyanas
- 2.) the four formless attainments,
- 3.) the samapatti of cessation.

The ten exhaustions are of

- 1.) earth
- 2.) water
- 3.) fire
- 4.) air
- 5.) blue
- 6.) yellow
- 7.) red
- 8.) white
- 9.) space
- 10.) consciousness.

The eight overcomings of the ayatanas,¹⁹³ are as follows:

- 1.) by those possessing inner form,¹⁹⁴ viewing lesser external phenomenal forms, and overcoming these
- 2.) by those possessing inner form, viewing greater external forms, and overcoming these
- 3.) by those not possessing form, looking at lesser forms, and overcoming these
- 4.) by those not possessing form, looking at greater forms, and overcoming these;
- 5.) Mere inner perception without inner form of blue, and overcoming it.
- 6.) Mere inner perception without inner form of yellow, and overcoming it.

- 7.) Mere inner perception without inner form of red, and overcoming it.
- 8.) Mere inner perception without inner form of white, and overcoming it.

The last four are called the four seeings. By clearing away kleshas in the continuums of others, they are made non-existent, and by all that spontaneously arises from their being so made, there is knowledge of the object of aspiration.

The six higher perceptions are:

- 1.) miraculous powers,
- 2.) the divine ear,
- 3.) knowing the thoughts of others,
- 4.) memory of former lives,
- 5.) the divine eye arising from manifested formations,
- 6.) the higher perception of exhausting defilement.

The four individual true apprehensions are of

- 1.) meanings
- 2.) words
- 3.) dharmas
- 4.) powers.

the four purities, are complete purity of

- 1.) support
- 2.) perception
- 3.) object¹⁹⁵,
- 4.) wisdom.

The ten masteries are power over

- 1.) life
- 2.) mind
- 3.) necessities
- 4.) actions
- 5.) birth
- 6.) devotion
- 7.) aspiration
- 8.) miracles
- 9.) wisdom
- 10.) Dharma.

As for the four fearlessnesses, one can make the following proclamations without fear of successful contradiction:

- 1.) "I am enlightened;"
- 2.) "I have stopped desire and so forth;
- 3.) "I teach with certainty the path of omniscience and so forth."
- 4.) "I have exhausted defilement."

By purity of one's actions of body, speech and mind, they are rightly performed. Not having to consider these three comprise the three non-guardings.

The three objects to keep in mind are in teaching the dharma to keep in mind

- 1.) what the listeners want and do not want.
- 2.) that with these two there are attachment and aggression.

3.) that when these two are absent, there are equanimity and mindfulness.

There are also

not forgetting the benefit of sentient beings conquering all defiled habitual patterns
the great compassion that desires benefit for all beings

the eighteen unique dharmas of a buddha.

The six aspects that are not possessed are

1. confusion
2. useless chatter
3. loss of mindfulness
4. non-equanimity of mind
5. perception of difference
6. equanimity that excludes discrimination

The six aspects that are not possessed with deterioration

7. resolve [to benefit beings]
8. diligent effort
9. mindfulness
10. samadhi
11. prajna
12. complete liberation

The three aspects that are preceded and followed by wisdom

13. Buddha activity of body
14. Buddha activity of speech
15. Buddha activity of mind

The three enterings into wisdom without attachment or obstruction

16. in the past
17. in the future
18. in the present

Besides those 18 there are also

omniscience
knowledge of the path,
universal awareness.

This great collection of twenty-one is dharmakaya.

As for sambhogakaya, the enjoyment body, the Abhisamayalankara says:

The nature of the thirty-two major marks
And also of the eighty minor marks,
Since these are enjoyed in experience of mahayana
They are called the Sage's enjoyment-body,

This is explained extensively below. Regarding nirmanakaya, the same text says:

When anyone, as long as samsara lasts,

Does benefits for limitless sentient beings
Equally, the bodies of such beings
Are the Sage's ongoing nirmanakaya.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

There are working tülkus, and born and enlightened tülkus.¹⁹⁶
But the nirma_akaya of the supreme enlightenment
Is the nirma_akaya of the Buddha himself.
He has the great upaya which is total liberation.

Regarding buddha activity, the same text says:

Thus it is maintained that as long as samsara lasts
This karma is unbroken and continuous.¹⁹⁷

As for the secret mantra teachings, in addition to these levels there is a twelfth, Pemachen¹⁹⁸ or padmini, a kaya that does not appear to bodhisattvas, but only to the great experience of omniscience, beyond one and many and always spontaneously present. Some also say that in addition there is the thirteenth level of a vajra holder whose bliss pervades the limits of the all-pervading space of dharmakaya free from all complexities. Also some texts say that mahasukha is a fourteenth bhumi, samadhi is a fifteenth, and wisdom, the level of the guru, is a sixteenth. These and immeasurable others are taught. However they can all be related to sending out light rays everywhere and returning into the single essence.

The characteristics of the three kayas and five wisdoms appear with their individual divisions.

d. The paths

As for the previously taught paths

The paths are accumulation, preparation, and seeing;
the path of meditation and that of no more learning.
By the two stages and such, the profoundest objects of mind
Will arise, the immaculate, radiant sun of holy Dharma.

The gate of entering for beginners is the path of accumulation. The path of preparation involves

The four aids of release,¹⁹⁹

- 1.) heat or warmth,
- 2.) "peak experience" or spiritual exaltation
- 3.) patience, steadfastness,
- 4.) supreme worldly dharmas.

This level is practiced through devotion. It is the second path of ordinary beings.

The paths of seeing and meditation are the paths of the bodhisattva noble ones. All these together are the four paths of learning. That which is to be abandoned through seeing and meditation is accomplished with effort. The final path is that of no more learning. This is the matchless umbrella, the single chief level. In those bhumis dharani and samadhi and such profound aspects of mind, and the dharmas that are the objects of wisdom are the three jewels. The path of no more learning is the Dharma. Associates are the sangha. The teacher is the Buddha. These things are said for people of different powers of mind. Here the different but inseparable ultimate and non-ultimate three jewels are all united.

c. The particulars of the sangha jewel

It is the support of association:

The external sangha includes the beings of the four classes And the buddha-sons abiding on the various bhumis.

The dakinis and the vidyadhara masters of vajrayana
Are those who are maintained to be the inner sangha.

The four classes, stream-enterer, once-returner, non-returner, and arhat of the sangha of shravakas and pratyekabuddhas and the bodhisattvas dwelling on the ten bhumis are the external sangha. The inner sangha is the dakinis and spontaneous arisen beings arisen from mantra and karma or buddha activity, and the world transcending assembly gathered under the vajra, ratna, padma, karma, and tathagata families, and the vidyadharas dwelling on the levels of mahamudra, life-mastery, and self-existence.

In this case there are four families of vidyadharas. These are the ripening, life-mastery, mahamudra, and self-existing families.

As for the first, the ripening, practicing the developing and completion stages on the paths of accumulation and preparation, they have ordinary bodies, but establish their minds as the kayas of the deities.

These until they have attained the supreme dharma, nirvana, in the meantime attain the mahamudra. This is because they reject the body and ripen the mind as the mandala of the deity.

The Stages of Action says:

The yogin of one and many, when that level
That is to be taught is to be attained
One Approaches and accomplishes 66 months,
Until the vajra body has been attained.
By the condition of having but little power
Because of weak aspiration one will stay
Within the residual body arising from concepts.
But by insight one goes to vajradhara.

If one attains the supreme Dharma, one is really connected to mastery of life. The same text says:

If one is not obstructed by conditions,
One will then be joined to the vajra body.

As for mastery of life, having reached the great, supreme Dharma, by attaining the kaya of the vajra body one is without birth and death. The path of seeing mind arises. The same text says:

The final and ultimate entering of seeing the meaning
Is accomplished by the siddhi of practicing vajra feasts.
Defiled bodily elements and their birthplaces are exhausted,
Becoming a vajra body in the family of life.
The dharmas of seeing, recited, consecrate nirvana,
The level of the Conqueror where body is not rejected.
Free from fear one perfects the miracle of life.

That body which is the support of supreme Dharma remains. The Secret Essence says:

Though births of humans, gods,
And Bhrama indeed are taken,
One stays on that special level.

Emanations and buddha qualities, are the phenomena of the first bhumi. A mudra-family-holder in the path of meditation from the second until the tenth bhumi, dwells on the ninth. There body appears as the phenomena of the mandala, and mind purified of defilements has wisdom without conceptualized characteristics. The Stages of Action says:

One's own mind becomes the mahamudra.
The kaya that manifests by meditation.
Possessing all the major and the minor marks,
Both the ordinary and supreme,
The two enjoyments are the family of mudra.

the Two Enjoyments says:

One becomes a holder of the families
Of the jewel, vajra, wheel, lotus, and sword.

In the second, third, fourth, and fifth bhumis, one is called a holder of the vajra family holder. This is because one destroys the defilements of one's own level by vajra-like realization.

In the sixth one chiefly practices the prajna-paramita. By turning the wheel of dharma one becomes a holder of the wheel family.

In the seventh one's arising like the wheel of Dharma is also skillful in means, and one is of the same family.

In the eighth, attaining the empowerment of the precious wisdom of non-thought, one is a holder of the precious jewel family.

In the ninth, without desire, by practice, and attainment one holds the lotus family.

In the tenth, producing benefit for sentient beings through perfect buddha activity, one is of the sword family.

Holding the self-existing family is attaining buddhahood. The same text says:

By perfecting the powers of the former families,
As explained, defilements are purified.
The three prajnas which are those of a buddha,
Bring one to the self-existing family

Some masters have said that the mahamudra goes from the first bhumi until the seventh. Self-existence is explained as the three pure bhumis the eighth to the tenth. It seems they did not get the idea. Why? While travelling from the level of a beginner up to the level of buddhahood one is gathering these states of the four family holders.

d. The actual liturgy of refuge,

1) Emanating the fields

Now from the actual presentation of the liturgy of going to refuge, as for the cause of its arising, lesser ones fear the lower realms and desire the good qualities of the higher realms and so forth. The shravakas and pratyekabuddhas are also afraid of samsara, and produce the three kinds of faith.²⁰⁰ In the mahayana, by compassion, one turns the wheel of dharma for others. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

That is to be understood by means of compassion.

Moreover, after one has been told the virtues of refuge by the guru, one puts one's mind in order. Before representations of the three jewels one arranges offerings. In the space in front, the three jewels as explained above, just from having gathered the text and offerings, approach and remain. The Buddha and so forth are the objects of visualization. Visualize them in space:

Visualize these objects as being before you in space.
In particular Buddha and guru are said to be most important.

From the external viewpoint, the Buddha is most important, but internally the guru is most important.

1) how to go to refuge:

Making the outer, mental, and secret offerings,
Say "I and all sentient beings, joining our hands in devotion,
Take refuge until enlightened, for the benefit for others
In the Guru and the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha.
Say this again and again, from the depths of your heart and bones.

The external offerings are incense, flowers, and so forth. The inner offerings are amrita, camphor, and so forth. The secret offerings are rejoicing, equanimity, supreme enlightenment and so forth. Offering these offerings, which fill the whole of space, to the guests who also fill the whole of space, say the following:

From this time until attaining the essence of enlightenment, I, [say your name], for the sake of all sentient beings, go to the guru for refuge. I go to the Buddha for refuge. I go to the Dharma for refuge. I go to the sangha for refuge.

Say this three times from the depths of your heart. This is the refuge attained from symbols. Afterwards resting in a state of complete non-conception, entering into the unborn is the absolute refuge. Attaining dharmata is the world-transcending refuge.

3) Emanation of light rays

At other times, visualize that by one's having gone to refuge in this manner, these representations radiate light and so forth as follows:

Visualize that by radiation of joy and light
Obscurations of the three gates are purified,
And that because of that the siddhis have been attained.
By that the accumulation of merits has been perfected.
And, as the fruition, rupakaya is manifest.

The Edifice of the three Jewels says:

By those beings who take the three-fold refuge
The accumulations will be completely perfected,
The level of Buddhahood will be accomplished.
The Dharma and sangha will also be accomplished.

That completes the explanation of the incidental causal refuge.

b. The fruition refuge

There are five sections

1) The explanation of the objects of refuge:

The ultimate refuge upon the fruition is dharmakaya.
Essence of divinity, buddha, dharma, and sangha,
One's own luminous mind, free from all complexity.

The vehicle of characteristics maintains that in the fruition refuge one attains for oneself the fruition of buddhahood. The incidental objects of refuge are the Dharma and sangha, and the ultimate one is the singularity of buddhadharmakaya.

As for the refuge that goes to the ultimate meaning,
That refuge is singularity, Buddhahood.

Dharmakaya is the ultimate object of the fruition refuge, because it is the ultimate three jewels.

In the causal refuge dharmakaya also comes into the continuities of others; but in the fruition refuge, the nature of one's own mind, free from all the extremes of complexity, exists as the nature of the three jewels, and one goes to refuge with that. The Establishment of Wisdom says:

The Buddha is mind with no need of attaining purity.
Unchanging and undefiled, this is also the Dharma.
Its self-perfected qualities are the sangha.
Since this is so, one's mind is excellent.

As to how one goes

2) The manner of going to refuge:

As for the taking refuge that makes this into the path,

Before the visualized representations, one goes to refuge,

"Having visualized that I and all sentient beings have done this, doing this for as long as the words have power, with these relative visualizations we take the causal refuge."

3) The explanation of the essence:

In accord with the cause, everything is one's mind.

In reality going and going are non-dual,

This suchness is meditational equanimity.

If we grasp the mind and object as being two,

There will never be the ultimate realization.

The refuge of fruition has no aspiration.

Oneself and all sentient beings go to refuge with the phenomenal visualizations of the three jewels in space. Both also do so with their own minds, which in reality have not a particle of difference from their miraculous emanations. Since the essence of all this is the space-like nature of mind that does not fall into partiality, rest in that simplicity. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, Whoever does not conceive of even the Buddha, also does not think of the Dharma and the sangha. This is going into the real essence.

The thought that the object, the three jewels, and the perceivers, oneself and others, are different does not correspond to the way things actually are, so we need not aspire to those natures.

4) The explanation of post-meditation:

By that the accumulation of wisdom is perfected.

By that the state of dharmakaya has been attained.

Whatever may appear in the post-meditation state

It should be regarded as being a dream or illusion.

This non-conceptual emptiness is the accumulation of wisdom, and therefore dharmakaya is established. The Sutra Teaching the Two Truths says:

Manjushri, by the accumulation of merit rupakaya is attained. By the accumulation of wisdom, absolute dharmakaya is made to manifest.

All the dharmas of the phenomenal world of samsara and nirvana, appearing while they do not exist, should be regarded as being within a dream or illusion. As to how, the Vinaya says:

By the vast merit that rises up from this
May buddhahood naturally rise within sentient beings.
May I liberate the host of beings
Not liberated by former victorious ones.

3. What is to be learned about refuge

a. The causal aspect,

There are four sections

1) The instruction not to abandon the three jewels

Then regarding refuge:

Of these two different learnings, as for the causal aspect,
In order to enjoy our lives and worldly actions,
We should never abandon the guru and the three jewels.

Why? Within this life these are hardly different from virtue. Refuge establishes all the virtues that are exalted and truly good. This is because it bridges the gap between degradation and excellence. Shantideva says:

For gaining lesser things, let us not leave the great.
We should chiefly think of others' benefit.

That is what it is like. the Vinaya says:

For life, and power or even jokingly, the three jewels should never be abandoned.

- 2) The instruction that refugees are worthy of homage and should not be deceived:

Anyone who has gone for refuge with the guru,
Is worthy of respect, and we should never cheat them;
And let us abandon harsh slander of the holy ones.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

By depending on the spiritual friend one is worthy of respect and should not be deceived.
Let us stop saying unpleasant things about the holy ones, and instead follow the holy Dharma.

- 3) The limits to be guarded in respect to the three jewels:

Anyone who has gone for refuge to the Buddha,
Should never offer homage to any god seen as other.
Anyone who has gone for refuge to the dharma,
Should abandon doing harm to every sentient being.
Anyone who has gone for refuge to the sangha,
Should abandon consorting with the infidels.

The Shri Mahanirvana Sutra says:

Whoever goes to refuge with the Buddha,²⁰¹
Should never go to refuge with other gods.

Whoever goes to refuge with the Dharma
Should abandon attitudes of doing harm.

Whoever goes for refuge to the sangha
Should not associate with infidels.

- 4) The instruction to pay faithful homage to the guru and the three jewels:

Even their pictures ought to be faithfully revered.
Recalling them day and night, we should always go for refuge.

Even pictures of the guru and the three jewels should never be treated with disrespect. Revere them in such a way that does not tread even on their shadows. This is because they are emanations of the goodness of the buddha fields. As is said:

During this time of the age of obscuring darkness
I have emanated the spiritual friend.

The White Lotus says:

Many bodily forms are emanated.
They benefit beings by their wholesome actions.

The "Ear-ring"²⁰² or Avatamsaka Sutra says:

In the last period of five hundred years
I will then exist in the form of letters.
To the mind with the thought that "I exist,"
At that time to that I will be respectful

By being mindful continuously day and night, or six times, or three, or at least once, go to refuge; and then these subsequent virtues will be established. How? Because when the virtues of the spiritual friend are told, one learns to practice them. Because the virtues of the three jewels are told, one emulates them. Behavior is the vinaya. Meditation is the sutras. The view is adhidharma. Practicing according to these is the refuge of practicing according to the path. Gathering the basis, one relies on holy beings, listens to the holy Dharma, and practices with the sangha. This is taking refuge.

b. what is learned in the fruition,

There are two sections

1) The main subject matter:

What is to be learned in the aspect of fruition
Is to strive sincerely for equanimity.
One should not conceptualize either good nor evil,

Neither high or low, accepting or rejecting.
We should not rely upon complexities,
But rather train in the natural state of dharmata.
Let us course within the single mandala,
Where everything there is spontaneously perfected.

The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

One who desires to meditate on the prajnaparamita should learn the manner of not conceiving of any dharmas whatsoever or seeing things accordingly. What is that? This is high. This is low. This is to be rejected. This is to be accepted. This is the buddhadharma. This is the Dharma pure of all external causation. One should not analyze in such a dualistic manner.

2) The cause of violation

Now there is the explanation of the bond to the ordinary objects of the refuge vow:

check this and commentary

We go beyond "bestowing" by proclaiming it imputation,
The defining feature is lost by arising of false views
Destroying what we should learn, we will surely fall.
Take care to be totally mindful of what we accept and reject.

The essence is buddhahood and enlightenment. If we think that one goes beyond a time of receiving it in rituals, so that bestowing is a mere label, false views arise, the three jewels are abandoned, and we cannot practice. As for offering the precepts of refuge, that they are bestowed is its defining characteristic. Thinking that prostrating to external deities and so forth does no harm is called going in a lower direction.

These violations like an exhausted royal lineage are not included in Buddhism and do not enter into it. Like a merchant deceived by his escort what one destructible. Like a picture falling off a wall, all one's learning and vows are easily destroyed. Like common people without a protector, they are easily trampled on by afflictions. Like a person who has broken the law, by breaking their promises, they will have many births in the lower realms and so forth. In that way, by conceptions that view one's infractions and violations, one will be remorseful; and after that if one's mind receives a vow, one will take it seriously. Though some want a certain fixed accounting, here there is no certainty. If the attitude of renunciation has arisen from virtue, it is because one wants it to. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 5.11

Attaining the attitude of renunciation
Is what is called the shila-paramita.

4. The benefits of refuge

There are seven sections

a. The benefit of protection in all one's lives

Now the benefits of refuge are explained. By going to refuge with external deities and so forth, one falls into the lower realms and such:

Those who see that other refuges are deceptive,
Having faith in the excellence of divine compassion,
Will have no fear, but be protected in all their lives.
What greater happiness and benefit could there be?

Just going to refuge cuts off the door to the lower realms. Establishing the celestial realms, the great path of liberation, and wholesomeness for all one's lives, refuge is unequalled. The Expression of Realization of a Pig says:

Anyone who has gone to the Buddha for refuge
Will not have to go to the lower realms.
After they have left their human bodies,
They will be reborn in the realm of the gods.

b. The benefits of perfecting the two accumulations:

Here, when the soil of a mind that is pure as well as faithful
Has been well-moistened by the rain of merit and wisdom,
Sprouts of auspicious Dharma germinate and grow,
Ripening as a crop of perfect victorious ones.

In the ground of faith, watered by the rain of the two accumulations, the seeds of Dharmadhatu, grow. They ripen as a crop of Buddhas. The Nirvana says:

Those who go to the three-fold refuges
Accumulating holy merit and wisdom,
By the growth of Dharma, conqueror of the world,
Will surely attain the level of buddhahood.

c. The benefit of immeasurable virtues

Moreover, when we as individuals go to refuge:

We gather the many qualities of Dharmic virtue.
Knowing how to be modest, decent, careful, and mindful.
Emerging from the covering clouds of dharani,
The brilliant sun of wisdom rises within our minds.

We see it even in dreams, and do not lose our awareness.
Keeping it in mind for many generations,
We become elegant with wealth and nobility.

The Sutra Requested by Precious Little Bird Gift says:

As for those who go to refuge with the Buddha, all their virtuous dharmas will grow. They know how to be decent. They take care.

Those who go for refuge with the Dharma are alert. They accumulate many virtues. They remember former lives. They have a share in the good fortune of the Dharma.

Those who go for refuge with the sangha have workable minds. For them there are many doors of samadhi and dharani. They are always of noble family. Even in dreams they are inseparable from the Buddha, Dharma, and sangha.

d. The benefit of being guarded by the gods, who are partial to virtue:

Because of the rejoicing of all sentient beings,
Both the two benefits are a spontaneous presence.
Finally we are the refuge of all who possess a body.
Befriending a host of beings, we hold the wealth of trikaya.

This is established by our being protected by the joy of the gods, who rejoice in white virtue, and by the increase of virtuous roots. The same text says:

Moreover, we are protected by the gods, who rejoice in virtue, and our virtuous roots increase.

We quickly attain the level of the victorious ones. The Nirvana says:

Whoever has gone to the three-fold objects of refuge
Quickly will become an enlightened being.

Those who have gone to the Buddha for refuge will finally attain buddhahood. Those who have gone to the Dharma for refuge will turn the wheel of the Dharma. Those who have gone to the sangha for refuge will be gathered into the ocean-like irreversible sangha.

e. As for the benefits being immeasurable

In brief, as for these virtues:

If all the virtues of refuge were to materialize,
Vaster than all of space, they would be limitless.

The Sutra of Spotlessness says:

If the merits of taking refuge were to take on form,
Having filled all of space, they would be even greater.

Moreover, as for clearing away all danger and harm, The Sutra of the Holy Victory Banner says:

O monks, whether you stay in monasteries, charnel grounds, or in the wilderness, those who have gone to the triple refuge will be without fear and suffering, and no one will say even "I will disturb one of your hairs."

Moreover, there will be no fear of maras and the lower realms. The Sutra of the Essence of the Sun says

Sentient beings who go for refuge with the Buddha
Cannot be killed by even ten million vicious maras.
As for breakers of discipline and disturbers of the mind,

Their births will certainly go beyond such things as those.

In brief those with the virtues of refuge are protected from kleshas, afflictions, the paths of the lower vehicles, samsara, the lower realms, and all such unpleasantness, while they attain all that is high and good. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

From all the host of kleshas, and wrong-doing,
And even from old age and death itself
They are protected by the Buddha himself.

From afflictions the lower realms and untimely death
From permanent views of transitory collections
And from the lower yanas they are protected.

Therefore this is the genuine refuge.

f. The benefit of being the support of all virtues:

As refuge is the ground of all good qualities,
Why would anyone competent not rely on it?

With these immeasurable virtues, refuge is properly relied on by all those who know what they are doing. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Those who are competent will follow virtue.
By its power perfect benefit is established.

g. the benefit of clearing away all the continuance of samsara and nirvana:

To the friend of all who abandon evil and go to peace,
Bowling our heads in homage with the deepest faith,
I take refuge in the source of happiness,
The wish-fulfilling tree that is the most excellent leader,
Who is all that is meritorious in the three levels.

The supreme refuge for all who are in the world together with its gods is the three jewels. This is because they protect us from all faults, and are guides that lead us to the peace of nirvana. They are the field of merit, the fulfillers of wishes, and holy treasuries of virtue. The same text says:

These three jewels are worthy of homage by everyone in the world, including the gods. They are worthy of salutation with joined palms. They are holy fields of merit.

The Bodhicaryavatara says: 1.36

Even those who have do harm are still connected to happiness.²⁰³
Let us then take refuge in that source of virtue.

Day and night six times or whatever, and at mealtimes, even if we do not want to eat, we should visualize the three jewels before us in space. Mentally we should prostrate and make offerings, confess evil deeds, rejoice in merit, request the turning of the wheel of Dharma, and supplicate the teachers not to pass into nirvana. Then, remembering the virtues of the three jewels, we should join our palms thinking, "May I attain this for the benefit of sentient beings." Thus one builds up to the jewel of the Buddha Bhagavat and so forth. As it says in the Moon Lamp Sutra:

When we have expressed mindfulness of the three jewels, if we subsequently dedicate the merit, evil deeds will be exhausted and virtue will increase. We quickly establish enlightenment and attain inseparability with the three jewels throughout all our lives.

C. The dedication of merit.

Now the merit is dedicated for the benefit of sentient beings:

As mahasukha is famed as the highest of qualities,
May all beings be well-absorbed in holy conduct.
Worn out by reliance on bad objects that corrupt,
May our minds today find ease from weariness.

By the thunder in the heaped clouds of merit of these auspiciously composed verses and by the excellent flashing display of the garland of their meaning, may sentient beings, who long have relied on inferior objects, the steeds of their minds worn out by many thousands of kinds of samsaric suffering, have their weariness eased by the Buddha Bhagavat in supreme happiness.

Pacified through the Dharma rain of holy amrita,
May goodness in the minds of beings have great increase.
May the wish-fulfilling clouds of the level of Victory,
Always touch us with excellent, liberating wisdom.
On whomever in the ten directions of the world,
There falls the Dharma rain of the Sugatas and their sons
By the coming of benefits may they be illuminated.
With the three lower realms self-emptied, may all become enlightened.
For blind ones wandering in the world without a leader,
May the virtues of the three jewels be fully and clearly proclaimed.
When all have been fully placed on the path of liberation,
May every single one attain enlightenment.

The Commentary on the Sixth Chapter of the Great Perfection, the Nature of Mind, the Easer of Weariness, "Going to Refuge."

That is the purpose of depending on the authentic spiritual friend, the beginning or foundation of the whole path of the mahayana.

VI Going for Refuge

There are three sections.

- A. The stages of entering the path of mahayana
- B. The particular objects of refuge
- C. The dedication of the merit of going for refuge.

- A. The stages of entering the path of mahayana,

Now from the teachings I have composed, there are the stages of how to enter into the path of the mahayana. First we should learn a bit about these:

Having properly relied upon a spiritual friend,
We should learn the stages of the path to liberation.

Why? Because it is not workable to enter all at once. If the lower virtues of the path have not arisen, it is impossible to obtain the higher ones. Therefore, if one does not ascend gradually, the higher ones will not be reached. The Nirvana Sutra says:

Just like the steps of a staircase,
My profound teachings likewise
Should be gradually thoroughly learned

Rather than all at once.

Just as for little children
Standing straight is gradually mastered,
We gradually enter this Dharma
Until it is perfected.

B. The particular objects of refuge

There are three parts.

1. The causal refuge,
2. The fruition refuge
3. The benefits of taking refuge.

1. The causal refuge

There are four parts.

- a) For individual beings who take refuge, there is the teaching of the individual kinds of foundation of their paths.

Taking refuge is the ground of every path.
Lesser people do so fearing the lower realms.
The two intermediate kinds are afraid of the state of samsara.
The greatest have seen all the aspects of samsaric suffering,
Finding others' suffering to be unbearable.
They fear the happiness of a personal nirvana.
In entering on the great vehicle of the buddha-sons,
There are three ways of taking refuge with three kinds of intention.
These are the unsurpassed, the excellent, and the common.

If we do not take refuge, the vow will not arise. If we do not bind ourselves with the vow, there will be no path. Therefore, it is the foundation of the path. The Seventy Verses on Refuge says:

Even if we have taken all the vows,
If we have not gone to refuge, they have no power.

Beings are of three kinds. The lesser, desiring the fruition of samsaric happiness, are afraid of the lower realms. Such persons, when they take refuge with their gods or with the three jewels, do not enter into the doctrine. Even if they enter, they are not buddhists. Even if they are included among buddhists and have faith in the three jewels, they are not able to enter the path. The Sutra of the Ultimate Victory Banner says:

As for persons terrified by fear,
They take refuge on mountains and in groves,
Or in temples and stupas, or in trees.
These are not the principal refuges.
They are not the excellent refuges.
With the foundation of such refuges,
They will not be fully liberated.

It is taught that they found their path in external gods in the desire of happiness. The Vinaya says:

Ananda asked, "Is it explained by the approach of a bhraman's daughter taking refuge in the virtues of the celestial realms?"

Then the Bhagavan spoke. "Ananda, that is not it. Such aspiration to samsaric happiness is known as the refuge of vulgar persons. Therefore, profess the true qualities of liberation.

This also explains the lesser sort of refuge in the three jewels, which has impure motivation.

As for the middle kind, those of the families of shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, afraid of samsara, go to refuge because they seek nirvana as a personal benefit. The *Ngama Denyi*²⁰⁴ says:

Whoever, at any time, should go to refuge
In the buddha, dharma, and the sangha
Is a possessor of the four noble truths:
Suffering, and the cause of suffering,
Truly passing beyond all suffering,
And the noble path with its eight branches
That leads to the condition of nirvana.

If they produce the divine eye of true prajna,
Those will be the principal refuges.
They are the refuges that are excellent.
Relying upon those very refuges
Completely liberates from suffering.

As for the greater kind, having become afraid of peace and happiness, one goes to refuge for the benefit of others. The Great Liberation says:

Some become afraid of personal peace and completely abandon it for the sake of those who have fallen into the river of samsara. Such refuge is known as that of excellent beings, the holy guides.

These three kinds of persons are distinguished on the basis of three kinds of mind. The Lamp of the Path of Enlightenment says:

By there being lesser, middle, and great,
It should be known that there are three kinds of beings.
Whoever, by whatever means is used,
Tries to accomplish only samsaric benefits
Such a being is known as being lesser.

Those who turn their backs on samsaric pleasures,
People who reverse all evil karma,
And try to attain the personal peace of nirvana,
Are those who are known as beings of the middle kind.

Those who, truly realizing their own suffering,
Wish to end all sufferings of others.
Those are beings designated as excellent.

Lesser ones, by practicing external cleanliness, non-injury, and Dharma go to the celestial realms. Having gone to refuge with the inner three jewels, by their minimal merits, they cross to the celestial realms.

Second, those who do that should also act in accord with the meritorious ten virtues and practice formless samadhi. Otherwise they will not cross to the celestial realms.

b) The time of going to refuge

Since the beings who rely in this way, will establish their three fruitions, when they go to refuge, they have three kinds of intention, ordinary, excellent, and unsurpassed. What are these?

The length of refuge accords with these various intentions.
Lesser ones do so until the happiness of the next life.
For the middle two it is as long as they live,
Or until they attain to the ultimate fruition
Of the path of the shravakas or pratyekabuddhas.
For the highest it is forever, or until they are enlightened,

Attaining the wisdom beyond all thought and evaluation.

Ordinary people take refuge until they get what they want from their gods, and in particular until they attain the celestial realms. The time is small, like the scope of their Dharma. With the middle two kinds, it is until they die, or attain their final goal of becoming arhats. The great ones do so until enlightenment or attainment of the wisdom of buddhahood.

c. The objects of refuge,

There are two parts

1. The general teaching of the ordinary and extraordinary objects of refuge

Now, regarding the supports or objects:

The two objects of refuge are the ordinary and causal,
And the extraordinary, when there is the fruition.
As for the vows that are thus concerned with cause and fruition,
The causal vehicles have a fruition established later.
But it is held by the different divisions of vajrayana
That fruition exists right now, in the form of one's own mind.
Only the name is common with the refuge teachings
That are found in the vehicles of characteristics.

The objects of refuge are of two kinds, ordinary and extraordinary. The objects of lower and intermediate beings are ordinary. Those of the greater ones are extraordinary. Why? The lesser objects involve a personal bias. Those proclaimed as the support of the middle two kinds are temporary, and so they grasp only a temporary ultimate. The higher ones grasp the mahayana. Its buddhadharmakaya is not grasped by the lesser and middle ones. There is the Dharma of the mahayana. There is the sangha of bodhisattvas.

In the causal refuge, one is brought to the fruition. In the fruition-refuge, it is maintained that the three jewels are really already established within one's being. The rites and compassion accompanying both are equal. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

These proclaim a wish for the real thing, and so their compassion too should be understood.

In the vehicles of characteristics, desiring to attain buddhahood after three lives, countless lives, or whatever, one goes to refuge. Desiring to attain dharmakaya within one's own being is the fruition refuge. Until that is attained, one goes for refuge to the three jewels, as the transitional, temporary refuge. This is called the causal refuge, because it is the cause of obtaining the other. Here people wish to take refuge temporarily in the three jewels, as distinguished from the ultimate singularity, the buddhadharmakaya. Rupakaya, and the dharmas of scripture and realization that are involved in the four paths of a spiritual warrior, the two cessations of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, the four states of noble beings, stream-enterers etc, and the path of bodhisattvas dwelling on the ten bhūmis of the mahayana are not ultimate objects of refuge. This is because they are relative, and have not reached the ultimate, and because such persons must still rely on others in attaining enlightenment.

Because rupakaya is relative, and because the dharmas of realization gathered within the being of shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas are other than the buddhas' realization, having human signs of accomplishing and gain, they are deceptive. They and all the Dharmas of scripture have to be abandoned at the time of seeing. Having become afraid of the sangha with its obscurations and habitual tendencies, one therefore becomes afraid of being dependent on the Buddha as well. The Uttaratantra says:

Since it they are abandoned, and have deceptive dharmas;
Since they do not exist, and because of having fear
These two Dharmas and the assembly of noble ones
Are not to be taken as permanent places of refuge.

Where is there such a refuge? Ultimately only in dharmakaya.

The same text says:

The refuge is the singleness of buddhahood.
Because the Sage, the Buddha, exists as dharmakaya,
The assembly of the sangha is also that ultimate.

The Sutra Clearing away Memory says:

The venerable ones asked, "To what Buddha should we go for refuge?
The Buddha spoke, saying, "There is refuge in the dharmakaya, but not in the rupakaya. They asked, "To what Dharma should we go for refuge?"
The Buddha spoke, saying, "There is refuge in the absolute dharma, but not in the relative dharma.
They asked, "To what sangha should we go for refuge?"
The Buddha spoke, saying, "There is refuge in the absolute sangha, but not in the relative sangha.

In brief, those who wish to attain the three enlightenments of shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, or bodhisattvas, within their being, proclaim one of those goals and take a casual refuge. In the sense that what is to be accomplished by the causal refuge is the ultimate, it to can also be said to be ultimate refuge.

Fearful of the teachings of productive activity of the protector-teachers of the path, Shakyamuni and so forth, as external buddhas who arrive and are established within one's being; and fearful of the Dharma taught by these, the productive activity of the path that crosses over to fearlessness, and fearful of the sangha, the companions who produce the activity of being liberated from fear, one abandons the temporary causal situation. This is the situation of establishing within one's being the establishing cause of enlightenment, the three jewels. The reason for establishing it is that if this latter kind of Dharma, also taught by the Buddha, is practiced with one's companions in the sangha, one will be liberated from fear.

Some gurus say that by the mahayana that which protects from subtle obscuration, and even subtle fear, is only the buddhadharmakaya, so that is postulated as the fruition refuge.

In the pratyekabuddhayana, the self-arising of the three jewels realized within one's being is the fruition. Then the fruition objects of refuge are established.

In the shravakayana, whose adherents will arise as pratyekabuddhas in the future, the sangha of arhats is postulated as the fruition object of refuge.

The fruition refuge objects of each of the three vehicles are different. The mahayana proclaims that if one is enlightened one's essence is one with the nature of trikaya. How is it suitable that the dharma and sangha should not arise?

Both the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas maintain that the two cessations are ultimately attained, and hence that their respective versions of absolute truth, supreme enlightenment and dharmakaya, come about as the goal; so how can the buddha and dharma jewels be non-existent for the shravakas? For the pratyekabuddhas too cessation is proclaimed as dharmata and enlightenment, and it is maintained that only the Dharma jewel is eliminated. Therefore, for both what exists in the case of the fruition is maintained to be their particular version of enlightenment. So the ultimate three jewels are attained, and these are said to be the fruition refuge. The Sutra requested by the Householder Drakshulchen says:

In going to the Buddha for refuge, it is maintained that buddhahood is attained. In going to the Dharma for refuge, it is maintained that the Dharma is attained. In going to the sangha for refuge, it is maintained that the sangha is attained.

With the goal of establishing the nature of the two truths, going to the three jewels for refuge is the causal refuge. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

O monks, whether this was done for the sake of self or others, so that oneself might be liberated from fear and torment, you are persons who have gone to refuge. That and that, which you wish and hope for, will be completely perfected.

As for the secret mantra, wishing to see manifestly that the nature of one's mind exists as buddhahood which is even now intrinsic to one, one goes to refuge with the ordinary, external three jewels. Because of that, one rests in the extraordinary nature of one's own mind, the primordial unborn.

Thus, both the three jewels of the individual tantric mandalas and the three jewels of the general teachings are maintained to be causal objects of refuge.²⁰⁵ The nature of one's own mind, self-arising wisdom, is the primordially existing three jewels. This is the object of fruition-refuge. Resting in that without accepting and rejecting or defilements of artificiality is the fruition refuge. Though indeed, for the sake of that, as its cause, grasping refuge in terms of proclamation is esteemable, since chiefly it exists intrinsically and spontaneously, resting within that without adulteration is the fruition refuge. The external causal refuges are a corresponding condition for establishing that. The Existence of Wisdom says:

All the masters of the three mandalas²⁰⁶
Have a desire to gain that other perfection,
Therefore they also aspire to have its cause.
As for the luminous nature of the mind,
For the masters of the three mandalas,
Having realized that, they meditate
Within its one pointed equanimity.

This is truly explained as the supreme fruition.

Regarding these two ways of identifying the two refuges, in the lesser, ordinary vehicles, the Buddha is the supreme nirmanakaya. The Dharma is the twelve kinds of scripture of the Master of the Dharmas of scripture and realization²⁰⁷ and the paths of the individual continuum, the samadhis and so on. The two sanghas are those of ordinary beings and noble ones. The lesser sangha of ordinary beings is that of male and female getsuls and genyens.²⁰⁸ This is the field of merit of beings. The greater are those who have taken full ordination, the great sangha of monks and nuns. The sangha altogether includes these four above. Among the noble ones are stream-enterers, once-returners, non-returners, and arhats. The main point is buddhahood.

As it is told within the mahayana, there is also the nature of the three kayas of buddhahood, possessing the two purities of nature and the incidental, the ultimate in which the two benefits are perfected. The Mahayanottaratantra says:

It is uncompounded and self-existing
It is not realized by external conditions.
It possesses knowledge, kindness, and power.
This is Buddhahood with the two benefits.

The essence of Dharma is inexpressible by speech or thought. Its nature is the path or antidote that leads to buddhahood. Its aspects are the characteristics of the five paths and two cessations of the Dharma of the meaning and the twelve limbs of the Buddha's verbal teachings. The same text says:

Without discursive thought, duality, and concept,
There are the clear and luminous aspects²⁰⁹ of the antidote,
Wherever anyone is free from all desire,
That is known as possession of the authentic two truths.
That is the Dharma. The two desirelessnesses,
Comprise the state of cessation and the truth of the path.

In the two cessations, former defilements are cleared away by the antidote. These two are:

- 1.) cessation of discriminating awareness without complexity
- 2.) cessation of discriminating awareness that rests in the natureless meaning in which defilements or complexities are like the sky.

On the path, there is realization of the aspects of accumulation, unification, seeing, and meditation. Comprehending the characteristics of the two truths involves all the Dharmas of scripture and realization.

The sangha is the newly seen meaning of the luminous nature of mind of those dwelling on the ten bhumis. The same text says:

Because of the inner meaning of nature and extent,
Apprehended in the pure vision that is seen by wisdom,
The assembly who are non-returning through this mind,

Have possession of all the virtues that are without mind.

What is maintained about the extraordinary topic of the vajrayana, differs in the individual tantras.

The Kriya and Caryā tantras say that the Buddha Jewel is the five wisdoms, and pure dharmatā, the nature of the three or four kayas, along with its emanations and blessing-bestowing deities. These are gathered under three families, tathagata,²¹⁰ padma, and vajra. The deities of the greater and lesser mandalas possess respectively the peaceful and wrathful accoutrements of sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya.

The Dharma Jewel is as before, adding the particular individual texts of each yana. The Sangha Jewel is the three-fold sangha of śhravakas, bodhisattvas, and vidyadharas.

In yoga tantra the Buddha Jewel is the five wisdoms and the pure dharmatā of nirvana or the three kayas. This includes the continuity of the mandala which gathers all the peaceful and wrathful appearances of the five families and trikaya under Vajrasattva as the master of all mandalas. It also includes the ratna, padma, karma, and tathagata families, along with their chief deities, retinues, and root mandalas with their one or many deities, divided into the samaya, dharma, and karma mandalas; the four seals or mudras, samayamudra, dharmamudra, karmamudra, and mahāmudra, and all the great and lesser mandalas developed in one or more stages.

The Dharma and Sangha Jewels, are as already explained.

In mahayoga, the Buddha Jewel is the Bhagavan's great buddha activity, dwelling inseparably with the vajra nature of the body, speech, and mind of all the tathagatas as the chief deity. There is also the retinue, as one, many, or deity-clusters, dwelling within the monolithic abundance of Gandavyuha, and all the many emanations emanated by them.

The Dharma Jewel is all that was previously taught. There is also the unsurpassable Sangha Jewel, blazing with the major and minor marks, whose nature is inseparable from that of the three jewels.

As to why they are called the rare and excellent three jewels,²¹¹ the Mahayanottaratantra says:

Since they arise rarely and since they are undefiled;
Since they are powerful and ornament the world;
Since they are superior, and since they are excellent,
They are called the rare and excellent triple gem.

Because of these six similarities to precious gems, the Buddha, Dharma, and sangha, are known as "the three jewels," and said to be like precious jewels.

1) The similarity of rare occurrence

This is because even in the changes of many kalpas, their virtuous roots are not established and not encountered.

2) The similarity of being undefiled

This is because they are always free from defilement.

3) The similarity of being powerful

This is because the six consciousnesses and so forth have powerful virtues beyond the scope of thought.

4) The similarity of being the ornament of the world

This is because they are the cause of the wholesome thoughts of all beings.

5) The similarity of superiority to artificial gems

This is because they are beyond the world.

6) The similarity of being changeless by praise and blame and so forth

This is because their nature is uncompounded.

As for the three-fold classification, the Mahayanottaratantra says:

By the meaning of teacher, the teaching, and the students,
From the viewpoint of those persons who have devotion
For the three vehicles and the three activities,
The three occasions are presented.

1) the good qualities of the teacher, the meaning of the teachings of such a teacher, the individuals of the bodhisattva vehicle trying to enter into the reality of buddhahood, and the supreme activity of buddhahood, from the viewpoint of those who are devoted to it, is the occasion of Buddha, the most excellent of those with two legs. So it is taught and presented.

2) The good qualities taught by the teacher, as the meaning of the teaching, consist of the profound Dharma, through their own auspicious coincidence, since they are afterwards thought of as constituting it. From the viewpoint of individuals within the pratyekabuddha yana and those who have devotion for the production of supreme buddhahood, these are the occasion of the Dharma. This is because those who are free from desire are supreme. So it is taught and presented.

3) The good qualities of the students who enter into the teachings taught by the teacher, are that because they hear the meaning from others and they later understand it, they enter into it. For beings of the shravakayana and from the viewpoint of those who have devotion for making the sangha supreme, this is the occasion of the sangha, since these are the supreme ones of the assembly. So it has been taught and presented.

In brief, the temporary refuge is the three jewels. The ultimate refuge is the singularity of buddhahood. The same text says:

The holy truth which is the refuge of beings
Is the singularity of buddhahood.
Because the Sage possesses dharmakaya,
This is also the sangha and its goal.

The occasion of fruition, the ultimate goal, is like that. So it is explained.

2. The particulars of the causal object

There are three sections.

a. The general teaching of the three jewels

Now where proclaimers of the ordinary refuge have the power to take refuge, they request a refuge because they are afraid of themselves. It is explained that because they are worthy of the support of what the ritual of taking refuge proclaims, its nature was therefore taught:

The causal object is the three jewels concretely conceived.
Here the Buddha means the supreme nirmanakaya.
He is ornamented with the major and minor marks.
There are two kinds of Dharma: The dharma of spotless meaning, And also its reflection in a written form.
The meaning of sutras and tantras in the various vehicles.
Is a reflection in letters of the ultimate teaching.

In the great and lesser vehicles, in particular the three jewels as the support of refuge are

1. The nirmanakaya ornamented with the major and minor marks
2. The Dharma, including the words and meanings of the sutras and tantras, and all their reflections in letters.
3. All perfect enjoyments.

b. the Dharma jewel

From the two Dharmas of scripture and realization, there are two sections

1) Scripture, the causal Dharma:

a) Sutra

There are twelve divisions of the sutra teachings
General teachings, hymns and praises, and prophecies.
Verses and aphorisms, and pragmatic narratives.
Biographical stories and former events as examples.
Stories of former births, and the extensive teachings.
Narratives of marvels, and teachings of profound doctrines,

The Noble Moon Lamp Sutra says:

There are the following:

- 1) Sutras or general teachings.
 - 2) Verse summaries.
 - 3) Prophecies.
 - 4) Verse-teachings.
 - 5) Exhortations.
 - 6) Biographical tales of realization.
 - 7) Narratives of former examples.
 - 8) Conditional Declarations.
 - 9) Extensive teachings.
 - 10) Narratives of former births, jataka tales.
 - 11) Resolution teachings.
 - 12) Narratives of miraculous events.
- 1) All that is part of these various divisions taken together is known as the sutras.
 - 2) The final summary in verse of what has first been taught in full is called verse summary.
 - 3) The prophecies of the Buddha and others are the prophecy-teachings.
 - 4) Verses that occur alone are verse-teachings.
 - 5) Teachings that exhort the ones who listen to the Dharma are called exhortations.
 - 6) Blessings by particular persons' auto-biographical accounts of their own realization, are called biographical tales of realization.
 - 7) Teachings about former generations are called narratives of former examples.
 - 8) When some topic is associated with its conditions, that is called conditional declarations.
 - 9) When a topic is presented very extensively that is called extensive teachings.
 - 10) Tales of how the Buddha was faithful and so forth in previous births are called jataka tales.
 - 11) When after a subject is briefly taught, a commentary on that is taught, that is called resolution-teachings.
 - 12) Wondrous teachings of the heart essence are called miraculous teachings.

b) The fruition Dharma, tantra

Moreover, aside from the sutras:

Kriya carya and yoga are the external tantras
Within the mahayoga of the inner mantra
Are included the father, mother, and non-dual tantras,
These have non-duality of prajna and upaya.
The volumes where these are written are also known as tantras.

The chief, powerful, or external tantras establish enlightenment in dependence on external purification. Belonging to this class are kriya yoga, Upa or carya yoga, and yoga tantra.

The inner tantras are the three in which buddhahood is established by being beyond accepting and rejecting, and upaya and prajna are non-dual. All six of the above are called tantras, as are their literary manifestations.²¹²

2) The Dharma of Realization,

There are four sections

a) The general teaching of the stages of development and completion

As for the nature of the meaning:

In the dharma of realization are the paths and bhumis.
There are also the stages of developing and fulfillment.

Dharani²¹³ and samadhi having the essence of wisdom.
Of the nature of compassion, their upaya is without limit.

b) the teaching of the ten bodhisattva levels or bhumis

The support of these is the bhumis:

The bhumis are Supremely Joyful, and the Spotless,
Illumining, Radiant, and the Difficult to Conquer,
The Manifest, the Far-going, Immovable, and Good Intellect. The highest of these ten is known as Clouds of Dharma.

The Great Commentary on the Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

It is explained that these are called the bhumis or "grounds" from their being the ground or support of the virtuous qualities. There are eight bhumis of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, and ten of the bodhisattvas.

As for the first, the Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

The eight of the level of the family, seeing, restraint, desirelessness, and realization of what was done, are known as the bhumis of shravakas and pratyekabuddhas.

The Precious Mala says:

Just as within the shravakayana
Shravaka bhumis are listed as eight
Similarly in the mahayana
There are ten bhumis of bodhisattvas.

First, the path of preparation is called the family level, since it is individually described in each of these three yanas. The Prajnaparamita in Twenty Thousand Lines says:

The explanation of the bhumi of seeing the white aspect is that dharmas are seen as white.

Entering the stream, entering the fruition, continuous remaining, and remaining within the fruition, make up the eight levels up to arhatship, called the eight bhumis. Here, by being liberated from the many defilements of the one bhumi of desire, the four dhyanas of form, and the four formless attainments, one becomes an arhat.

The first fruition of wholesome practice includes entering the stream of seeing and resting within the fruition. These two are the bhumi of seeing.

Renouncing ones familiar relationships with the desire realm for the most part, one becomes restrained in the bhumi of a once returner. These two are called [entering into and resting in] the bhumi of restraint.

Free of the desire of the desire realm, one becomes a non-returner. These two are called [entering into and resting in] the bhumi of freedom from desire.

By doing what one has to do, one is an arhat. These two are called [entering into and resting in] the bhumi of realizing what has to be done.

The three levels preceding entering into being an arhat are known as the shravaka-bhumis. Their purpose is differently understood within the different yantras. By the pratyekabuddhas, these bhumis are called the four fruitions of pratyekabuddhas.

In this case, the explanation of the bodhisattva bhumis is that by the renunciations of seeing and of meditation one is protected from fear of the innumerable evil spirits of the kleshas. They are called levels or bhumis because one goes successively higher and higher. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Since one is without the fear of innumerable evil spirits,
Since one travels ever farther and higher than that,
These are therefore maintained to be the levels or bhumis.

Moreover, in dependence on eliminating miserliness and so forth, the ten inappropriate partialities, we are placed within the ten bhumis. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Kye, sons of the Victorious One, for these ten bhumis to arise, the ten inappropriate partialities must be cleared away. therefore, they are revealed by the ten perfections.

On the first bhumi, one chiefly practices the paramita of generosity, but if the others too are not practiced insofar as one can, that is not it...

Up to the tenth paramita, wisdom, the corresponding point is taught. Moreover, regarding the ten paramitas, the Center and Limit says:

Generosity, discipline, patience and energy,
Meditation and also perfection of prajna or knowledge.
Skillful means and power, aspiration and wisdom
These are what are said to be the ten perfections.

The ten to be abandoned by these are miserliness, broken discipline, aggression, laziness, distractedness, confused prajna, unskillful means, diminished power, unsuccessful aspiration, and the obscuration of knowables.

As for the ten bhumis whose revelation depends on these being cleared away:

1.) regarding the first bhumi, supremely joyful, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

We approach enlightenment
And see how to benefit beings.
As supreme joy rises from this,
It is known The Supremely Joyful.

The Ratnavali says:

The first of these is called Supremely Joyful.
Since the bodhisattva produces joy,
Thereafter the three fetters are abandoned.²¹⁴
We are born within the tathagata family.
By the ripening of that, generosity is supreme.
We are able to move a hundred world realms.
We become great lords in Jambuling.

We view the faces of a hundred buddhas in an instant, know how to be blessed by a hundred buddhas, send forth a hundred emanations, teach for a hundred kalpas, enter into a hundred visions of wisdoms, arouse and stabilize a hundred samadhis, ripen a hundred sentient beings, move a hundred buddha fields, open a hundred gates of Dharma, multiply our bodies a hundred times, and each of these bodies teaches surrounded by a perfect retinue of a hundred. We are able to take birth as a lord within Jambuling.

2.) As for the second bhumi, the former text says:

Because these ten aspects are completely undefiled,
Therefore, they stay that way entirely by themselves.
The ripening of that is perfection of discipline.
We possess the seven glorious royal possessions²¹⁵
We turn the wheel of benefit for sentient beings.

Because of being without the ten unwholesome actions, we practice the ten virtues. We attain in an instant twelve thousand of the good qualities described above. We take birth as a universal monarch ruling a world system of four continents.

3.) As for the third bhumi, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Because the great light of Dharma is produced,
It is called the Producer of Radiance.

The Ratnavali says:

As for the third bhumi, Producer of Radiance,
Since the light of wisdom arises on this level,
Meditation and higher perceptions will arise,
Since all greed and aggression are completely exhausted,
As for the perfect ripening of the exhaustion of these,
We practice with the highest patience and energy.
We become great and skilful lords among the gods.
The greed and lust of desire is totally reversed.
We will have twelve hundred thousand good qualities,
Taking birth as Indra, the king of the thirty-three gods.

4.) As for the fourth bhumi, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Thus the Dharma that accords with enlightenment,
Is like a torch with fiercely blazing light.
Because we now possess that, as for this fourth bhumi,
By burning duality, it greatly illuminates.

The Ratnavali says:

The fourth is called, Possessing Emanation of Light.
Because the genuine light of wisdom now arises,
All accords with enlightenment without remainder.
In particular, when this fully ripens in meditation,
We become completely limitless kings of the gods.
We have the proper view of transitory collections.
We are skillful, and therefore we are all-victorious.

We attain a hundred and twenty million of the above qualities and take birth as a king of the twin gods.

5.) As for the fifth bhumi, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Because we completely ripen sentient beings,
We are also able to guard our minds,
For the wise this conquest is difficult,
Hence the name the Difficult to Conquer.

The Ratnavali says:

The fifth is called The One that is Difficult to Conquer,
Since all the maras are difficult to overcome.
Because skillful knowledge arises in our being
Of the subtle meaning of the four noble truths and such,
As for the full ripening of this good arising,
We will be born as kings of the Tushita gods.

A hundred and twenty billion good qualities arise, and one is made the king of the gods of the Tushita heaven.

6.) As for the sixth bhumi, the former text says:

Because with the support of the perfection of prajna
Samsara and nirvana both manifest at this time,
This is therefore called the Bhumi of Manifestation.

The Ratnavali says:

The sixth is called The Place of Manifestation.
Because the dharmas of buddhahood manifest.
By practice of shamatha and vipashyana,
Cessation blossoms, and by its ripening,
We take birth as kings of the Nirmanarati gods.²¹⁶

We have ten million times twelve hundred thousand good qualities and becomes king of the Nirmanarati gods.

7.) As for the seventh bhumi, the former text says:

Related to the path of crossing all at once,
This seventh bhumi is called, "the one that is far-going."

The latter says:

The seventh is The Far Going. The way in which it goes far,
Is by entering the equilibrium of cessation
By the ripening of that instant entering,
We become lords of the Para-nirmita-vasavartin gods.²¹⁷

We have twelve times ten hundred million thousand good qualities and are made kings of the Paranirmitavasavartin gods.

8.) As for the eighth bhumi, the former text says:

Because it is not moved by dualistic perception,
It is rightly known as The Unmoving One.

The latter text says:

Similarly the eighth is called the kumara level²¹⁸
It is unmoving because it is complete non-thought.
Body, speech, and mind, which are the whole of one's being,
Are motionlessness in a way beyond the scope of thought.
By the ripening of that, we are born as Bhrama,
The lord of realm whose number of worlds is a thousand cubed.

Bhrama in general is lord of the first dhyana form gods in a number of heavens. As for good qualities, we see the faces of as many buddhas as there are particles in a hundred thousand thousand-fold world systems and so forth.

9.) As for the ninth bhumi, the former text says:

With good understanding that truly knows individual things
This ninth bhumi is called "the one with good understanding."

The latter says:

The ninth bhumi, "good understanding," is like a regent.
Since it truly knows individual things,
By this we attain good understanding.
As the ripening of this we are mahabhrama,
Lord of two three-thousand fold realms of worlds.²¹⁹
In enquiring about the wishes of sentient beings
By arhatship he is not ravished away.

As for good qualities, those on this bhumi see as many buddhas as there are particles in a hundred thousand countless three-thousand-fold world systems and so forth.

10.) As for the tenth bhumi, the former text says:

Since it pervades like clouds the realm of dualistic space,
This, the tenth bhumi, is therefore known as "The Cloud of Dharma."

The latter says:

The tenth of the bhumis is known as "The Cloud of Dharma."
Because the rain of holy Dharma falls,
And because the bodhisattvas are empowered,
By the light rays of the power of buddhahood.
As for the ripening, one is a lord of gods
In inconceivably countless wisdom realms

This is the excellence of Maheshvara. As for the good qualities, every instant we see twelve times as many buddhas as there are inexpressible numbers of atoms in the also inexpressible number of buddha fields and so forth.

In the first bhumi, by realizing that the same luminous essence of mind pervades all sentient beings, we realize the equality of oneself and others as bodhicitta, the mind of enlightenment.

In the second, realizing the excellence of those who can realize this, we work to purify the defilements of the dhatu.

In the third, realizing that learning this is the cause according with dharmadhatu, going beyond even a three thousand fold world system, becoming a single tongue of flame, one listens to the Dharma.

In the fourth, we realize that this is without ego grasping, and desire for the Dharma is abandoned.

In the fifth, realizing that this dhatu exists without difference in the being of oneself and others, we realize equality with all the buddhas by means of the ten pure thoughts²²⁰

In the sixth, realizing that the dhatu is naturally completely pure, we eliminate all grasping that accepts nirvana and rejects samsara.

In the seventh, realizing that the dhatu has no differences at all, grasping of characteristics is eliminated.

In the eighth, realizing that the garbha has no faults or virtues, no decrease and increase, the unborn patience of unborn Dharma becomes utterly and completely pure.

In the ninth realizing that within the dhatu as its intrinsic attribute is the peace of the four modes of genuine individual awareness²²¹ we produce the empowerment of wisdom.

In the tenth, by realizing that the dhatu is the source of perfect buddha activity, we attain autonomy in the four empowerments. As for these four empowerments, the Center and Limit says:

The all pervasive meaning, the supreme meaning,
The excellent meaning according with the cause;
The meaning of complete non-grasping;
The meaning of non-difference;

And the meaning of non-decreasing and non-increasing;
These are the topics of the four empowerments.

If one still is asking what those might be, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

They are for the sake of transformation
Of mind, fixation, discursive thought, and non-thought.
When these become fields and wisdom pure of karma,
These are then the four empowerments.

As for these, the four empowerments
In the three bhūmis of motionlessness²²² and so on,
In oneness they are other than duality,
So each of the empowerments is maintained.

- 1 By transforming the klesha-mind we attain the empowerment of complete non-thought.
- 2 By transforming fixation, the consciousness of the five gates, we attain the empowerment of the pure buddha fields. This second is the eighth bhūmi.
- 3 By transforming the mind-consciousness we attain mastery of the four modes of genuine individual awareness, and by attaining the empowerment of perfect buddha activity, we ripen sentient beings. This is the ninth bhūmi.
- 4 By transforming alayavijñāna, the basis of arising of concepts and the mind consciousness, within the tenth bhūmi, we attain the empowerment of the mirror-like wisdom. by the great buddha activity, buddhahood and the buddha activity existing in the sphere of activity become reconcilable. The Mahayanottaratantra says:

As for this manner of the bodhisattvas,
With the tathagatas in post meditation
And true liberation of beings
In the world they are equal.

In the eighth bhūmi there are the wisdoms of equality and discriminating awareness. In the ninth there is all-accomplishing wisdom. In the tenth, having attained the mirror-like wisdom and fourth empowerment, at the end the alaya of the basis of all the various habitual patterns is transformed in the empowerment of dharmadhātu wisdom. Then one is enlightened. The tenth bhūmi is empowerment in the great final²²³ light rays. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Having attained this final familiarity,
By the great light rays we are then empowered.
By realizing the vajra-like samādhi,
Indestructibility is gained.
That is the end of other transformations.
Undefined by any obscurations
To benefit all beings everywhere,
We produce supreme accomplishment.
We attain omniscience, the highest level.

As soon as a great offering has been made to the buddhas of the ten directions by those dwelling on the ten bhūmis, from the tuft of hair between the eyebrows of all the buddhas of the ten directions arise hosts of light rays. By their sinking into the foreheads of those bodhisattvas, the vajra-like samādhi and countless hundreds of thousands of others that they have not attained before are attained. The subtle obscuration of knowables has been purified, and then they are enlightened.

c. The outer and inner divisions

How?:

Coming after these, which are the ten levels of learning,
Is the level of total illumination, prabhasvara.
For the causal vehicles this is the level of nirmanakaya.

Vajrayana divisions go on by family and quality.
There are a twelfth and other levels beyond all measure.

For the vehicle of the perfections, at that time the former dhatus become enlightened. All dharmas are gathered into non-defilement and the wisdom of non-thought alone. The Establishment of Trikaya says:

Except undefiled suchness
And the wisdom of non-thought,
For the buddhas other dharmas
Do not exist at all.

The undefiled kaya is dharmata-svabhavikakaya. Though it has that nature, it also has aspects of the wisdom of non-thought, the powers, and so forth, and this is called dharmakaya. That same wisdom, appearing ornamented with the major and minor marks, for the sattvas of the ten bhūmis, is sambhogakaya. That same wisdom, appearing to students as other, taming whatever needs to be tamed, is nirmanakaya. That same wisdom continuous and unbroken, as long as samsara lasts, spontaneously doing benefit for others is buddha activity. As for svabhavikakaya, the Abhisamayalankara says:

As for the svabhavikakaya of the Sage,
Whatever undefiled dharmas are attained
These will always be complete in purity.
These will always have the true and genuine nature

As for dharmakaya, the same text says: [see categories below]

Measureless aspects come with enlightenment.
There are all the natures of the nine dhyanas,
As well as those of ultimate liberation,²²⁴
The various natures of the ten exhaustions,
And the eight-fold set of conquered ayatanas.

Being without kleshas and knowing one's aspirations,
Each higher perception is truly apprehended,
Along with the four ever-present purities,
The ten powers of a buddha and the ten masteries,
The four kinds of fearlessnesses and the three non-guardings
As well as the three pillars of mindfulness.²²⁵

Awareness of dharmata that is never-bewildered²²⁶
By the true enemy habitual patterns.
There is arising of the great compassion,
And the 18 unshared dharmas of only the Sage
And the all pervading knowledge of omniscience.
So dharmakaya has been described.

As for the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment there are the four objects of mindfulness,

the four correct actions, abandonment etc,
the four legs of miracle,
the five controlling powers,
the five powers,
the seven branches of enlightenment,
the eight-fold noble path.

The four objects of mindfulness are the essential recollections of

- 1.) body
- 2.) feeling
- 3.) mind,
- 4.) dharmas.

The four correct trainings, abandonments etc on the path of accumulation of the shravakas are

- 1.) abandoning non-virtuous actions before they occur,
- 2.) abandoning non-virtuous actions which occur to the mind,
- 3.) developing virtuous actions which have not yet occurred to the mind,
- 4.) cultivating virtuous actions that have already been developed.

The four legs of miracle or four stages of miraculous ability are the stage of miraculous ability which trains in the contemplation of

- 1.) yearning or aspiration,
- 2.) mind
- 3.) effort
- 4.) investigation

The five faculties are

- 1.) faith
- 2.) perserverence
- 3.) recollection
- 4.) concentration
- 5.) discrimination.

The five powers are intensifications of these same five.

The seven branches of enlightenment are authentic or genuine

- 1.) mindfulness
- 2.) investigation of truth
- 3.) effort
- 4.) joy
- 5.) flexibility, shinjang.
- 6.) one-pointed contemplation.
- 7.) equanimity.

The eight-fold noble path is

- 1.) right view
- 2.) right thought
- 3.) right speech
- 4.) right action
- 5.) right livelihood
- 6.) right effort
- 7.) right mindfulness
- 8.) right meditation

The four immeasurables are

- 1.) kindness
- 2.) compassion
- 3.) joy
- 4.) equanimity.

The eight liberations, are

- 1.) liberation of form possessing liberation that looks at form
- 2.) liberation of non-form possessing liberation that looks at form
- 3.) liberation of what is attractive
- 4.) liberation of the formless perception of space
- 5.) liberation of the formless perception of consciousness
- 6.) liberation of the formless perception of nothing whatsoever,
- 7.) liberation of the formless perception of neither perception nor non-perception
- 8.) the liberation of cessation.

The nine samapattis, are

- 1.) the four dhyanas
- 2.) the four formless attainments,
- 3.) the samapatti of cessation.

The ten exhaustions are of

- 1.) earth
- 2.) water
- 3.) fire
- 4.) air
- 5.) blue
- 6.) yellow
- 7.) red
- 8.) white
- 9.) space
- 10.) consciousness.

The eight overcomings of the ayatanas,²²⁷ are as follows:

- 1.) by those possessing inner form,²²⁸ viewing lesser external phenomenal forms, and overcoming these
- 2.) by those possessing inner form, viewing greater external forms, and overcoming these
- 3.) by those not possessing form, looking at lesser forms, and overcoming these
- 4.) by those not possessing form, looking at greater forms, and overcoming these;
- 5.) Mere inner perception without inner form of blue, and overcoming it.
- 6.) Mere inner perception without inner form of yellow, and overcoming it.
- 7.) Mere inner perception without inner form of red, and overcoming it.
- 8.) Mere inner perception without inner form of white, and overcoming it.

The last four are called the four seeings. By clearing away kleshas in the continuums of others, they are made non-existent, and by all that spontaneously arises from their being so made, there is knowledge of the object of aspiration.

The six higher perceptions are:

- 1.) miraculous powers,
- 2.) the divine ear,
- 3.) knowing the thoughts of others,
- 4.) memory of former lives,
- 5.) the divine eye arising from manifested formations,
- 6.) the higher perception of exhausting defilement.

The four individual true apprehensions are of

- 1.) meanings
- 2.) words

- 3.) dharms
- 4.) powers.

the four purities, are complete purity of

- 1.) support
- 2.) perception
- 3.) object²²⁹,
- 4.) wisdom.

The ten masteries are power over

- 1.) life
- 2.) mind
- 3.) necessities
- 4.) actions
- 5.) birth
- 6.) devotion
- 7.) aspiration
- 8.) miracles
- 9.) wisdom
- 10.) Dharma.

As for the four fearlessnesses, one can make the following proclamations without fear of successful contradiction:

- 1.) "I am enlightened;"
- 2.) "I have stopped desire and so forth;
- 3.) "I teach with certainty the path of omniscience and so forth."
- 4.) "I have exhausted defilement."

By purity of one's actions of body, speech and mind, they are rightly performed. Not having to consider these three comprise the three non-guardings.

The three objects to keep in mind are in teaching the dharma to keep in mind

- 1.) what the listeners want and do not want.
- 2.) that with these two there are attachment and aggression.
- 3.) that when these two are absent, there are equanimity and mindfulness.

There are also

not forgetting the benefit of sentient beings
conquering all defiled habitual patterns
the great compassion that desires benefit for all beings

the eighteen unique dharms of a buddha.

The six aspects that are not possessed are

1. confusion
2. useless chatter
3. loss of mindfulness
4. non-equanimity of mind
5. perception of difference
6. equanimity that excludes discrimination

The six aspects that are not possessed with deterioration

7. resolve [to benefit beings]
8. diligent effort
9. mindfulness
10. samadhi
11. prajna
12. complete liberation

The three aspects that are preceded and followed by wisdom

13. Buddha activity of body
14. Buddha activity of speech
15. Buddha activity of mind

The three enterings into wisdom without attachment or obstruction

16. in the past
17. in the future
18. in the present

Besides those 18 there are also

omniscience
knowledge of the path,
universal awareness.

This great collection of twenty-one is dharmakaya.

As for sambhogakaya, the enjoyment body, the Abhisamayalankara says:

The nature of the thirty-two major marks
And also of the eighty minor marks,
Since these are enjoyed in experience of mahayana
They are called the Sage's enjoyment-body,

This is explained extensively below. Regarding nirmanakaya, the same text says:

When anyone, as long as samsara lasts,
Does benefits for limitless sentient beings
Equally, the bodies of such beings
Are the Sage's ongoing nirmanakaya.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

There are working tülkus, and born and enlightened tülkus.²³⁰
But the nirma_akaya of the supreme enlightenment
Is the nirma_akaya of the Buddha himself.
He has the great upaya which is total liberation.

Regarding buddha activity, the same text says:

Thus it is maintained that as long as samsara lasts
This karma is unbroken and continuous.²³¹

As for the secret mantra teachings, in addition to these levels there is a twelfth, Pemachen²³² or padmini, a kaya that does not appear to bodhisattvas, but only to the great experience of omniscience, beyond one and many and always spontaneously present. Some also say that in addition there is the thirteenth level of a vajra holder whose bliss pervades the limits of the all-pervading space of dharmakaya free from all complexities. Also some texts say that mahasukha is a fourteenth bhumi, samadhi is a fifteenth, and wisdom, the level of the guru, is a sixteenth. These and immeasurable others are taught. However they can all be related to sending out light rays everywhere and returning into the single essence.

The characteristics of the three kayas and five wisdoms appear with their individual divisions.

d. The paths

As for the previously taught paths

The paths are accumulation, preparation, and seeing;
the path of meditation and that of no more learning.
By the two stages and such, the profoundest objects of mind
Will arise, the immaculate, radiant sun of holy Dharma.

The gate of entering for beginners is the path of accumulation. The path of preparation involves

The four aids of release,²³³

- 1.) heat or warmth,
- 2.) "peak experience" or spiritual exaltation
- 3.) patience, steadfastness,
- 4.) supreme worldly dharmas.

This level is practiced through devotion. It is the second path of ordinary beings.

The paths of seeing and meditation are the paths of the bodhisattva noble ones. All these together are the four paths of learning. That which is to be abandoned through seeing and meditation is accomplished with effort. The final path is that of no more learning. This is the matchless umbrella, the single chief level. In those bhumis dharani and samadhi and such profound aspects of mind, and the dharmas that are the objects of wisdom are the three jewels. The path of no more learning is the Dharma. Associates are the sangha. The teacher is the Buddha. These things are said for people of different powers of mind. Here the different but inseparable ultimate and non-ultimate three jewels are all united.

c. The particulars of the sangha jewel

It is the support of association:

The external sangha includes the beings of the four classes And the buddha-sons abiding on the various bhumis.
The dakinis and the vidyadhara masters of vajrayana
Are those who are maintained to be the inner sangha.

The four classes, stream-enterer, once-returner, non-returner, and arhat of the sangha of shravakas and pratyekabuddhas and the bodhisattvas dwelling on the ten bhumis are the external sangha. The inner sangha is the dakinis and spontaneous arisen beings arisen from mantra and karma or buddha activity, and the world transcending assembly gathered under the vajra, ratna, padma, karma, and tathagata families, and the vidyadharas dwelling on the levels of mahamudra, life-mastery, and self-existence.

In this case there are four families of vidyadharas. These are the ripening, life-mastery, mahamudra, and self-existing families.

As for the first, the ripening, practicing the developing and completion stages on the paths of accumulation and preparation, they have ordinary bodies, but establish their minds as the kayas of the deities.

These until they have attained the supreme dharma, nirvana, in the meantime attain the mahamudra. This is because they reject the body and ripen the mind as the mandala of the deity.

The Stages of Action says:

The yogin of one and many, when that level
That is to be taught is to be attained
One Approaches and accomplishes 66 months,

Until the vajra body has been attained.
By the condition of having but little power
Because of weak aspiration one will stay
Within the residual body arising from concepts.
But by insight one goes to vajradhara.

If one attains the supreme Dharma, one is really connected to mastery of life. The same text says:

If one is not obstructed by conditions,
One will then be joined to the vajra body.

As for mastery of life, having reached the great, supreme Dharma, by attaining the kaya of the vajra body one is without birth and death. The path of seeing mind arises. The same text says:

The final and ultimate entering of seeing the meaning
Is accomplished by the siddhi of practicing vajra feasts.
Defiled bodily elements and their birthplaces are exhausted,
Becoming a vajra body in the family of life.
The dharmas of seeing, recited, consecrate nirvana,
The level of the Conqueror where body is not rejected.
Free from fear one perfects the miracle of life.

That body which is the support of supreme Dharma remains. The Secret Essence says:

Though births of humans, gods,
And Bhrama indeed are taken,
One stays on that special level.

Emanations and buddha qualities, are the phenomena of the first bhumi. A mudra-family-holder in the path of meditation from the second until the tenth bhumi, dwells on the ninth. There body appears as the phenomena of the mandala, and mind purified of defilements has wisdom without conceptualized characteristics. The Stages of Action says:

One's own mind becomes the mahamudra.
The kaya that manifests by meditation.
Possessing all the major and the minor marks,
Both the ordinary and supreme,
The two enjoyments are the family of mudra.

the Two Enjoyments says:

One becomes a holder of the families
Of the jewel, vajra, wheel, lotus, and sword.

In the second, third, fourth, and fifth bhumis, one is called a holder of the vajra family holder. This is because one destroys the defilements of one's own level by vajra-like realization.

In the sixth one chiefly practices the prajna-paramita. By turning the wheel of dharma one becomes a holder of the wheel family.

In the seventh one's arising like the wheel of Dharma is also skillful in means, and one is of the same family.

In the eighth, attaining the empowerment of the precious wisdom of non-thought, one is a holder of the precious jewel family.

In the ninth, without desire, by practice, and attainment one holds the lotus family.

In the tenth, producing benefit for sentient beings through perfect buddha activity, one is of the sword family. Holding the self-existing family is attaining buddhahood. The same text says:

By perfecting the powers of the former families,
As explained, defilements are purified.
The three prajnas which are those of a buddha,

Bring one to the self-existing family

Some masters have said that the mahamudra goes from the first bhumi until the seventh. Self-existence is explained as the three pure bhumis the eighth to the tenth. It seems they did not get the idea. Why? While travelling from the level of a beginner up to the level of buddhahood one is gathering these states of the four family holders.

d. The actual liturgy of refuge,

1) Emanating the fields

Now from the actual presentation of the liturgy of going to refuge, as for the cause of its arising, lesser ones fear the lower realms and desire the good qualities of the higher realms and so forth. The shravakas and pratyekabuddhas are also afraid of samsara, and produce the three kinds of faith.²³⁴ In the mahayana, by compassion, one turns the wheel of dharma for others. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

That is to be understood by means of compassion.

Moreover, after one has been told the virtues of refuge by the guru, one puts one's mind in order. Before representations of the three jewels one arranges offerings. In the space in front, the three jewels as explained above, just from having gathered the text and offerings, approach and remain. The Buddha and so forth are the objects of visualization. Visualize them in space:

Visualize these objects as being before you in space.
In particular Buddha and guru are said to be most important.

From the external viewpoint, the Buddha is most important, but internally the guru is most important.

1) how to go to refuge:

Making the outer, mental, and secret offerings,
Say "I and all sentient beings, joining our hands in devotion,
Take refuge until enlightened, for the benefit for others
In the Guru and the Buddha, the Dharma, and the Sangha.
Say this again and again, from the depths of your heart and bones.

The external offerings are incense, flowers, and so forth. The inner offerings are amrita, camphor, and so forth. The secret offerings are rejoicing, equanimity, supreme enlightenment and so forth. Offering these offerings, which fill the whole of space, to the guests who also fill the whole of space, say the following:

From this time until attaining the essence of enlightenment, I, [say your name], for the sake of all sentient beings, go to the guru for refuge. I go to the Buddha for refuge. I go to the Dharma for refuge. I go to the sangha for refuge.

Say this three times from the depths of your heart. This is the refuge attained from symbols. Afterwards resting in a state of complete non-conception, entering into the unborn is the absolute refuge. Attaining dharmata is the world-transcending refuge.

3) Emanation of light rays

At other times, visualize that by one's having gone to refuge in this manner, these representations radiate light and so forth as follows:

Visualize that by radiation of joy and light
Obscurations of the three gates are purified,
And that because of that the siddhis have been attained.
By that the accumulation of merits has been perfected.
And, as the fruition, rupakaya is manifest.

The Edifice of the three Jewels says:

By those beings who take the three-fold refuge
The accumulations will be completely perfected,
The level of Buddhahood will be accomplished.
The Dharma and sangha will also be accomplished.

That completes the explanation of the incidental causal refuge.

b. The fruition refuge

There are five sections

1) The explanation of the objects of refuge:

The ultimate refuge upon the fruition is dharmakaya.
Essence of divinity, buddha, dharma, and sangha,
One's own luminous mind, free from all complexity.

The vehicle of characteristics maintains that in the fruition refuge one attains for oneself the fruition of buddhahood. The incidental objects of refuge are the Dharma and sangha, and the ultimate one is the singularity of buddhadharmakaya.

As for the refuge that goes to the ultimate meaning,
That refuge is singularity, Buddhahood.

Dharmakaya is the ultimate object of the fruition refuge, because it is the ultimate three jewels.

In the causal refuge dharmakaya also comes into the continuities of others; but in the fruition refuge, the nature of one's own mind, free from all the extremes of complexity, exists as the nature of the three jewels, and one goes to refuge with that. The Establishment of Wisdom says:

The Buddha is mind with no need of attaining purity.
Unchanging and undefiled, this is also the Dharma.
Its self-perfected qualities are the sangha.
Since this is so, one's mind is excellent.

As to how one goes

2) The manner of going to refuge:

As for the taking refuge that makes this into the path,

Before the visualized representations, one goes to refuge,

"Having visualized that I and all sentient beings have done this, doing this for as long as the words have power, with these relative visualizations we take the causal refuge."

3) The explanation of the essence:

In accord with the cause, everything is one's mind.
In reality going and goer are non-dual,
This suchness is meditational equanimity.
If we grasp the mind and object as being two,
There will never be the ultimate realization.
The refuge of fruition has no aspiration.

Oneself and all sentient beings go to refuge with the phenomenal visualizations of the three jewels in space. Both also do so with their own minds, which in reality have not a particle of difference from their miraculous emanations. Since the essence of all this is the space-like nature of mind that does not fall into partiality, rest in that simplicity. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, Whoever does not conceive of even the Buddha, also does not think of the Dharma and the sangha. This is going into the real essence.

The thought that the object, the three jewels, and the perceivers, oneself and others, are different does not correspond to the way things actually are, so we need not aspire to those natures.

4) The explanation of post-meditation:

By that the accumulation of wisdom is perfected.
By that the state of dharmakaya has been attained.
Whatever may appear in the post-meditation state
It should be regarded as being a dream or illusion.

This non-conceptual emptiness is the accumulation of wisdom, and therefore dharmakaya is established. The Sutra Teaching the Two Truths says:

Manjushri, by the accumulation of merit rupakaya is attained. By the accumulation of wisdom, absolute dharmakaya is made to manifest.

All the dharmas of the phenomenal world of samsara and nirvana, appearing while they do not exist, should be regarded as being within a dream or illusion. As to how, the Vinaya says:

By the vast merit that rises up from this
May buddhahood naturally rise within sentient beings.
May I liberate the host of beings
Not liberated by former victorious ones.

3. What is to be learned about refuge

a. The causal aspect,

There are four sections

1) The instruction not to abandon the three jewels

Then regarding refuge:

Of these two different learnings, as for the causal aspect,
In order to enjoy our lives and worldly actions,
We should never abandon the guru and the three jewels.

Why? Within this life these are hardly different from virtue. Refuge establishes all the virtues that are exalted and truly good. This is because it bridges the gap between degradation and excellence. Shantideva says:

For gaining lesser things, let us not leave the great.
We should chiefly think of others' benefit.

That is what it is like. the Vinaya says:

For life, and power or even jokingly, the three jewels should never be abandoned.

2) The instruction that refugees are worthy of homage and should not be deceived:

Anyone who has gone for refuge with the guru,
Is worthy of respect, and we should never cheat them;

And let us abandon harsh slander of the holy ones.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

By depending on the spiritual friend one is worthy of respect and should not be deceived.
Let us stop saying unpleasant things about the holy ones, and instead follow the holy Dharma.

- 3) The limits to be guarded in respect to the three jewels:
- Anyone who has gone for refuge to the Buddha,
Should never offer homage to any god seen as other.
Anyone who has gone for refuge to the dharma,
Should abandon doing harm to every sentient being.
Anyone who has gone for refuge to the sangha,
Should abandon consorting with the infidels.

The Shri Mahanirvana Sutra says:

Whoever goes to refuge with the Buddha,²³⁵
Should never go to refuge with other gods.

Whoever goes to refuge with the Dharma
Should abandon attitudes of doing harm.

Whoever goes for refuge to the sangha
Should not associate with infidels.

- 4) The instruction to pay faithful homage to the guru and the three jewels:

Even their pictures ought to be faithfully revered.
Recalling them day and night, we should always go for refuge.

Even pictures of the guru and the three jewels should never be treated with disrespect. Revere them in such a way that does not tread even on their shadows. This is because they are emanations of the goodness of the buddha fields. As is said:

During this time of the age of obscuring darkness
I have emanated the spiritual friend.

The White Lotus says:

Many bodily forms are emanated.
They benefit beings by their wholesome actions.

The "Ear-ring"²³⁶ or Avatamsaka Sutra says:

In the last period of five hundred years
I will then exist in the form of letters.
To the mind with the thought that "I exist,"
At that time to that I will be respectful

By being mindful continuously day and night, or six times, or three, or at least once, go to refuge; and then these subsequent virtues will be established. How? Because when the virtues of the spiritual friend are told, one learns to practice them. Because the virtues of the three jewels are told, one emulates them. Behavior is the vinaya. Meditation is the sutras. The view is adhidharma. Practicing according to these is the refuge of practicing according to the path. Gathering the basis, one relies on holy beings, listens to the holy Dharma, and practices with the sangha. This is taking refuge.

- b. what is learned in the fruition,

There are two sections

1) The main subject matter:

What is to be learned in the aspect of fruition
Is to strive sincerely for equanimity.
One should not conceptualize either good nor evil,

Neither high or low, accepting or rejecting.
We should not rely upon complexities,
But rather train in the natural state of dharmata.
Let us course within the single mandala,
Where everything there is spontaneously perfected.

The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

One who desires to meditate on the prajnaparamita should learn the manner of not conceiving of any dharmas whatsoever or seeing things accordingly. What is that? This is high. This is low. This is to be rejected. This is to be accepted. This is the buddhadharma. This is the Dharma pure of all external causation. One should not analyze in such a dualistic manner.

2) The cause of violation

Now there is the explanation of the bond to the ordinary objects of the refuge vow:

check this and commentary

We go beyond "bestowing" by proclaiming it imputation,
The defining feature is lost by arising of false views
Destroying what we should learn, we will surely fall.
Take care to be totally mindful of what we accept and reject.

The essence is buddhahood and enlightenment. If we think that one goes beyond a time of receiving it in rituals, so that bestowing is a mere label, false views arise, the three jewels are abandoned, and we cannot practice. As for offering the precepts of refuge, that they are bestowed is its defining characteristic. Thinking that prostrating to external deities and so forth does no harm is called going in a lower direction.

These violations like an exhausted royal lineage are not included in Buddhism and do not enter into it. Like a merchant deceived by his escort what one destructible. Like a picture falling off a wall, all one's learning and vows are easily destroyed. Like common people without a protector, they are easily trampled on by afflictions. Like a person who has broken the law, by breaking their promises, they will have many births in the lower realms and so forth. In that way, by conceptions that view one's infractions and violations, one will be remorseful; and after that if one's mind receives a vow, one will take it seriously. Though some want a certain fixed accounting, here there is no certainty. If the attitude of renunciation has arisen from virtue, it is because one wants it to. The Bodhicaryavatara says: 5.11

Is what is called the shila-paramita.

4. The benefits of refuge

There are seven sections

a. The benefit of protection in all one's lives

Now the benefits of refuge are explained. By going to refuge with external deities and so forth, one falls into the lower realms and such:

Those who see that other refuges are deceptive,
Having faith in the excellence of divine compassion,
Will have no fear, but be protected in all their lives.
What greater happiness and benefit could there be?

Just going to refuge cuts off the door to the lower realms. Establishing the celestial realms, the great path of liberation, and wholesomeness for all one's lives, refuge is unequalled. The Expression of Realization of a Pig says:

Anyone who has gone to the Buddha for refuge
Will not have to go to the lower realms.
After they have left their human bodies,
They will be reborn in the realm of the gods.

b. The benefits of perfecting the two accumulations:

Here, when the soil of a mind that is pure as well as faithful
Has been well-moistened by the rain of merit and wisdom,
Sprouts of auspicious Dharma germinate and grow,
Ripening as a crop of perfect victorious ones.

In the ground of faith, watered by the rain of the two accumulations, the seeds of Dharmadhatu, grow. They ripen as a crop of Buddhas. The Nirvana says:

Those who go to the three-fold refuges
Accumulating holy merit and wisdom,
By the growth of Dharma, conqueror of the world,
Will surely attain the level of buddhahood.

c. The benefit of immeasurable virtues

Moreover, when we as individuals go to refuge:

We gather the many qualities of Dharmic virtue.
Knowing how to be modest, decent, careful, and mindful.
Emerging from the covering clouds of dharani,
The brilliant sun of wisdom rises within our minds.
We see it even in dreams, and do not lose our awareness.
Keeping it in mind for many generations,
We become elegant with wealth and nobility.

The Sutra Requested by Precious Little Bird Gift says:

As for those who go to refuge with the Buddha, all their virtuous dharmas will grow. They know how to be decent. They take care.

Those who go for refuge with the Dharma are alert. They accumulate many virtues. They remember former lives. They have a share in the good fortune of the Dharma.

Those who go for refuge with the sangha have workable minds. For them there are many doors of samadhi and dharani. They are always of noble family. Even in dreams they are inseparable from the Buddha, Dharma, and sangha.

d. The benefit of being guarded by the gods, who are partial to virtue:

Because of the rejoicing of all sentient beings,
Both the two benefits are a spontaneous presence.
Finally we are the refuge of all who possess a body.
Befriending a host of beings, we hold the wealth of trikaya.

This is established by our being protected by the joy of the gods, who rejoice in white virtue, and by the increase of virtuous roots. The same text says:

Moreover, we are protected by the gods, who rejoice in virtue, and our virtuous roots increase.

We quickly attain the level of the victorious ones. The Nirvana says:

Whoever has gone to the three-fold objects of refuge
Quickly will become an enlightened being.

Those who have gone to the Buddha for refuge will finally attain buddhahood. Those who have gone to the Dharma for refuge will turn the wheel of the Dharma. Those who have gone to the sangha for refuge will be gathered into the ocean-like irreversible sangha.

e. As for the benefits being immeasurable

In brief, as for these virtues:

If all the virtues of refuge were to materialize,
Vaster than all of space, they would be limitless.

The Sutra of Spotlessness says:

If the merits of taking refuge were to take on form,
Having filled all of space, they would be even greater.

Moreover, as for clearing away all danger and harm, The Sutra of the Holy Victory Banner says:

O monks, whether you stay in monasteries, charnel grounds, or in the wilderness, those who have gone to the triple refuge will be without fear and suffering, and no one will say even "I will disturb one of your hairs.

Moreover, there will be no fear of maras and the lower realms. The Sutra of the Essence of the Sun says

Sentient beings who go for refuge with the Buddha
Cannot be killed by even ten million vicious maras.
As for breakers of discipline and disturbers of the mind,
Their births will certainly go beyond such things as those.

In brief those with the virtues of refuge are protected from kleshas, afflictions, the paths of the lower vehicles, samsara, the lower realms, and all such unpleasantness, while they attain all that is high and good. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

From all the host of kleshas, and wrong-doing,
And even from old age and death itself
They are protected by the Buddha himself.

From afflictions the lower realms and untimely death
From permanent views of transitory collections
And from the lower yanas they are protected.

Therefore this is the genuine refuge.

f. The benefit of being the support of all virtues:

As refuge is the ground of all good qualities,

Why would anyone competent not rely on it?

With these immeasurable virtues, refuge is properly relied on by all those who know what they are doing. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Those who are competent will follow virtue.
By its power perfect benefit is established.

g. the benefit of clearing away all the continuance of samsara and nirvana:

To the friend of all who abandon evil and go to peace,
Bowing our heads in homage with the deepest faith,
I take refuge in the source of happiness,
The wish-fulfilling tree that is the most excellent leader,
Who is all that is meritorious in the three levels.

The supreme refuge for all who are in the world together with its gods is the three jewels. This is because they protect us from all faults, and are guides that lead us to the peace of nirvana. They are the field of merit, the fulfillers of wishes, and holy treasuries of virtue. The same text says:

These three jewels are worthy of homage by everyone in the world, including the gods. They are worthy of salutation with joined palms. They are holy fields of merit.

The Bodhicaryavatara says: 1.36

Even those who have done harm are still connected to happiness.²³⁷
Let us then take refuge in that source of virtue.

Day and night six times or whatever, and at mealtimes, even if we do not want to eat, we should visualize the three jewels before us in space. Mentally we should prostrate and make offerings, confess evil deeds, rejoice in merit, request the turning of the wheel of Dharma, and supplicate the teachers not to pass into nirvana. Then, remembering the virtues of the three jewels, we should join our palms thinking, "May I attain this for the benefit of sentient beings." Thus one builds up to the jewel of the Buddha Bhagavat and so forth. As it says in the Moon Lamp Sutra:

When we have expressed mindfulness of the three jewels, if we subsequently dedicate the merit, evil deeds will be exhausted and virtue will increase. We quickly establish enlightenment and attain inseparability with the three jewels throughout all our lives.

C. The dedication of merit.

Now the merit is dedicated for the benefit of sentient beings:

As mahasukha is famed as the highest of qualities,
May all beings be well-absorbed in holy conduct.
Worn out by reliance on bad objects that corrupt,
May our minds today find ease from weariness.

By the thunder in the heaped clouds of merit of these auspiciously composed verses and by the excellent flashing display of the garland of their meaning, may sentient beings, who long have relied on inferior objects, the steeds of their minds worn out by many thousands of kinds of samsaric suffering, have their weariness eased by the Buddha Bhagavat in supreme happiness.

Pacified through the Dharma rain of holy amrita,
May goodness in the minds of beings have great increase.
May the wish-fulfilling clouds of the level of Victory,
Always touch us with excellent, liberating wisdom.
On whomever in the ten directions of the world,
There falls the Dharma rain of the Sugatas and their sons

By the coming of benefits may they be illuminated.
With the three lower realms self-emptied, may all become enlightened.
For blind ones wandering in the world without a leader,
May the virtues of the three jewels be fully and clearly proclaimed.
When all have been fully placed on the path of liberation,
May every single one attain enlightenment.

VII The Four immeasurables

Thus having gone to refuge, from the main topic, the path of mahayana, there are the two sections on producing the two bodhicittas of aspiring to and entering into the supreme mind of enlightenment. Within that first there are the ten sections of the seventh chapter on the four immeasurables:

- A. The description of and the teaching of meditation on the four Bhrama-viharas
- B. The particular teaching;
- C. The particular objects of meditation
- D. The faults of impure objects of meditation
- E. The real object of meditation
- F. The particular aspects;
- G. How to meditate
- H. Other ways to meditate
- I The fruition of the meditation
- J. The dedication of merit.

- A. The description of and the teaching of meditation on the four Bhrama-viharas

Having gone to refuge, one meditates on the four immeasurables. Therefore, that is taught next:

Beings who become the vessels of dharma by taking refuge.
Cultivate their minds to benefit sentient beings.
Watered by equanimity in the cool shade of joy,
Flowers of compassion will bloom in the soil of kindness.

Here the example is a very pleasant garden-grove. In the soil of kindness green and rich

[[snga dang snub pa destroy/suppress read sngo dang snum pa]]

The various kinds of flowers of compassion open and bloom. In the cool shade of pleasant trees many birds and deer are present. From the lake of equanimity, and ponds, and good springs, flow a collection of many streams, where travelers tired out by samsara can refresh themselves. Weariness of mind is eased and cleansed away. What is described is arranged in ornamental forms. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, Here a bodhisattva mahasattva should meditate on kindness, compassion, great joy, and great equanimity.

- B. The particular teaching

As for the particular explanation of this and other things:

When these four have not been joined to the path of freedom,
These sources of sanity are causes of samsara.
But when they are empowered by the path of peace,
Then they manifest as the four immeasurables
By which we can transcend the ocean of samsara.

The Supreme Essence says:

Shariputra, these four, by which, if genuine mind is not produced, it will not be produced later, kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity, are the four bhrama-viharas. They are accompanied by samsaric karmic formations. They produce genuine mind. The kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity that are subsequently produced are called the four immeasurables. This is because they also produce the path of nirvana.

C. The teaching of the particular objects of meditation:

Their scope is universal, both with and without objects.
Encompassing both sentient beings and dharmata.

The meditation-objects of the four immeasurables are all sentient beings, in the arising of four immeasurables with a mental object; and also the dharmata of all dharmas, with suchness as the meditation object, in the arising of the four immeasurables without a mental object. The Bhumi-Collection says:

With the support of sentient beings and dharmata respectively, the four immeasurables with and without a mental object arise.

D. The faults of an impure meditation-object

There are two parts.

1. The faults of an impure meditation-object:

The former concerns a limited number of sentient beings.
Such impure objects are the cause of the Bhrama-viharas.

The meditation objects of the four Bhrama-viharas are the arousing of these four mental phenomena, kindness and so forth, for a limited number of sentient beings, one, two, or whatever. Here liberated mind is not achieved. One to one kindness, like that of a woman crossing the river Ganges with her child, produces samsaric causation, such as the arising of the Bhrama-viharas. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

The fruition of this attitude arising for one person
Is the Bhrama-viharas and so forth.

2. The instruction to learn the liberating four immeasurables

With the above-described awareness, these become the four immeasurables:

Directed to liberation, these become objectless.
This should be learned by those who are compassionate.
Those who are unhappy or tormented by suffering,
Or feel animosity to others, near or far,
Through being preoccupied with happiness and wealth,
Are objects of kindness, joy, compassion and equanimity

Those desiring liberation should learn to meditate on phenomena in the manner of the four immeasurables.

E. The real meditation object

Now the meditation object of the four immeasurables is explained:

Those who are unhappy or tormented by suffering,
Feeling greed or hatred towards others, near or far,
Through being preoccupied with happiness and wealth,
Are objects of kindness, joy, compassion and equanimity

The sentient beings taken as the meditation object of the four immeasurables are those who are not happy or are afflicted with suffering; and those who feel desire and aggression toward others nearby or far away because of their own pleasure, happiness, and wealth. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

The objects are those who desire happiness
And those with happiness afflicted by suffering,
And those who have the kleshas....

F. the particular aspects

As for the particular aspects:

The particular desires are that it may be workable
That all beings may be happy, and also free from suffering; and that never parting from joy, they have equanimity.

The object of these four immeasurables should be the wish that beings be without suffering and possess happiness; and that, not separated from joy, but leaving behind passion and aggression, their minds have only equanimity and kindness. The same text says:

I prostrate to you who are kind to sentient beings,
Intending that they should not be blocked by conflict,
Possessing as well the intention of non-separation,
Who have the intent of goodness of benefit.

The four immeasurables are free from what does not accord with the essence of each of them. The same text says:

May the objects abandon what does not fit with sanity.
May they come to possess the wisdom of non-thought.
May all sentient beings be completely ripened.

As for abandoning partialities that do not fit with each one, the commentary of that same text mentions not conceptualizing self and others, good or bad, happiness, suffering, and in between. Having abandoned them, benefit the object, sentient beings.

As to how to enter into the object, those who merely do not have happiness are the object of equanimity. In those who are tormented by suffering and possess passion and aggression there exists the cause and fruition of suffering. Therefore they are the object of suffering. The objects of joy, happiness and goodness, are those who enter into these three. That the four immeasurables have such dharmas as their objects is said in all the treatises. In the four immeasurables that have the object of dharmata, the nature of these is realized as the unborn. Moreover, in the tantras and their commentaries there is found the terminology of the four immeasurables which have not realized egolessness, which half-way and dualistically realize it, and those realizing two fold egolessness. The Bodhisattva-bhumi says:

That with sentient beings as object, is an object in common with heretics. That with dharmas as object is in common with shravakas, and pratyekabuddhas. That with no object, is not in common with anyone.

These arise with the object of sentient beings, dharmas, and with no object. Explaining the arising of these four in terms of the six aspects that do not correspond with the six paramitas, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Kindness to the miserly, and to vicious unsuitable ones,
Kindness to the irascible, and to the unconscientious.
Kindness to those who are motivated by external objects,
And kindness to those who are strongly inclined to wrong attachments.

Explaining the ten objects for which they are produced, the same text says:

One who comes into the power of the fiercely blazing enemy
One covered with suffering who is obscured with darkness.

All who are dwelling on paths that are difficult to travel.
Those who really have fetters that are very great.
Those attached to spiritual food that is mixed with poison.
Those who become completely lost upon the path.
Those of little energy who have gone far astray,
It is being kind to people such as these.

- 1.) Those who blaze with the kleshas as if they were in a fire
- 2.) Those for whom obstacles of Mara have arisen, even though they have entered the path
- 3.) Those of the three lower realms
- 4.) Those with stupidity and delusion about karma, cause, and effect
- 5.) Those who have entered wrong paths
- 6.) Those who are really bound by the knots of the kleshas
- 7.) Those who relish the taste of the bliss of samadhi
- 8.) Those who dwell on the paths of shravakas
- 9.) Those who dwell on the paths of pratyekabuddhas
- 10.) Neophyte bodhisattvas.

These four immeasurables arise with four conditions.

- 1.) The naturally existing family or dhatu is the causal condition.
- 2.) The spiritual friend who teaches the instructions of the four immeasurables is the dominant condition.
- 3.) The manifestation of one's particular object is the object-condition.
- 4.) Previous acquaintance with the benefits of meditating on the four immeasurables and the harm of not doing so is the immediately preceding condition.

The former text says:

From the causes of that happiness and suffering
Comes the kindness of the bodhisattva.
Along with those causes, from the spiritual friend
And from one's natural attitude rises compassion.

The Abhidharmakosha says:

By four conditions there are mind and mental events.
By three conditions there are the two samapattis.
Others things arise from only two conditions.

Mind and mental events are produced by four conditions, the cause, predominating, immediately preceding and object conditions. Samapatti is produced by three, the cause, predominating, and immediately preceding conditions. Material things arise from two, a cause, such as the seed, and a predominant conditions, such as water and manure.

G. How to meditate

There are four sections

1. Equanimity meditation

There are thirteen sections.

a. The purpose of equanimity meditation

Now, as to how to meditate, one is purely and definitely concerned with these alone:

These do not have to be practiced in any one fixed order,
But, even so, beginners should start with equanimity.

Having developed this toward those both far and near,
Then they should meditate upon the other three.

First we should compose ourselves, putting ourselves at ease. This is because if we do not bring everything near and far into equanimity, it is difficult for the other three to arise. Therefore, first we meditate on equanimity. The master Jnanagarbha says in his Ornament of the Middle Way

Crossing with equanimity to the land of goodness,
Like a meadow covered with blossoming flowers of kindness,
Well-adorned with the cooling protective shade of compassion.
The water of joy will be pure, and not disturbed and muddied.

The Two Examinations says:

First we should meditate on kindness,
Second we should turn to compassion
Third we should meditate on joy,
And last of all equanimity.

This is from the viewpoint a teacher joined with inner divine suchness. For them it is easy first to produce the arising of the other three, kindness and so forth.

b. The meditation object of equanimity

Now, to explain equanimity meditation:

Since the meditational object is all sentient beings,
We should examine our minds to how we are doing.
If we love our mothers and fathers and our friends,
But hate our enemies, our attitude is bad.

If there is any sentient being that we make our friend or enemy, this loving and hating is not proper.

c. Remembering the kindness of the object of equanimity

In samsara:

While we have been wandering without beginning or end,
Even such enemies have been our fathers and mothers.
They were formerly friendly and gave their help to us.
Shall we now cultivate malice to return their kindness?

It is not right to repay with harm those who formerly benefited us. The Dulwa Lung says:

Returning good for good is excellent.
Returning harm or indifference is wrong.

d. Equanimity meditation on uncertainty

For many generations:

Even these friends were enemies and did us harm.
Even now that suffering is still infecting us.
How can it be right to repay this with benefit?
And those who are neither now were once both friends and enemies.
Where benefit and harm are without certainty
Loving and hating are irrationality.

If it is not suitable to benefit an enemy who has done us harm, our friends in former generations did us harm, and even now, as a result, suffering still defiles us. Just this produces our loving and hating. Why repay that with benefit? As for beings who are indifferent to us now, if we think about it, whether they did us benefit or harm before or which they will do later is not certain. Therefore we should produce equanimity for those who are far and near. The Prajnaparamita in Twenty Thousand Verses says:

Subhuti, all sentient beings are mutually equal, and you should produce an attitude of equanimity.

e. The meditation on equanimity

For this reason:

Therefore, start by regarding friends and relatives
With neither love nor hate, as we would those who are neutral.
Then we should give up hatred, being neutral to our enemies.
When we do this, near and far are non-existent.

Thus we should equalize friends and enemies as indifferent.

f. Equanimity meditation to benefit sentient beings:

To be rid of the mental darkness that comes from fixating neutrality,
Eliminate habits of thinking of beings in terms of the kleshas.
Meditate on phenomena in freedom from samsara.

Subsequently may kleshas be completely pacified with regard to all sentient beings, starting with our enemies and friends. May love and hate never arise. May our minds become mutually workable.

g. Equanimity about getting and losing, by meditating on them as one:

All who want happiness want to eliminate suffering.
But their ignorance courses in the cause of suffering.

Those who truly want joy for themselves do not desire what is painful. Since all beings are like that, how can malevolence toward them be appropriate? Desire, even desire for happiness, is a cause of suffering. We should eliminate this unwholesome approach.

h. The real object of equanimity

Kye ma! If only the draining host of kleshas of sentient beings,
With all their habitual patterns, were equalized in peace.
May it come about that all embodied beings,
Tormented by their violent loves and raging hatreds,
Are free from either clinging or animosity,
For all either near or far feeling equanimity.

May all the kleshas of sentient beings be pacified. In particular, after the fires of love and hate are pacified, without near and far, may our minds become workable.

i. Expanding the object of equanimity:

Having contemplated on one being in this way,
Then going further, do the same with two or three.
Go on to a country, and then to a continent.
Then having contemplated all the four continents,
Try one or two thousand worlds—we should consider them all.
The training is complete when self is the same as others,

And enemies and friends are seen with equality.

Beginners should meditate on friends and enemies as neutral without regret. Then from one, two, three, beings and so forth, we should go on to our whole town and then our country, its continent, and finally all of this world Jambuling. Then from the continent of videha and so forth go on and meditate on a thousand, two, three, and all the world systems. Also first meditate on human beings, and then on animals and so forth as being equal.

j. The measure of having trained in equanimity within one's being Within one's being:

The training is complete when either self or others,
Or enemies and friends, are seen with equality.

For anyone who has attained this attitude, jealousy and enmity will not arise, since they will be hindered by the arising of equality.

k. Post-meditation in equanimity meditation

Then after a session of meditating with that object:

Then go on to the equanimity without object.
Everything is mind, whose nature is like the sky.
Rest in this emptiness, the unborn absolute,
Free from complexities of mental phenomena.

The objects to be meditated upon, these appearances of sentient beings, are like a reflection, appearing while they do not exist, unborn by nature. Rest in mindfulness of this. Though we are attached to the skandhas as being grasped objects and a fixating ego other than these, both are false. This is like thinking that a reflection in a mirror is a face. What does not exist appears, depending on the skandhas. The Precious Mala says:

Though depending on a shining mirror
Reflections of oneself and others appear,
All such vivid images as these
In actuality do not exist.

Likewise, in dependence on the skandhas,
Ego is perceived and firmly grasped.
Like the reflected image of one's face,
Really it does not exist at all.

As without depending on a mirror,
No reflected natures will appear,
If there is no dependence on the skandhas,
Ego-grasping too will disappear.

By their nature, if the skandhas are grasped as an ego, karma exists. Since from karma birth exists, by intervals old age and death will also exist. When we do not grasp the skandhas, all this is reversed. The same text says:

As long as the skandhas are being grasped at all
So long will they be grasped as truly being an ego.
If there is ego-grasping, there is also karma.
As a result of that, there also will be birth.

The three kinds of action have no beginning, end, or middle²³⁸
The mandala of samsara, like a whirling fire-brand,
Has recursive causes, so it will keep on whirling.

But if the cause of that were not to be established,

Conceptions of self and other and distinctions of the three times,
The context of ego grasping would be entirely exhausted.
Therefore karma and birth will be extinguished too,
And likewise cause and fruition, will simply cease to be.

Having seen the exhaustion of these, in the world of truth
There is no thought of existence, no thought of non-existence.

Therefore all dharmas, without an I or any object to grasp, should be known to be non-existent, like a reflection.

The benefits of equanimity meditation

The measure of being well-trained by meditating in this way, is that realization of profound peace arises and realization of the nature of all dharmas as primordially unborn equality. The All-Creating King says:

Within the unthinking enlightenment of dharmata,
By resting in non-duality, wisdom will arise.

1. The fruition of equanimity

Of this meditation:

The fruition is that for mind, undisturbed by near and far,
There is the spontaneous presence of the natural state.
This is the actual nature of reality.

When the relativity of self and other, near and far, is non-existent; the absolute, non-dual dharmata, will be realized. When we are used to this, we should perform the meditation of primordial kindness.

2. Meditation on kindness

There are five sections.

a. Increasing kindness

As explained above:

After the mind has developed this equanimity,
Think of the happiness that you want for your mother.
Then contemplate all embodied beings in just that way.

When the mind has been equalized, just as one feels kindness towards one's father and mother, one should meditate on all sentient beings, placing the mind in the attitude one has toward one's father and mother. The Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand lines says:

One should meditate with an attitude of kindness, not letting it be ravished away by the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas.

b. The object of kindness

How to do this?:

The object of conceptual kindness is all beings.
It wants to accomplish for these various sentient beings,
The incidental happiness of gods and human beings,

As well as the ultimate happiness of enlightenment.
Move from meditating on a single being
Up to all beings within the limits of the directions.

When unhappy sentient beings are seen, may they meet incidentally with the happiness of gods and human beings, and ultimately with the happiness of buddhahood. Thinking that, one should go from one to meditating on all sentient beings as limitless as the space of the sky. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

When we see sentient beings who have no happiness, we should imagine to ourselves as follows, "May these sentient beings attain the god realm, where the happiness of the gods is perfect."

c. The sign of training in kindness

As for training:

The sign of success is supreme and all-pervading kindness.
Greater than a mother's love for her only child.

Whatever sentient beings are seen one is pleased and with a great kind longing, one wants to benefit them.

d. Kindness without object

After meditating on kindness with an object:

Then rest everything in equanimity.
This is the great kindness without a reference point.
The sign is the unity of kindness and emptiness.

The object of meditation on kindness is sentient beings, arising from the gathering together of the six elements. These elements are

- 1.) earth
- 2.) water
- 3.) fire
- 4.) air
- 5.) space
- 6.) consciousness.

If these are examined their coarse atoms, subtle real nature, and pure consciousness do not exist as real things. Meditate, thinking that they are like space. The Ratnavali says:

People are not earth and are not water.
Neither are they fire, air, nor space,
Nor are they consciousness, nor all of these.
A person is something different from this.
Since persons are gathered from the six elements,
They are not real, and here is the reason why.
A gathered nature cannot be something real.
The skandhas are not the ego, nor ego the skandhas.
Yet neither would be there without the other.

Also:

At the time when things cannot be found
At that time there is pure thinglessness
Things of form are simply non-existent,

Even space is nothing but a name.

Without arising, form is superfluous,
Therefore, even its name does not exist.
Feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness
Seem to arise and be thought of as an ego.
But without the six elements, there can be no ego.

Why does it not exist? When sentient beings appear, if we examine their bodily nature, it does not exist. Neither the support or supported of consciousness is seen, so the "me" and the "mine" are not perceived. When analyzed they vanish, essentially empty. The same text says:

Just as if the layers of a plantain tree²³⁹
Are all destroyed, then nothing is there at all
People too, if all the parts of their nature
Should be destroyed, would likewise disappear.
All dharmas are without a self, and therefore,
That is what the victorious ones have taught.

This mere appearance of seeing and hearing is neither true nor false, since truth and falsity are correspondence to a pattern of dharmas in the mind. The same text says:

Just by being able to see and hear and so forth,
It is taught there neither true nor false.

Also it says there:

This world transcends both truth and falsity.

Thus all dharmas are beyond truth and falsity, like a plantain or banana tree. This is also taught in the Samadhiraja Sutra:

Just as with the moist leafy trunks of plantain trees
Wanting to find the essence, people tear them up,
But nowhere inside or out is an essence to be found.
All the various dharmas should be known to be like that.

The sign of good training is that while kindness arises, at the same time there arises the realization that beings, like a plantain tree essentially have no self or nature.

e. The fruition of meditating on kindness

What is the fruition?:

The visible result is experience of pure pleasure.

Seeing sentient beings is pleasurable, and the beings, when they are seen, are cleansed of disturbances of love and hate and so forth.

The Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

Those who have an attitude of kindness meditate a great deal, and when they see the sentient beings inhabiting the world, it is pleasurable. They have no anger.

Also immeasurable merit is attained. The Sutra of the Great Liberation Blossoming in the Ten Directions says:

Though someone in the world keeps discipline pure for a kalpa,

An instant of joy produced by kindness is better than that.

If one in this world does evil in body speech and mind,
Though they fall to the lower realms, by that kindness it has an end.

3. Compassion

There are seven sections.

a. Thinking about the sufferings of sentient beings

Now compassion is taught:

After encompassing all beings within this kindness.
Think of their sufferings, arousing such a compassion
As when your mind cannot endure your parents' suffering.

If our kind parents for our sake did evil deeds and were tormented by the sufferings of the three lower realms and so forth, we would think, "I should be compassionate to them." The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

If we see sentient beings who are suffering, we will think, "May these sentient beings be freed from suffering."

b. How to meditate on Compassion

As for how to meditate:

Think how our parents, who were so kind to us,
Suffered by doing evil actions for our sake,
With hunger, thirst and heat and cold and even murder.
They are sinking down into the raging sea,
Of birth and old age, of sickness and of death,
Exhausted by the great variety of sufferings.

Because they did evil deeds for our sake, now they are tormented by their particular sufferings.

c. The main topic of compassion

From this present suffering:

Though they want liberation, they have no peace of mind.
There is no spiritual friend to show the proper path.
How pitiable is their limitless wandering in samsara.
Having seen it, can I forsake and abandon them?

The beings of samsara are suffering and know no way of being liberated. Except for a very few spiritual friends, there is no one to teach them all the path of liberation. None of these beings who now suffer without limit in samsara, formerly was not my father, mother, relative, and friend. As for just abandoning them without a refuge or protector, they are my family, father, and mother! That is how we should think.

[[[The Letter to Students says:

For whomever has got in this situation and remains
Whoever with careful kindness receives this cautiously,
Will have no instance of suffering from these kleshas, and discarding them,
If to beings one is bad-tempered and, who is better off?

d. The reason of compassion

the reason:

Then we should think from the very depths of our heart and bones,
"May all beings be freed in a moment from their sufferings,
By means of our bodies and enjoyment of our wealth,
And any happiness that is ours throughout the three times."

Thus may all our enjoyment and happiness be transferred to other beings and having been freed from suffering, may they forever enjoy immeasurable happiness. One should think that from the depths of one's heart. The Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

With that vast mind possessing the great compassion, all shravakas and pratyekabuddhas should meditate in this extraordinary way.

e. The sign of training in compassion

When training in this meditation, as we go from one sentient being to all, the sign is that the suffering of beings, arising within us, becomes unbearable.

e. The post-meditation of compassion meditation

After all sessions of meditating like this on compassion with objects:

Then meditate on compassion without a reference point.
The sign is the unity of compassion and emptiness.

If the objects of compassion, sentient beings, are examined and analyzed, they are natureless like the appearance of water in a mirage. No water is really there. That is how we should think. The Samadhiraja-sutra says:

As when the summer sun is at its peak,
Persons tormented by thirst and other beings
With their skandhas see water in a mirage.
All dharmas should be known to be like that.

The Ratnavali says:

As water in a mirage
Is neither water nor real,
Egos in the skandhas
Are neither there nor real.

That water is a mirage.
If so, then why go there?
If that water is non-existent,
Grasping it is stupid.

Existing like an illusion,
This world is non-existent."
The grasper of it is stupid,
And if so, will not be free.

Also it says there:

As these two reasons are true,
Nothing comes, goes, or stays.
So our suffering too is gone.

Also it says there:

The buddhas' teaching is deathless and never changes.
It is beyond existence and non-existence.
Therefore, it is explained to be like that.

After we understand the nature of all dharma through meditation, emptiness and compassion are unified. This is how practice is done on the true path. If either of these two is absent, one strays from the path. The Dohakosha says:

If without compassion we dwell in emptiness
Gaining nothing we will not gain the highest path.
But if we solely meditate upon compassion,
We will never be free from dwelling in samsara.

Those who have the power of joining both of these Will not dwell in samsara and nor yet within nirvana.

f. The fruition of meditating on compassion

Of meditating in this way:

The fruition is a mind without injurious malice,
Workable by its establishment in primordial purity.

One attains a workable mind without malice and harm. Therefore the Buddha's enlightenment will be established.

The Supreme Essence says:

By the great compassion the mind becomes workable, and deathless, and attains the supreme ornament of delight.

3. The meditation of joy,

There are six sections

a. The purpose of meditating on joy

Now joy will be explained. As just explained:

After beings are steeped in compassion, and each is happy,
Then we should go further and meditate on joy.

If we see happy sentient beings, we should meditate on joy. The Prajnaparamita in 20,000 Lines says:

Whenever we see sentient beings joined to their particular happiness, we should think, "May they be inseparable from this happiness. May they possess the happiness of omniscience, beyond that of gods and human beings.

b. The object of meditation on joy

How?

The proper object of joy is happy sentient beings.
The content is thinking, "E ma! there is no need
For me to try to establish these beings in happiness.

Each of them has gained their proper happiness.
Until they attain the essence of enlightenment,
May they never be parted from this happiness."
First think of one, then meditate on all of them.

Go like that from meditating on one happy sentient being to all of them.

c. The measure of joy

As for the measure of training:

The sign is the arising of joy that is free from envy.

Ultimate joy has no envy for the wealth of others.

d. The essence of joy

After a session of meditating on conceptual joy:

Then meditate on joy without a reference point.

Meditate on the objects of joy, all sentient beings, as appearing while they do not exist, like an illusion. The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

Just as in the midst of many sentient beings
Magicians may emanate illusory forms of things,
But the horses and chariots, and elephants that they conjure
Do not exist at all in the way that they appear,
Every dharma should be known to be like that.

The Ratnavali says:

A secret from people in general,
Is this very deep Dharma teaching
The amrita of Buddha's teaching
That the world is like illusion.

Just as illusory elephants
Appear to arise and vanish,
While in truth and reality
Nothing arises and vanishes,

Likewise this world of illusion,
Appearing to rise and vanish,
In the real and absolute truth,
Neither rises nor is destroyed.

As an illusory elephant
Coming from nothing goes nowhere;
By exhausting mind's obscuration,
It really, truly is gone.

This world, just like that elephant,
Coming from nothing goes nowhere;
By exhausting the mind's obscuration,
It really, truly is gone.

The nature beyond the three times;

And existence and non-existence,
Not realizing them all as mere labels;
How will someone possess the nature?

e. The virtues of joy:

In meditating in this way, by the joy of the natural state:

Body, speech and mind have spontaneous peace and bliss.

This is the measure.

f. The fruition of meditating on joy:

By the wealth of the fruition joy is stabilized.

The Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says:

Immeasurably vast, joyful mind is never taken from us. With this unsurpassable perfection we attain the heights.

H. Further explanation of the way of meditating,

There are seven sections

1. the details of meditation after this is familiar,

Now the way of meditating will be further explained. As explained above:

After this is familiar, then, beginning with kindness,
Meditate on all four, one right after the next,
Gradually breaking attachment to any of the four.

Sometimes meditate on these four in order, as an antidote to liberate them into purity.

2. How to stop obstacles to kindness with compassion:

If kindness attaches you intimately to all beings,
Compassion breaks attachment to the cause and effect of suffering.

If sometimes one becomes permanently attached to other sentient beings as one's father and mother, a second meditation on compassion will serve as an antidote.

3. How to stop obstacles to compassion with joy:

When a lesser compassion attaches to reference points,
Sadness is stopped by the joy that has no reference point.

When there is attachment to compassion as an individually characterized phenomenon, illusion-like, objectless joy will clear away all sadness and attachment.

4. How to stop obstacles to joy with equanimity:

When joy disturbs the mind by arousing anxiety²⁴⁰
Then we should meditate on the great equanimity,
Free from all desire for anything near or far.

If we are sad because of longing for joy in the happiness of others, it will be cleared away by meditating on objectless equanimity.

5. Stopping the obstacles to equanimity with kindness:

When equanimity is neutral and indecisive,
Meditate on kindness and so forth, as before.
Training in that way grows stable and effortless.

If everything seems to become indifferent, arouse kindness and meditate on that.

These are the general antidotes. In particular, as an antidote for each object, meditate as taught in the corresponding objectless way. By meditating in that way, one will attain immeasurable peace within one's being and quickly attain stability.

6. The way of meditating when we have become increasingly familiar:

Yogins for whom this practice is fully stabilized
May meditate in a different order, or jump about.

After the four immeasurables are stabilized, so that their benefits may arise, after kindness, we may meditate on the others in order, or after equanimity go back and meditate without any particular order. That is, after meditating serially on kindness, compassion, joy, and equanimity, after equanimity, meditating on compassion and kindness is the lesser. After kindness, meditating on joy is the middle. After equanimity meditating on kindness is the greatest. Jumping directly up and down after resting between objects is the meditation. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, then meditate on kindness. Meditate on joy. Rest in compassion, Practice equanimity.

7. The virtues of meditating in this way

What is the purpose?

By that the meditation will gain the advantage of freshness.
Its steadiness will grow to the very greatest degree.

In particular the mind of the four immeasurables will gain freshness, unsteadiness will be steadied, and steadiness will become supremely great steadiness.

I. The fruition

There are ten parts.

1. How the higher realms and truth and goodness are established

Now, as for the teaching of the fruition of the four immeasurables, the following words explain how it is:

There are four fruitions of doing this meditation.
By ripening we gain the exalted and truly good.
In the desire realm we have a divine or human body,
In a situation producing happiness and benefit.

Those who do not attain an exalted state attain the body of a god or a human being. They perfect the two accumulations, benefit beings, and become inseparable from the four immeasurables. Even if they are careless or fall asleep, they will not fall prey to serious harm. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Having the mind of these four Bhrama-viharas
We will always take birth in realm of desire.
Because these perfect the two accumulations,

They produce ripening for sentient beings.
Never separated from purity
And free from what does not accord with it,
The condition of future carelessness and mishap,
Impatience, too, will never be found there.

As the ultimate fruition, enlightenment is established. The same text says:

What is harmful is banished, and happiness is produced.
With the seed of enlightenment, and the cause of longing desire,
The essence ripens; and sons of the Victorious One
Relying on Dharma, are not far from the light.

Abandoning what is harmful is a fruition of separation.

Producing the seed of liberation is a fruition of the predominant condition of empowerment by the master. Because one produces happiness for others, being patient about our own trials and hardships is a produced fruition. By meditating on these four within this life, they ripen in other lives as a fruition according with the cause. The nature of these four immeasurables always arises in sons of the Victorious One. It is born from previous familiarity, from seeing its objects, and by seeing the faults of what does not conform to them. The same text says:

This kindness, having the nature of compassion
Attains the nature and discrimination
By formerly having become familiar with that
And seeing it spoiled by what does not accord.

2. The benefits of according with the cause

From the two sections of the fruition according with the cause:

a. General

From according to the cause, such action is self-performing.
The happiness attained is free from contrary experience.

By action according with the cause, we always spend our time meditating on the four immeasurables. By experience according with the cause malice, harmfulness, unhappiness, passion, loving and hating will be absent. As for the benefits of the power of this

b. The decisive condition or power:

The power is birth in a pleasant, happy, and joyful country,
Where there are compatible people and amenities of wealth.

By kindness one is born in a pleasant country, by compassion in a happy one, and by joy in a joyful one with many flowers, medicinal herbs, and so forth. By equanimity one is born among many compatible people and is without harm.

3. The benefits of performing this

The person:

By performing this these four will grow immensely greater.
The wealth of the two benefits becomes spontaneous.

By performing this, the four immeasurables will increase immensely, growing greater and greater. By that the wealth of the two benefits for oneself and others will become spontaneously present. By the increase in merit of the karma of meditating on the four immeasurables, happiness and goodness will be established.

4. The benefit of kindness:

When perfect enjoyment of kindness is without aggression,
Then the mirror-like wisdom will have been fully attained,
As sambhogakaya adorned with the major and minor marks.

After kindness has transformed aggression into the mirror-like wisdom, one attains sambhogakaya. The Lotus Peak says:

By kindness aggression will be purified
As mirror-like wisdom and sambhogakaya.

5. The benefit of compassion:

When compassion is desireless, there is dharmakaya,
Producing the manifestation of discriminating wisdom.
Its dharmas like the ten powers are utterly distinct.

Compassion pure of desire is discriminating awareness wisdom and dharmakaya. The same text says:

By compassion desire is fully purified
As discriminating wisdom and ultimate dharmakaya.

6. The benefits of joy:

When joy eliminates jealousy, there is nirmanakaya.
The holy all-accomplishing wisdom is attained.
Nirmanakaya is nothing fixed, but of various forms.
This self-existing kaya is spontaneous buddha activity.

By immeasurable joy one attains the all-accomplishing wisdom, whose nature is perfect buddha activity. Purifying jealousy makes nirmanakaya manifest. The same text says:

By joy all jealousy is fully purified,
As all-accomplishing wisdom and nirmanakaya.
Action becomes spontaneous and excellent.

7. The benefits of equanimity:

When equanimity has eliminated pride
As well as stupidity, there is the essence of things
Through equality dharmadhatu wisdom will manifest.
The simplicity of dharmata is svabhavikakaya.

When equanimity has purified pride and ignorance, the wisdom of equality and the dharmadhatu wisdom are established. Svabhavikakaya, the unchanging vajrakaya and the kaya of the manifestation of enlightenment manifest. The same text says:

By equanimity and great equanimity
Pride and envy and ignorance will be purified.
One masters the dharmadhatu and equality wisdoms.
These are the vajra kayas and those of enlightenment.

As for the nature of passionlessness, arising from the four actions of these four immeasurables, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Those who have kindness completed by compassion
If they do not desire to dwell in peace

Why even to speak of worldly happiness
Or the wish to further their lives and their careers?

As for their not desiring their own happiness, the same text says:

Compassion produces happiness for those who suffer.
After the kind produce these others' happiness,
Their own happiness is not produced like that.

As for overpowering their happiness for others, the same text says:

The suffering produced by kindness
Overwhelms all their worldly happiness.
If the benefiter is without this,
What greater wonders can be?

The Letter to Students says:

For beings with unbearable sufferings, without a refuge
Those who are happy to suffer for others' benefit,
Are said to be wondrous beings who are truly excellent.
Diligent ones who delight in striving to benefit others
How shall they ever have enjoyments in happy countries?
They will not attain to youth and happiness.
They will not have the implements of power and wealth
With no spouse or companions, not born among gods or asuras.

As for the action of samsara not arising, the former text says:

The attitude of compassion is without the nature of egocentric suffering, the best sign of samsara.
Completely knowing it one is not a sentient being.
Nor will one be badly harmed by samsaric faults.

Holy beings who have this immeasurably will be without faults. The same text says:

Those who have desire have corresponding faults.
They will not be without them, nor beyond the world.
Those who have this attitude, by their loving-kindness
Will be without any faults and go beyond the world.

Those who are kind to their literal fathers, mothers, and children have desire. Bodhisattvas do not have such desires in regard to sentient beings. This is because they are liberated from samsara. The same text says:

If worldly enlightened ones and the arhats
Among the pratyekabuddhas are without this kindness,
What need is there even to speak of any others?
But world-transcending ones are not like that

If one does not meditate on the four immeasurables, there will be many faults. The same text says:

A bodhisattva who possesses ill-will
And malice due to pain and unhappiness
And resulting from attachments of desire
Is sure to come in contact with many faults.

As for its being said that those who are born in the desire realms have the attachments of desire, those who are born in the first two realms of desire and form are said to have samsaric desire. The Abhidharmakosha says:

Those born in those two realms have attachments of samsaric desire.

As for the fault of increasing kleshas, in regard to this immeasurable the former text says:

Kleshas conquer the self. They conquer sentient beings. They conquer discipline. By receiving their corruption one is lowered, and stays that way. By manifesting in that way one is degraded. Do not listen to the arguments of others who will be beings without leisure. Harmed by attaining and non-attaining, the mind will attain great suffering.

Attainment damages the happiness of this life and non-attainment damages later happiness. As for the benefits of meditating on the four immeasurables, one does not have such faults, one grasps the possibilities of benefiting beings, and since one is not whirled in samsara by the kleshas, suffering does not arise. The same text says:

For one who rests in kindness and the rest
The faults that have been described will not arise.
Having no kleshas, one will benefit beings,
And will not pass into samsaric birth.

As for the praise of the virtues:

Unequaled with limitless qualities, kindness and the rest
Are given the highest praise by the teacher of gods and men.

The Glorious Garland Sutra says:

Whoever meditates on the four immeasurables
Will be considered with kindness by all the tathagatas.
All the immeasurable good qualities of this
Are even more limitless than endless space itself

As for the teaching that the four immeasurables is the way of the victorious ones

As for the four immeasurables:

Any path that is without them is in error.
It is an evil path to take refuge in other teachings.
The path that has them leads to spotless liberation.
This is the way that was traveled by buddhas of the past.
It also will be traveled by those who are to come.

The Commentary of the Teacher of the Bhūmis says:

The four immeasurables are the path of liberation. Others are wrong paths.

As for the teaching of how to attain the two ultimate realities.²⁴¹

The causal vehicles hold that as a seed produces a sprout,
Upaya and prajna are the producers of the two kayas.
The fruition vehicles proclaim these as being mere conditions,
Removing the two obscurations that veil these same two kayas.
But since upaya depends on the limitless path of compassion,
The meaning is the same: Emptiness is compassionate.
In that, both cause and fruition practice are in accord.

The vehicles of characteristics mostly proclaim that the two accumulations are the producing cause of the two kayas. The Sixty Stanzas on Reasoning says:

By this merit all beings
Accumulate merit and wisdom.
Arising from merit and wisdom,
May we attain the two absolutes.

In the secret mantra, it is maintained that clearing away the two obscurations of the kayas occurs through practicing the two accumulations as upaya and prajna, and therefore this is proclaimed to be a condition. Both are in accord, since practice having the essence of emptiness and compassion is what is established.

As for summarizing the meaning of this meditation:

The sutras say that the unborn seeds of happiness
Have existed primordially and never were created.
The mantrayana is in accord with this, because it claims
To clear away the incidental obscurations
That are the primordial obscurations of trikaya.

To summarize briefly, learned and accomplished ones
Explain that sutra and tantra are a unity,
As outer and inner aspects of a single path.

Therefore, following after the holy buddha sons,
We should strive to practice the four immeasurables.

The final teaching says that the dhatu is naturally pure and possesses the buddha qualities primordially. At the time of having practiced the path, the buddha qualities appear to arise, and are proclaimed to appear. In the mantrayana all beings naturally exist as the mandala, as explained below. Since these two are without distinction, it amounts to the same thing. In the path, the two accumulations of upaya and prajna are also the same. In the fruitions, the kayas and wisdoms are the same. Therefore former great masters like Padmasambhava have explained their relationship as inner and outer. Therefore, we should strive to meditate on the four immeasurables.

The tenth part of the general meaning, the dedication of merit.

Now the merit is dedicated for the benefit of sentient beings:

Thus by the nature of this peace that was so well-taught,
When the roiling silt in the mind of all beings is pacified,
Fatigued by having strayed into wrong and descending paths,
May our minds today find ease for their weariness.

By the power of this auspicious way of presenting the Dharma, like the host of undefiled rays of the autumn moon, may whatever beings are dwelling on the paths of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, and others dwelling on the paths of the heretics, and those who are wearied by dwelling on paths that are less than perfect, and all those worn out by dwelling on the great path of samsara, whose minds are disturbed by the roiling kleshas be completely pacified. In the wondrously arisen grove of liberation, carpeted with an array of various flowers, in the pond of buddha qualities may they ease themselves.

As when the full moon of autumn ornaments the sky
Having a perfectly rounded, brilliantly shining disk,
And hundreds of night-blooming lotuses open in its light
May these fully blossom in the faith of sentient beings.

Lapping the motionless Meru of a mind of sanity
Is the play of the ocean of happiness and benefit.
The four immeasurables are the ornaments of mind
As the four continents adorn that central mountain.

May happiness beautify the world to its farthest horizon.
May beings without remainder perfect their livelihood.

From the peaceful wreath of clouds of the play of the three levels,
May the heavens wondrously open with the rain of happiness
With flashing illumination and the thunder of victory
May these four immeasurable benefits reach to the end of time.

The Commentary on Chapter Eight: Producing the Mind of Complete Enlightenment

After the mind has been well trained by the four immeasurable aspirations, we enter the essence of the ocean of the activity of the buddha sons, our chief topic,

VIII Bodhicitta, the mind focused on supreme enlightenment.

There are three general topics.

- A. The teaching of meditating on the root of all dharmas, the two bodhicittas
- B. The extensive explanation of how actually to arouse bodhicitta
- C. The dedication of merit.

A. The teaching of meditating on the root of all dharmas, the two bodhicittas

Now arousing the mind of supreme enlightenment will be discussed. As just explained:

When we are well-accustomed to the four immeasurables,
We should meditate on the root of all Dharmas, the two bodhicittas.

This is the root of all dharmas of the world and beyond the world. It is the essence of all paths. It is the guide of all sentient beings. The steed by which one will quickly cross to the unsurpassable mansion of excellence is the best of thoughts, bodhicitta. Here we shall learn how to arouse it. The Sutra Requested by Maitreya says:

Maitreya, if a bodhisattva has a single dharma the lower realms will be abandoned. One will not come into the hands of evil associates. It will be the cause of quickly becoming fully, truly, completely enlightened. What is this single dharma? It is the most excellent and perfect of wishes, bodhicitta.

Maitreya, if one has this dharma, the lower realms are abandoned. One will not come into the hands of evil associates. It will be the cause of quickly becoming fully, truly, completely enlightened.

The Bodhisattva-Pitaka-Sutra says:

Since one will quickly become enlightened with unsurpassable, true, complete enlightenment, one should train in the best of wishes, bodhicitta.

B. the extensive explanation of arousing bodhicitta,

There are ten sections.²⁴²

1. The explanation of the benefits

There are six sections.²⁴³

a. The benefit of leading from samsara to peace

What are these benefits?

These put an end to the kleshas and the ocean of samsara.
They clear away the fear and suffering of evil deeds.

They conquer the karma and suffering involved with the samskaras, Leading beings away from samsara and to nirvana.

Regarding liberation from the ocean of samsara, The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

Kye, son of noble family, bodhicitta is like a great ship that liberates us from the stream of samsara. It is like a heroic guardian who liberates us from fear of samsara and the lower realms.

The Liberation of Maitreya says:

O son of noble family, it is like this. Relying on a heroic guardian, one has no fear of any enemies. Similarly, bodhisattvas who put their reliance in arousing the wish for omniscience have no fear of any evil enemy.

The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Like depending on a hero when there is great danger
Even after doing inexpressible evil deeds,
The instant one depends on this, one is liberated,
Why would those who are heedful not rely on it?

All suffering and evil deeds are cleared away. The same text says:

Wishing to destroy the hundreds of sufferings of samsara,
Desiring to clear away the sorrow of sentient beings,
And wishing they will enjoy many hundreds of happinesses
One should never let go of the means, which is bodhicitta.

The Sutra of the Instructions of the Glorious Great Vehicle says:

The person who enters into unsurpassable enlightenment without the existence of even an atom cuts off the evil path of going to the lower realms and the eight unfree states. That person is separated from the paths of gods and human beings and completely abandons them. Such a person is not blind or deaf. All the senses are sound.

Burning the firewood of karma and the kleshas, bodhicitta is like a fire. The former text says:

This, like the fire at the end of time, in an instant will certainly burn great evil deeds.

The Liberation of Maitreya says:

By burning away all faults, it is like the fire at the end of the kalpa.

Moreover, by attaining buddhahood, one is led out of samsara. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

If this occurs the immeasurable host of sentient beings
Will attain the ease of the highest state of blissfulness.

b. The benefit of being a shrine for the world

For those who have aroused bodhicitta:

Even while bodhicitta is not yet manifest,
The wholesome stream of compassion is rising ever higher.
In meditation, upaya and prajna will unite.
All undertakings of body and speech are beneficial.
We become like shrines for all the world and the gods.

Those who have faultlessly aroused bodhicitta, when the mind is in non-conceptual meditation, will be united with its prajna and with absorption that never goes to sleep, loses consciousness, or gives rise to the perceptions of memory. Perception and feeling cease, and there is the absorption of cessation. Always conceptionless, the mind does not manifest the five situations below. The Thirty Verses says:

As for the arising of mental consciousness,
Mindless sleep and unconsciousness
And the two samadhis
One is always without perception of these.

When this occurs, the bodhicitta formerly aroused remains undamaged and there is continual merit. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

When this has been grasped, the dhatus of sentient beings
Therefore will be limitlessly liberated,
Since there arises from them the mind of non-returning,
That which is true mind is actually received.

When this has been grasped, even while they are asleep
Or when they are non-attentive, still the force of merit
Which is multifarious and continuous,
As limitless as space, continues performing its function.

All undertakings will be successful. The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

O son of noble family, whoever has aroused the mind of supreme enlightenment, will be successful in all undertakings. They will always be of one taste with wholesomeness alone.

By arousing this undamaged bodhicitta all virtuous conduct and whatever neutral is done will not be mere incidental accomplishment; it will become virtue according with enlightenment. One will become a shrine for the world. The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

Those who arouse bodhicitta will be a shrine for all the world together with its gods.

c. The benefit that virtue increases ever higher

As for this virtue corresponding with merit:

Other kinds of happiness diminish and are exhausted.
The happiness that is established by precious bodhicitta
Rather than being exhausted, will actually increase.
It is like clear water flowing into the ocean,
Or a rich and glorious harvest, growing in fertile soil.

A drop of water flowing into an ocean will not be exhausted but will go on for a kalpa. A sesame seed planted in good soil will greatly increase. So does the virtue of arousing bodhicitta. The Sutra Requested by Maitreya says:

Manjushri, similarly if we arouse bodhicitta until attaining the unsurpassable enlightenment of buddhahood, the virtue of that will not be exhausted.

Manjushri, for example it is like this, all seeds which are a suitable source in every suitable way will grow. As those seeds will grow, the virtue of having aroused bodhicitta will vastly grow.

Meritorious virtue is not like a banana tree, which fruits once, and then is exhausted. The immeasurable fruition of temporal and ultimate virtue increases inexhaustibly like that of a great tree. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

All other kinds of virtue are like a banana tree
It brings forth fruit but once, then it is exhausted.
However the eternal tree of bodhicitta

Gives fruit that always increases inexhaustibly.

The Basket of Books Sutra says:

Manjushri, it is like this, a variety of trees, having taken in the four elements, will greatly increase. Manjushri, if the virtuous roots are dedicated to omniscience, having taken in bodhicitta they will greatly increase.

d. The Benefit of being the Root of all Dharmas.

Moreover, of all dharmas without remainder:

The root, the seed, of all is the nature of compassion.
Even in samsara it yields wholesome fruits.
Its nature is nirvana. It grows to enlightenment.
Strive to arouse this precious bodhicitta fully.

The Sutra Requested by Bhrama says:

Bhrama, what is this excellent thought bodhicitta? As the root of all dharmas, it is like a seed. Why so? From the seed the sprout, leaves, flower, and fruit arise. Likewise from this excellent thought much happiness is experienced among gods and human beings. And also it will reproduce omniscience.

The Sutra of Instructions to the King says:

O great king, by the ripening of the karma of the virtuous roots of the wish for unsurpassable, true, complete enlightenment, you will be born many times among the gods and experience happiness. You will be born many times among human beings and experience happiness. But if the power is produced of always being among gods and human beings, then, O great king, the virtuous roots of bodhicitta will be diminished or not fully developed.

e. The benefit of Suffering being Eased and the Appearances of Wisdom Produced

The immeasurable benefits of arousing bodhicitta:

This is the excellent medicine that cures the ills of beings;
The magic vase that magnifies wish-fulfilling splendor.
This is the sun of wisdom, and the moon that soothes our torments,
With qualities like a host of stars in a spotless sky.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

Bodhicitta is the seed of all the dharmas of buddhahood. In making the white dharmas of all sentient beings increase, it is like a field. In burning away all faults, it is like kalpa fire. In exhausting all unhappiness, it is like the wealth of the nagas. In accomplishing all goals, it is like the king of wish-fulfilling gems. In pulling us out of the stream of the river of samsara, it is like an iron hook. In the world together with its gods, humans, and asuras, it is like an offering shrine. In fulfilling all wishes, it is like an excellent wishing-vase.

The Bodhicharyavatara says:

This is the excellent amrita of deathlessness
That conquers for sentient beings the fearful Lord of Death.
This is the inexhaustible precious treasure source,
That clears away all the poverty of sentient beings.

This is the excellent medicine of the supreme physician
That completely pacifies all the illnesses of beings.

This is the wishing-tree that eases the weariness
Of beings exhausted by wandering on the path of samsara.

This is the universally supporting bridge
That liberates all beings from fear of the lower realms.
This is the arising of the moon of mind,
That clears away the torment of the kleshas of beings.

This is the great sun that fully bestows on beings
Elimination of the darkness of ignorance,
From churning the milk of teachings of the Holy Dharma
This is the essential butter that arises.

Beings who are travelers, treading the path of samsara,
Wish they could experience the bounties of happiness,
But now at this banquet of the ultimate happiness
These great travelers, sentient beings, will be satisfied.

f. The Benefit of vast qualities

Because these qualities are immeasurable, the mind:

This is as vast as the measureless ocean of dharmadhatu
And the supremely miraculous qualities of the Victorious One.
Within it are limitless cloud-banks of inconceivable merit.
Their nature, always produces happiness and benefit,

Thus the immeasurable dharmas of buddhahood are grasped. The Bodhisattva-Pitaka-Sutra says:

Shariputra, if a bodhisattva mahasattva possesses a certain single dharma, these dharmas of buddhahood and immeasurable others will be completely grasped. What is this single dharma? It is the excellent wish for enlightenment.

Shariputra, if a bodhisattva mahasattva possesses this single dharma, these dharmas of buddhahood and immeasurable others will be completely grasped.

Similarly, many aspects of Dharma will appear and be blessed by buddhahood. The Sutra of the Embodiment of Genuine Dharma says:

Bhagavan, This excellent wish is the root of all Dharmas. When this wish is absent, one is far from all the Dharmas of the buddha.

Bhagavan, as for this excellent wish, even if one does not enter into buddhahood, Dharma words will arise from the center of the sky, and from walls, and trees.

Within this excellent wish of bodhisattvas, from the examination of one's own mind, all the instructions and teachings will arise. Therefore, Produce the excellent wish for of enlightenment.

Bhagavan, its is, for example, like this. The head, though it is the first of the limbs, is not the life. Similarly, one who has this excellent wish, does not have the enlightenment of the buddhas.

This is better than making offerings to the tathagatas.

The *Sutra Requested by the Householder Glorious Gift*²⁴⁴ says:

Better than persons in the buddha fields
Filled abundantly with the seven treasures,
Who offer them freely to the lords of the world,
Those who have joined their palms in veneration
And bowed to the excellence of bodhicitta
Make an offering that is more noble,

And this is not the end of what is gained.

The Noble Moon Lamp Sutra says:

In the fullness of a thousand million million fields
All the measureless offerings to the Chief of Beings
Would not equal the value of a thought of kindness

The Sutra of Training in the Limitless Gate says:

Bhrama, these three are unsurpassed by offerings and ceremonies for the tathagatas. They have immeasurable merit. What are these three? They are producing the wish for unsurpassable, true, complete enlightenment; grasping the Holy Dharma of the tathagatas; and practicing what one has heard.

Bhrama, these three are unsurpassed by offerings and ceremonies for the tathagatas.

Bhrama, if there is entry into the kalpa-long measure of life of the body of the tathagata, the completed ripening of these offerings would be shown and that kalpa exhausted; but the benefit of the heap of merits of these three would not be exhausted.

Moreover, liberated from the lower realms, attaining peace, being immeasurable and inconceivable and so forth, one will be a worthy object of prostrations. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

The moment they arouse the mind of bodhicitta,
These wretched ones who are bound in the prison of samsara,
Will be called the sons of the tathagata
And be worthy of the prostrations of the world

And also:

The low is made high.

The same text says:

Like the excellent elixir that turns things into gold,
It makes this unclean body the body of a Buddha.
What is worthless is turned into something supremely precious,
Therefore firmly grasp this which is known as "bodhicitta."

The *Inconceivable Secrets Sutra*²⁴⁵ says:

The merit of bodhicitta
if this were put into form
Would fill the whole of space,
Therefore it is supreme.

The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

In brief, as much as the goodness of the buddha bhagavats are the virtues of arousing bodhicitta. They are as vast as the sky and dharmadhatu.

Bodhicitta is taught because of the intention of the buddhas to do benefit. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Having intended²⁴⁶ this over many kalpas,
The enlightened sages see the benefits of this

The praise of the bodhisattvas who possess bodhicitta is like this. These bodhisattvas are a great field. Anyone who becomes angry with them has immeasurable non-merit whose fruition is the lower realms, the Bodhicharyavatara says:

Whoever to such patrons as these buddha sons
Produces vicious aggression and animosity,
As many bad thoughts as they aroused, so many kalpas
They will abide in hell, so the Sage has taught.

The Sutra of the Miracle of Attaining Complete Pacification
says:

Manjushri, as many times as they have animosity to a bodhisattva, so many kalpas will they abide in hell. Therefore don the armor of bodhicitta.

Well if one produces virtue by faith, won't one's merit increase even more? The former text says:

Well if someone produces the supreme mind, The fruition will be more excellent than that.

How will it increase? The Sutra of the Seal of Entering into Certainty and Uncertainty says:

Manjushri, as for its being completely and eternally grasped, for example, if all the sentient beings in all the worlds of the ten directions were given eyes,²⁴⁷ someone who did that would not produce more merit. Or if all the beings of all the worlds of the ten directions were released from the darkness of a dark prison and established in the happiness of a chakravartin or Bhrama; if a son or daughter of noble family looks on a bodhisattva with faith and devotion to the mahayana, and expresses praise, a merit countlessly greater than that will be produced.

Even those who look on a bodhisattva with the mind of the kleshas do not go to the lower realms, but are born in the higher realms, let alone those who have faith. The Noble Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

The bodhisattva Gaje²⁴⁸ of good form and pleasant to look upon was begging alms in Shravasti, when he was seen by a merchant's daughter Palyön chengyi Chok.²⁴⁹ The girl lived out her²⁵⁰ life tormented by a blazing fire of desire, and then was born among the thirty-three gods. There the children of the gods remembered their former existences, and she said, "E ma! If by looking at a bodhisattva even with desire, such a ripening as this arose, what would have happened if we looked with faith and reverence! Having thought that, they came together with their divine retinues of five hundred. They offered flowers and so on.

Moreover, even those who by not having faith in them go to the lower realms, finally, guarded by their compassion, will be liberated beyond samsara. If they are connected by faith, by having that benefit, they will quickly attain enlightenment. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Even those who do evil to bodhisattvas, and by those actions go to the lower realms, will be liberated from there by that bodhisattva with great effort. They will be established in great enlightenment.

The Bodhicharyavatara says:

By those individuals who have once seen me
Whether thoughts of anger or of faith arise,
Forever after may this always be the cause
Of establishing every benefit for them.

Also:

Even those who harm them will have a connection to happiness.
They will go to for refuge to that source of happiness.

2. the essence

There are seven sections

a. The general explanation of arising and entering

Now the essence of arousing bodhicitta will be explained. Thus for supreme enlightenment...:

Arousal of bodhicitta consists of the desire
Of attaining true buddhahood for limitless sentient beings.
The two kinds are those of aspiration and entering.
Wishing for this is always joined with application
Just as volition to move is always joined with moving.

In arousing bodhicitta, one desires buddhahood for the benefit of others. The Abhisamayalankara says:

As for arousing bodhicitta, for others' benefit.
Because of that one wishes for perfect enlightenment.

Moreover since it is right that this attitude has a beneficial essence, because we discriminate its particulars, by arousing the essence, the particulars will also subsequently be produced. For example by the arousing of bodhicitta of aspiring such and such particulars will subsequently be attained.

From the two essences of these bodhicittas, the bodhicitta of aspiration is the intention to attain enlightenment. Entering is putting that Dharma into practice. Aspiring and entering are like wanting to go and actually going. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 1.15-16

Briefly this excellent wish, the bodhicitta
Should be known to be divided into two separate kinds,
There is the attitude of aspiring to enlightenment
And that of actually entering into enlightenment.

It should be also be known that the difference of these two kinds
Is like that between wanting to go and actually going.
Thus by capable persons these two bodhicittas
Should be known to have this particular distinction.

Here there are many ways of dividing the classifications. There are the arousal of relative and absolute bodhicitta. The Nirvana says:

Divided as absolute and relative,
Bodhicitta has two different types.

Also there are the arousal of bodhicitta by ordinary individuals and by the noble ones and the external viewpoint of sentient beings and the internal viewpoint of the nature of mind. These are also called arousing relative and absolute bodhicitta. The Sutra of the Great Creation of Bodhicitta says:

The bodhisattva Kashyapa asked, Bhagavan, how is such a mind aroused.

The Buddha spoke, "All dharmas are like the sky without any characteristics. Therefore they are primordially luminous and completely pure. That is called enlightenment. Giving birth to the thought of being in accord with that, the precious thought which has not arisen before, is called arousing the thought of enlightenment, bodhicitta.

There are also three kinds of arousing bodhicitta depending on the three disciplines of the three learnings. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

The thought that vows to be faultless, the thought of collecting virtuous dharmas, and the thought of ripening sentient beings--Earnestly arouse these three bodhicittas.

On the paths of accumulation and preparation, practice arousing bodhicitta by wishing for devotion. From the first to the seventh bhumi wish for pure attitudes, on the three pure bhumis for ripening, and on the level of buddhahood for abandoning obscurations. Regarding these four, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

As for arousing bodhicitta, those on the bhumis
Have the wish for devotion and good attitudes
Then for ripening, and after that as well
They have the wish that obscurations should be abandoned.

There also bodhicittas of aspiring to the five paths of accumulation, preparation, seeing, meditation, and no more learning. The Prajnaparamita in Twenty Thousand Lines says:

There are beginner's bodhicitta, the bodhicitta of one who is properly-trained, the bodhicitta of seeing the Dharma, the bodhicitta of complete liberation, and the bodhicitta that is inconceivable by thought. Subhuti, these are the wish that those who are entering the path may enter it; that those who have entered it should be properly-trained; that the divine eye may be produced; that one may meditate on the truth of the noble path; and that the unobscured buddha eye may be obtained.

There are also six divisions depending on the six paramitas. The same text says:

The vast immeasurable mind of the bodhisattvas possessing the six paramitas is not shared with shravakas and pratyekabuddhas.

There are also ten divisions related to the ten paramitas. The *Gew'i Lha*²⁵¹ says:

Thus, by proper inner resting in meditation, after meditating on the ten bodhicittas,...

According to the dividing points of the stages they are taught by twenty-two examples. According to the teachings of the Sutra Requested by Understanding Ocean, the Abhisamayalankara says:

These are earth and gold, the moon and fire;
A treasure, a source of precious things, a lake;
A vajra, mountain, medicine, and the spiritual friend;
A wish-fulfilling gem, the sun, melodious song;
A king, a treasury, and a far-reaching highway;
A steed, a fountain; echoes, rivers, clouds;
Altogether there are twenty-two aspects.

As for the respective meanings of these examples, the commentary says that they are:

- 1 Strong interest
- 2 wishing
- 3 lofty attitude
- 4 application
- 5 the paramita of generosity
- 6 ...discipline
- 7 ...patience
- 8 ...exertion
- 9 ...meditation
- 10 ...prajna
- 11 ...skillful means
- 12 ... aspiration
- 13 ... power and
- 14 ... wisdom
- 15 the higher perceptions
- 16 merit and wisdom
- 17 the dharmas according with enlightenment
- 18 compassion and clear seeing (vipashyana)
- 19 retention and confident eloquence,²⁵²
- 20 celebration of Dharma
- 21 the path that crosses all at once

22 possession of dharmakaya.

Strong interest is like earth,
Wishing is like gold,
Lofty attitude is like the rising moon.

These three signify the lesser, middle, and greater paths of accumulation.

Application is like fire.

This is arousing bodhicitta on the four levels of the path of preparation.

Generosity is like a treasure.
Discipline is like a source of precious things.
Patience is like a lake.
Exertion is like a vajra.
Meditation is like a mountain.
Prajna is like medicine.
Skilful means is like a spiritual friend.
Aspiration is like a wish-fulfilling gem.
Power is like the sun.
The perfection of wisdom is like listening to a melodious song.

These designate the first through the tenth bhūmis.

Higher perception is like a king.
The two accumulations are like a treasury.
The dharmas according with enlightenment are like a highway.
Compassion and clear seeing are like an excellent steed.
Retention and confident eloquence are like a fountainhead.

These five apply overall to the eighth, ninth, and tenth bhūmis.

Celebration of dharma is like an echo.
Crossing all at once is like a river.
Dharmakaya is like clouds.

These three occur in the tenth bhūmi, where wisdom and great buddha activity benefit beings.

Commenting on this, the Prasannapada says:

The first three include the lesser, middle, and greater levels of the beginner's path of accumulation. The next includes the path of entry to the first bhūmi. The next include the ten bhūmis, "Supremely Joyful" and so on the paths of seeing and meditation. The next five include special paths. The next three kinds of arousing bodhicitta concern preparation, real experience, and completion of the level of buddhahood. Thus, these divisions include everything from the beginner's level to buddhahood.

Some join the last three to the level of prabhasvara, but this way of explaining the scripture is not right. Those on that level do not perceive entry into buddhahood, because they do not perceive exhaustion or the final limit. The level of buddhahood is where the arhats of the mahayana dwell.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

The arousal of bodhicitta by the sons of the victorious ones
Is taught to be like clouds

By that, it is taught that these twenty-two go from the path of accumulation to the tenth bhūmi. Here, if it asked whether there is arousal of bodhicitta on the level of buddhahood, it is not maintained that there is desire for attainment here, as with the arousal of bodhicitta by students. This is because buddhahood has already been attained. Also because one has gone beyond the time of proclamation, there is no arousal of wishes for accepting or collecting anything. However, absolute arousal of bodhicitta exists for one who has attained dharmata, mounting higher and higher without harming attainment. This is because emptiness exists without being discarded, and because the great objectless compassion produces benefits. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

When I see with the Buddha-eye and what arousing bodhicitta I possess, it is beyond the number of grains of sand of the river Ganges in the eastern part of the world. I teach the Dharma in order to benefit those sentient beings who have gone into the birth-places of hell-beings, pretas, and animals.

The glorious teacher Jnanakirti said that within the twenty-two above, the first three are aspiring, and the later nineteen are maintained to be entering]:

Strong interest and so forth, those three divisions
Are the three aspects of the bodhicitta of aspiring.
As for what is called the bodhicitta of entering,
It is explained to have nineteen aspects.

Though he says that, it should be maintained that each of these has two aspects, of aspiring and entering. Aspiring intends to realize enlightenment. Entering puts it into effect by engaging with it. Both are necessary in each case.

As the support of arousing bodhicitta, according to the mind-only school, making what at first was not attained be attained, one of the seven families of individual-enlightenment, whichever is appropriate, arises. The Lamp of the Path of Enlightenment says:

The seven families of the pratimoksha
Always have vows of achieving this as other;
However it is not seen as other for those Who have the good fortune of mahayana vows.

According to madhyamaka, those in whom bodhicitta is aroused and practiced should not be maintained to be only those who have the free and well-favored body. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Now to explain the scope of those who have this dharma, countless gods, nagas, asuras, sky-soarers²⁵³ and big-bellied ones²⁵⁴ produce bodhicitta, the wish for unsurpassable, true, complete enlightenment.

These two systems are not understood to be contradictory. Thus, at the time of arousing bodhicitta, even if one has not been imputed with the name of the pratimoksha vows, since one must be able to take vows with a similar meaning, not to cut off life and so forth, one will certainly have a similar support. That from transgressing their goal a wrong attitude will arise is certain. If one is not able to take the appropriate version of the pratimoksha vow, nothing at all will arise. This would contradict the very wish that was being aroused. In brief, for a being who wishes to practice this, gathering its bases is the bodily support. Having the particular attitudes of faith and so forth is the support of thought. The Sutra of The Palmyra Tree of the Three Jewels says:

Because one has faith in the Conqueror and his Dharma,
One also has faith in the highest enlightenment.
If one has faith in the practice of buddha sons,
One will have the attitude of the wise.

As for the support of place, wherever one is born while the cause that damages bodhicitta does not arise, that is the place.

The three causes of arousing bodhicitta are faith with the Buddha as its object, compassion with sentient beings as its object, and hearing the benefits of bodhicitta. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

From the power of friendship and from hearing Dharma,
From the cause and roots and from being accustomed to virtue,
There is the Unstable and that which arises stably.
Stabilized by others is arousing bodhicitta.

Relying on true friends, or being urged by the spiritual friend, and having heard the Dharma is the cause of arousing the unstable bodhicitta of aspiring, which is the first kind to arise. Arising subsequently by the cause of one's becoming accustomed to virtue and awakening the proper cause, and awakening the root, compassion, is the stable arising of the bodhicitta of entering. The passage says that there are these. The essence of arousing bodhicitta is entering into an attitude of aspiration inseparable from the desire to attain complete enlightenment for the benefit of others. What is included in this becomes the essence of the six paramitas, The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

This bodhicitta also sets out to do benefit for others. It is this nature of aspiring and entering which has the six paramitas.

Also the two bodhicittas and the three controlling disciplines of a bodhisattva are of one nature. By the wish to benefit others and good conduct, there is aspiring and entering. The master Sherab Jungne in his The Ornament of the Sage's Intention says:

Neither of these bodhicittas goes beyond desire for unsurpassable, true, complete enlightenment for the benefit of sentient beings.

By self-control there is 1) the discipline of control. Since from that benefit for others is produced, there is 2) the discipline of performing benefit for sentient beings. By increase of the two accumulations and so forth, there is 3) the discipline of gathering virtuous dharmas. Since all these control unwholesome aspects of one's continuum, they are taught to be the controlling disciplines of a bodhisattva.

For example, like a wishing-jewel that cures plagues, makes arise what is needed and desired, clears darkness and so forth, here there are different aspects of one essence.

In the extensive explanation of the individual natures

b. the essences of arising and entering are explained:

Aspiring has the essence of the four immeasurables.
And entering that of the six paramitas, it is maintained.

The Sutra Requested by Manjushri says:

Manjushri, that which aspires to the benefit of others is the great kindness, the great compassion, the great joy, and the great equanimity. That perfect conduct is also the six paramitas.

Now so that what occurs by means of the individual benefits of these two may be known, let us say a little about

c. the benefits of the bodhicitta of aspiring:

For beings:

Though some may worship the Buddhas to the limits of the directions
For many millions of kalpas, caring only for their own good,
This will not match even a fraction of the merit of aspiration.

The Glorious Account of the Dharmas of Complete Great Nirvana says:

Whoever offers all their lives to all the buddhas
The seven precious substances²⁵⁵ and the requisites of life And immeasurable offering of the five kinds of food [?]

More excellent than that is aspiring to enlightenment
For the sake of sentient beings, for just the space of a moment.
The excellent virtues of doing that are limitless.

Moreover:

Whatever being, for even the space of a moment,
Meditates by arousing bodhicitta,
As for the heap of merit of doing that,
It cannot be reckoned by even victorious ones.

d. An example of what it is like:

As for showing its suitability:

Aspiring to lighten even a little the sufferings of beings
Even if this arises only for an instant,
Brings us liberation from the lower realms.
And limitless happiness among gods and human beings.

A friendly ship captain's daughter having given four kasharpani coins and eight and sixteen and thirty-two, by kicking her mother's head, wounded it. On an island in the ocean, she was welcomed by four divine daughters and eight and sixteen and thirty two, and when her good actions were exhausted, in the south she was put into an iron house, and in the instant her head was being drilled she thought, In Jambuling many have struck women's/mothers heads, and these will certainly come here, but may I substitute for them so that they are not be born here. In the instant of thinking this, the remaining time of punishment by drilling was over. After that lifetime was done, she was born as a Tushita god.

e. the explanation of the benefits of entering

Though by the bodhicitta of aspiring great benefits are attained, the benefits of entering are limitlessly more than that:

And yet the rewards of entering are infinitely more.
Because there is always a real and actual application,
All excellent minds that apply themselves thus for even an instant,
Are said to bring together the two accumulations,
Which otherwise would be the task of many kalpas

By lofty attitude, one is entirely elevated. Because the benefits of an instant of application are immeasurable, even the benefits of an instant of aspiration are therefore immeasurable. The Sutra of the Girl Excellent Moon says:

If from just the thought of helping others
the benefits will be immeasurable,
Why even speak about really doing this?

The Bodhicharyavatara says: 1.27

If merely thinking about performing benefit
Is much nobler than making offerings to the buddhas,
Why even speak of really exerting ourselves
For the happiness of all sentient beings without remainder?

In accord with that, Minag Dungthungchen Sepa, for a period of forty thousand kalpas did pure actions in a forest and as the bhramin child "skar ma la dga' ba" did so for twenty thousand years. Then having come into a city to beg alms, he was seen by the daughter of a merchant, who thought, if I don't ask for him as a husband I'll die. To save her life, by abandoning the pure conduct, collected over twenty thousand kalpas association and so forth, as is said in the Sutra of the Skill of the Great Secret Path of Upaya.

Aspiration does not have a fruition of continuously arising merit, but the merit of entering has the distinction of continuously arising. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 1.17

Though from the bodhicitta of aspiration

There is a great fruition in samsaric life,
The merit of this does not continually arise
As it does with the bodhicitta of entering.

f. how by the power of mind, accumulation is combined

Now, by accumulation every instant explaining how many are combined, subsequently the wrong conceptualization of inferior minds ceases. As for the reason:

So whether all that has been taught to take three countless kalpas
Is completed quickly or after a very long time,
Or there is liberation within a single lifetime,
Actually depends on the power of the mind.
Whatever is done by efforts, means and the highest prajna,
Is in reality done by this unsurpassable power.

Bodhisattvas of very dull powers need thirty-three innumerable kalpas to attain enlightenment. The paths of accumulation and preparation take three. Each of the ten bhumis takes three. Those of middle powers need seven. Each of the paths of accumulation and preparation takes two. The path of seeing takes one, the path of meditation two. Those of sharp powers take three. The Precious Lamp of the Middle Way by master Bhavya says:

Those of sharp powers take three innumerable kalpas to become completely and perfectly enlightened. Those of intermediate powers take seven; those of dull powers take thirty-three.

As for these three degrees of sharpness, The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Perfected in three innumerable kalpas,
They will then complete their meditation.

The great commentary on the Prajnaparamita in Eight Thousand Lines says: 545.6

In the first innumerable kalpa they begin the path of accumulation, and go as far as the first bhumi. In the second, they go from the second bhumi "the spotless one" up to the seventh. In the third, they go from the eighth bhumi "the motionless one" up to buddhahood.

The Bodhisattva-bhumi says:

For the paths of accumulation and preparation they take one, from the first to the seventh bhumis they take one, and for the three pure bhumis they take one.

As completing the paths of accumulation and preparation brings us to the first bhumi, the prajnaparamita's way of explaining the number of innumerable kalpas is of one meaning with that of the Bhumi-collection. In this account of innumerable kalpas those of sharp and dull powers are distinguished, and though those of sharp powers take three innumerable kalpas for the gradual stages of the two accumulations, this is from the point of view of one final gathering into union.

Also since it is explained that for great power of mind every instant combines many kalpas, they do not necessarily need three countless kalpas. The secret mantra says that from the viewpoint of those of the sharpest powers, by their great powers of mind every instant combines immeasurable kalpas, and by continuous learning, they are able to be liberated quickly within a single lifetime and so forth.

After they attain abhisheka, their dwelling in meditation on the two stages of development and fulfillment is called the lesser path of accumulation. Then if they strive with great effort and skillful means, it is taught that within that very life they attain the path of seeing. For those who have attained the path of seeing there are no birth or death, so within that very life, they complete the path of meditation. This is attaining enlightenment.

Also having attained the path of seeing, if they wish, they can establish enlightenment within seven days. The Prajnaparamita in Twenty Thousand Lines says: {{547.1}}

These great bodhisattvas, having attained with respect to dharma the dharma eye, if they wish, in seven days, can be completely enlightened with unsurpassable enlightenment.

The measure of benefits of this is that of the wealth of autonomy, in which whatever we desire is accomplished and there is only what we like. Whether on the shravaka, pratyekabuddha, or bodhisattva yanas, it is taught that this body of the noble ones is made to manifest. Therefore, not many can be reckoned as suitable for being liberated in a single lifetime in the style of secret mantra.

In mantrayana, with its profound skillful means many quickly attain the path of seeing. Up to the path of seeing, they enter into the particulars of means and effort. Beyond that bodhisattvas of very sharp powers and the vidyadharas of mantrayana are without distinction in the time of traversing the bhūmis. Mantra-practitioner rigdzin noble ones are more quickly liberated than the duller ones. With exertion, great skillful means, and a life of prajna their acts are quickly established in the world. By ordinary ones they are not established, but the example has indeed been understood, and after one life they do not travel to another. Though the inner luminous nature of mind is not fundamentally established in existence, merely from abandoning defilements, getting close to it is established.²⁵⁶ {{548.2}}

g. How joy is produced in these being newly born ultimate bodhicitta:

This possess the essence of the wishing tree of compassion
As for its bearing well the heavy burden of beings,
In this world even Bhrama and so forth,
Even for themselves have never dreamed of this
Let alone seeking this bodhicitta for other beings
So joy is created in this which has never existed before.

The Madhyamakavatara says:

Intermediate shravaka buddhas and the being the Lord of Sages, All these Buddhas take their birth from the bodhisattvas,
It is the mind non-dual with the mind of compassion
Bodhicitta, which is the cause of the buddha sons.
Therefore first of all compassion should be praised.

In that way, the wishing tree of compassion bears the burden of the flock of birds of limitless sentient beings. these as for that ultimate bodhicitta, father mother and so forth wishing benefit for themselves and worldly lords Bhrama and so forth even those are without is and even for themselves up to now caring only for this life, such an attitude, previously unborn, should be rejoiced in. {{549.0}} That is what it is saying. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 1.23-5

Even if we include the love of father and mothers
Who has such a beneficial attitude?
Even those who are gods and highly accomplished sages
Or does even Bhrama have anything like this?

If before now none of these sentient beings
Had such an attitude even for their own benefit,
If it was not dreamed of even in a dream,
How would such benefits ever rise for others?

This attitude of benefit by bringing joy to others,
Which does not arise even for oneself
This specially precious thought of benefiting beings
Is an unprecedented wonder which is born.

This wondrously arisen attitude accomplishes the benefit of both self and other. It is the supreme offering to the tathagata. The same text says: 6.127

This itself is pleasing to the tathagatas

This itself accomplishes our true benefit
This itself removes the sufferings of the world
Therefore by me this always should be done.

Instructing us to arouse bodhicitta, even if we do not attain buddhahood, the Bodhicitta Commentary says:

As for bodhicitta, not producing it
One will never attain the level of buddhahood.
In samsara for doing benefits for oneself and others
No other skillful means exists but this alone.

3. The liturgy of receiving

a. the preliminaries

Collecting the concordant conditions,

There are six sections

b. The object of receiving

Therefore, since arousing bodhicitta is within our power, in the space front visualize an assembly of buddhas and bodhisattvas. Do as is explained in The Sutra Describing the Virtues of the Field of Manjushri, and perform the liturgy below. Moreover, the Lamp of the Path to Enlightenment says:

If one does not find a guru,
In receiving the vow from another,
The ritual is said to be valid.
So in former lives Manjushri
By becoming Amwaraja
Aroused the bodhicittas.

The buddha field of Manjushri
As explained in the Ornament Sutra
Is also clarified here.

With the five eyes of the protectors
Perfect bodhicitta
Is produced and provided
For beings as a lamp,
To liberate from samsara:

Hostile and angry attitudes
Miserliness and jealousy
Keeping hold of them from now on,
Until supreme enlightenment,
We will not perform them.

Pure conduct should performed
Evil deeds and desire abandoned.
Rejoicing in the disciplines
We will train in buddhahood

We ourselves will not quickly
Proceed into buddhahood.
While even one sentient being
Remains outside in extremes

The measureless buddha fields
Inconceivable by thought
May they be completely abandoned
Grasped from labeling names and Fragmented phenomena
Within the ten directions
Their karma of body and speech
Let us purify it all.

Karma of mind is also to be purified.
Unvirtuous actions are to be done.
In that way bodhicitta should be aroused

a) Receiving from a guru

If one does not have the power to do this oneself or one wants to receive it from a guru, as for this precious attitude:

This also arises from the spiritual friend.
As a rain of all desired falls from wish-fulfilling things,

From a jewel falls a rain of all that is needed or wished-for. So too spiritual friends support the arising of all good dharma and the birth of bodhicitta. How? By possessing bodhicitta and being competent in training in it, they are able to accept students. The Twenty Vows says:

Since they have the power they should accept them.

The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Competent in the meaning of the great vehicle,
Excellent in the discipline of bodhicitta,
Never is the spiritual friend to be let go
Even for the sake of preserving one's life itself.

The Lamp of the Path says: {{552.1}}

Receive the vow from a good guru
Competent in the liturgy of the vow
Who is a master dwelling in the vow.

Grasping its benefits and possessing compassion.
Such a one should be known to be an excellent guru.

b) Creating pure vessels

Such a one:

By a guru who is free from faults having all the virtues,
As for the fortunate student producing joy,
Seeing the faults of samsara and liberation's benefits,
The good dharma of the provisional and ultimate vehicles,
And the limitless praises of bodhicitta are told.

To teach this again, seeing the faults of samsara and praising bodhicitta, the guru transforms the mind.

c) Arranging objects of worship and offerings {{552.4}}

Then of arousing bodhicitta

In a clean and pleasant place that is beautified by offerings, Gather practice articles pleasing to gods and human beings.

Arrange offerings of lights, incense and so on, and gather implements pleasing to gods and human beings.

d) The host of buddhas and their emanations {{552.6}}

Then as symbolized by the representations in front, in front:

Visualize space as being filled with an ocean of buddhas
Together with their sons, like heaped up banks of clouds.

Visualize, as is taught in the Moon Lamp Sutra that they are summoned by the feast of incense and music, and joining the palms, saying the following three times:

We arouse the vast and excellent bodhicitta.
May all these beings without remainder be enlightened.
May there be no sentient beings who are not vessels.
Approach! Approach! Divine ones who possess the ten powers.
By the power of your timely kindness
May you, the three jewels, care for the welfare of beings.
With mental offerings and those arranged here,
We supplicate the victorious ones and their retinue.

By that from the buddha fields of the ten directions the three jewels approach. Visualize that they fill the whole of space.

e) establishing our suitability to do this{{553.4}}

How suitability is established for what is visualized really approaching:

It is taught that this really happens, just as we visualize,
This is because of the unspoiled power of our minds,
And also the compassion of the wise and considerate masters.

The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Whatever victorious ones we may have visualized
Remain in front of us, and always grant their blessings.
They completely liberate us from the arising of faults.

By possessing the wisdom that knows the buddhas, we supplicate and intend to invite them. Possessing kindness and compassion, they see us. By their accomplishing buddha activity, they really approach miraculously in an instant. Why? Since from the viewpoint of the buddhas, sentient beings have no benefits, they do this for the sake of producing benefit for us. If they come such a long way merely for the food offerings, the merit of bodhicitta must be suitable for the guests really to approach.

f) Inviting, and offering baths, and adornment

Visualize that they listen eagerly and closely and approach in the space of the sky:{{554.3}}

Then, with joined hands full of a double handful of flowers,
We invite them to be seated, and then we should offer to bathe them,
Also offering garments, ornaments, and the rest.

Produce the excellent visualization that all the three jewels are in the sky, along with their divine palaces from all the three-fold thousand worlds, whose own place is right here. Invite them to be seated on brilliant lotus, jewel, sun, and moon seats. The Supreme Insight says:

Without exception you who are the lords of sentient beings,
Divine ones who irresistibly overpower the hordes of maras,
Knowing all things without exception exactly as they are,
We supplicate the bhagavans and their retinues to come to this place.

When this is said, they approach and in a bath-house many divine youths and maidens wash their bodies with precious jewel-ornamented vases and with immeasurable bath-offerings. After these offerings, they dry them with towels. Visualizing that we offer them clothing, say these words:
[I think this is the same one in VYS, but I don't have that page here] 555.1

In very fragrant excellent bathing-houses
With brilliant floors that shine like spotless crystal,
Whose pleasant pillars are blazing with precious jewels,
Whose hangings and tapestries are brilliant with pearls,

Are the tathagatas and the buddha sons
With precious vases filled with perfumed water
And an abundance of good and pleasant songs
With joyful music we ask to wash their bodies.

Their external bodies are lovingly anointed
With matchless perfumes, pure and excellent-smelling.
Then for these Sages, with colors that are well-dyed,
We offer them fine garments of matchless fragrance,

Excellent clothing, fine and soft to touch.
And hundreds of excellent ornaments, for all these
The noble ones Samantabhadra and Manju
Avalokiteshvara and others

A fragrant odor fills the billion worlds
The supremely fragrant bodies of the sages.
Blaze with light as they are being anointed,
As if adorned in refined and polished gold.

Having said this, in their dwellings they take their individual seats. {{555.6}}

2) The seven-fold service,

a) The main topic of the seven-fold service,

There are seven sections.

i) prostration

has two sections.

a)) The main topic

First as for the limb of prostration:

Then we should join our palms just over the crowns of our heads,
Like a rising lotus beginning to bloom in some pleasant pond.
With melodious praises, emanating countless bodies,

We should prostrate to those great lords with devotion.

As for joining the palms like a lotus, the Great Liberation says:

Like a lotus that is just beginning to blossom,
We should join the palms of the hands at the crown of the head.
Prostrate to the buddhas of the ten directions.
With their immeasurable bodies like a mass of clouds

The Irresistible Action says:

With the power of aspiration for good action,
Holding all the victorious ones vividly in mind,
We bow with as many bodies as there are atoms in the universe,
We prostrate to all the victorious ones.

b) The benefits

As for the merits of this: {{556.4}}

The merits of this are as many as the atoms of the earth,
With all that are to be found in its many oceans and mountains
Until we have had the body of a universal monarch
As many times as there are atoms in Indra's world,
And finally attain the level of supreme peace,
We would find no such merits in the whole of the three worlds.

As to what the merits of prostration for the sake of arousing bodhicitta are equal to, there is no such thing in the three worlds. This is because, if we prostrate, trying to do only good, much merit is obtained. The Teaching of the Vinaya says:

O monks, If you prostrate with faith to a stupa containing a hair of the tathagata's head or a nail, as for the ripening of that, as many actions as Bhrama does without the arising of anger, as many as the atoms reaching up to the golden ground of Indra, that many times we will experience the happiness of a universal monarch, and go among gods and human beings.

ii) Offering.

a)) The brief teaching

As for the second limb:

Material wealth and offerings emanated by mind
We shall offer them offerings unsurpassably vast.

b)) The extended explanation

has two sections concerning real offerings

those emanated by mind.

1)) real wealth {{557.3}}

As for arranging real offerings:

Let there be flowers and incense, lamps and food and waters;
Canopies, tasseled umbrellas, and exquisite musical sounds²⁵⁷

Victory banners, yak tails, clay drums²⁵⁸ and so forth;
Body and wealth, and all possessions we cannot part with,
All these we offer to the gurus of sentient beings,
The highest teacher of beings, the Buddha jewel himself,
Along with his retinue of Buddha-sons.

As for offering an immeasurable array of these, the Bodhicharyavatara says: 2.15-17

To the lord of sages, the supreme recipient
We offer such pleasant flowers as the jasmine and lotus,
Utpala and so forth, all those of pleasant fragrance,
Pleasantly arranged in skillfully woven garlands.

The finest incense there is full of pleasant fragrance,
We offer billowing in fragrant offering clouds.
Sumptuous food accompanied with a variety of drinks
Nourishment fit for the gods we offer to these lords.

I offer rows of lamps, finely set with jewels,
Which have been arranged on golden lotus buds...

Also it says: 2.19

Precious parasols with handles made of gold.
Having edges that are pleasantly adorned,
Well-shaped and well-carried by attractive bearers,
We will always offer to the kings of sages.

As for the five sections concerning

2)) Offerings emanated by mind, a))) The offering of compassion

As for those emanated by mind, the enjoyments of the thirty-three gods and so forth:

I offer pleasant palaces, decked with nets of jewels,
All that there may be in the worlds of gods and elsewhere,
Where cymbals, dances, songs, and praises fall like rain,
Adorned with hundreds of the finest ornaments.

Visualizing all the divine palaces in all the world realms, filled with songs of praise, and a rain of flowers, we offer them to the holy objects of homage. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 2.18

Palaces of the gods with pleasant songs of praise,
With brilliant hangings embroidered in precious gems and pearls,
All these ornaments, as limitless as space,
I offer to those who have the nature of compassion.

b))) The five unowned offerings

1))) Moreover, in completely pure world realms:

I offer precious mountains, forests, and lotus ponds,
Rippled by the paddling feet of mother swans.
Here fragrant airs arise and medicinal incenses.
Their ravishing perfumes waft from wish-fulfilling trees,

That bow with myriad offerings of fruit and flowers.

The Bodhicharyavatara says: 2.2-3

As many delightful fruits and flowers as there may be
And whatever kinds of health giving medicines,
As many precious jewels as there are in the world
And whatever refreshing clear and pleasant waters,

Likewise mountains made of precious substance
Delightful groves and solitary peaceful places
Adorned with ornaments of exquisite flowering trees,
And trees whose branches are bending down with excellent fruit.

2))) Moreover:

Holding bees in a thousand undulating petals like a bracelet made of white night lotuses,
Opened by sun and moon beams in a cloudless sky
I offer lovely blue and other lotuses.

3))) And also:

Blissfully perfumed air, scented with sandalwood,
Caressing the flower buds with cool and fragrant breezes,
Caves and rock-faced mountains, meadows of heath-giving herbs,
I offer ponds that are full of fresh and cooling water.

The Bodhicharyavatara says: II.5

Lakes and ponds that are adorned by lotuses
With the fascinating music of the wild geese

Harvests that need no sowing nor effort of cultivation
And other ornaments for those that are worthy of worship.

4))) And also:

I offer the ornaments of this world of four continents,
The white moon of an autumn night, with its rabbit's image,
Garlanded by the constellations of its path,
Auspiciously free from adverse influence of the planets,
And the sun, the beauty of the bringer of day,
With its blazing necklace of a thousand rays.

5)) And also:

The billion worlds, from central mountain to outer circle,
The whole array, with all their wish-fulfilling wealth,
All of the buddha fields throughout the ten directions,
Whose number is as many as all the sands of the oceans,
Having received them into my mind, I offer them,
To all the lord buddha sages together with their sons.

3)) The offering of things that are owned:

Wish fulfilling...

Magical vases and wish-fulfilling trees and cows,
The eight auspicious substances and seven royal treasures.
The seven personal treasures, the silken boots and all the rest
I offer the holy patrons, the great compassionate ones.

As for these mental offerings that fill the whole of space, the seven royal treasures are the precious, wheel, jewel, queen, minister, excellent steed, elephant, and general.

The eight auspicious substances are white mustard, durva grass, wood apple, vermilion, curds, the medicine bezoar, a mirror, and a conch shell coiling to the right.

The seven personal treasures are silken boots, cushion, carriage, bedding, throne sword, and a lamb-skin, used as a rug. All these are offered.

4)) offering the ocean of samadhi, a)) As for the samadhi offering, by presenting good conduct and clouds of offerings and so forth, visualize that they are immensely great:

Filling the space of the sky by means of the mind of samadhi,
I offer the outer, inner, and secret offerings,
Great oceanic heaps of clouds of offerings.

b))

1)) From the three aspects, as for the first:

A blazing arbor like floating clouds of beautiful flowers,
Heaps of clouds of amrita, with medicinal herbs and incense,
Clouds of shining lamps, along with food and music,
I offer to the accompaniment of melodious praise.

As to how this is done, the Sutra of the Palmyra Tree of the Three Jewels says:

A canopy mostly made of various kinds of flowers
Emitting rays of light from the array of brilliant flowers This with its array of various kinds of flowers,
We offer to the mahatmas and the buddha sons.

In the palms of our hands are offerings beyond thought
As we offer these to one of the Victorious ones,
We do the same to all of them without exception.
The miraculous emanations of the rishis are like that.

This is also like what is said in the Avatamsaka Sutra and also the Good Action says:

These oceans of inexhaustible praises
With all the ocean of the different sorts of song
Fully expresses the virtues of all the victorious ones.
Thus, we praise all the sugatas.

2)) The two extraordinary offerings

As for the inner and secret offerings, of mind:

Emanating various clouds of offering goddesses
Of grace and garlands, precious gems and songs and dances
Having limitless clouds of the practice offering
Pleasing all the Victorious ones as well as their sons.

Visualize a host of the eight offering goddesses Vajra Form, Sound, Smell, Taste, and Touch, Mala, Lady Producer-of-appearance, and the goddess of Flowers, each with her respective offering, filling the sky and making offerings. That is the offering. This body which is held so dear is also offered as a servant of the three jewels. The Bodhicharyavatara says: II.5

Reaching to the limits of the vastness of space
All this, which is the property of nobody at all

Having been brought to mind, to these best of beings the sages
Together with their sons, if these have been well-offered,
May the holy patrons with their great compassion
Accept these offerings and look upon us kindly.

I, possessing no merit, am utterly destitute.
I do not have any other wealth that I can offer.
As these lords intend the benefit of others,
For my benefit, may these powerful ones accept it.

To the victorious ones, the buddhas and their sons
In all my lives, I shall always offer all my bodies.
May I be accepted by these excellent spiritual warriors....

iii) Confessing evil deeds

Throughout our lives:

Let us confess the evil deeds that cause samsara.
Arising from the habitual patterns of karma and kleshas,
That we have been accustomed to from beginningless time.

Here from the four aspects of confessing evil deeds, first there are the six gates to what is to be abandoned, evil deeds. These are body, speech, and mind; and passion, aggression, and ignorance. Toward our country, father and mother, preceptor, master and so forth, from beginningless time until the present, we have naturally done evil deeds, having the nature of the ten unwholesome actions and so forth, and if these are renounced, to all these subsequently we should give food and so forth. The Excellent Action says:

Whatever evil deeds we have committed
Due to passion, aggression, and ignorance,
Through body, speech, and likewise mind...

There are evil deeds done by oneself, which one has made another do, or which one has not done, but in which one rejoices. Because evil deeds obscure the celestial realms and liberation, they produce the sufferings of the lower realms. The second method of application²⁵⁹ is the antidote four powers. There is 1) the power of complete remorse²⁶⁰ which greatly repents the bad action. When we having done something bad, by trying again there is 2) the power of conduct with good conduct as an antidote. Having accepted a vow, 3) the power of control has authority over doing evil deeds. As by having relied on the three jewels and bodhicitta evil deeds are exhausted, there is 4) the power of support. The Sutra Teaching the Four Dharmas says:

Manjushri, if bodhisattvas possesses these four dharmas, all the evil deeds which have been performed and accumulated will be overcome. What are these four? The conduct of complete repentance, the conduct of the antidote, the power of control, and the power of support.

As for the first, if we do an unwholesome action, we repent it greatly. Second, if we do an unwholesome action, we try very hard to do a wholesome one. Third, if we genuinely receive a vow, we attain control over not doing evil deeds. Fourth, we go to refuge with the Buddha, Dharma, and sangha, and do not give up bodhicitta.

Third, within the way of application there are the preliminaries, the main topic, and what follows. In preparation we should think of the immeasurable buddhas and bodhisattvas and go to them for refuge. As for the main topic, we should remember all our evil deeds and by confessing and repenting of them, all the evil deeds of oneself and others, are visualized floating blackly above one's tongue. By confessing them, from between the eyes of the buddhas and bodhisattvas light rays arise. Visualize that they are immediately purified. Then, after many light rays have arisen, visualize that all evil deeds are purified and the body becomes like crystal. As for the words, the Bodhicharyavatara says: II.27

Dwelling in all the quarters of the universe,
Complete and perfect buddhas and the bodhisattvas,
You who are possessors of the great compassion,
To you I join my palms and make this supplication.

Here within samsara, from beginningless time
Within this life, and also in many other lives
Though I did not seek to do so, I have done evil deeds
Or though I did not do them, I had them done by others.

Confused by ignorance, I was overcome;
And therefore I rejoiced in all these evil deeds;
But now that I have seen they were pain-producing errors,
Sincerely I confess them to the protecting lords.

By me to the three jewels, the Buddha, Dharma, and sangha,
To my father and mother, to the guru, and others
Because of having the kleshas, I have done great harm,
By actions of body and speech, and also in my mind.

By a multitude of wrongdoings I have engendered faults
The evil deeds which I as an evil-doer have done
And which I could not keep from doing in spite of myself,
I confess them openly to the guides of the world.

After that, the essence of whatever evil deeds that have been recognized is purified by being brought into meditative equanimity like space. The Sutra of the Blossoming in the Ten Directions says:

Whoever wants to repent and purify
Should be straightforward and see things as they are.
Those who are true will therefore view things truly.
Those who see things truly will be free.
That is supreme repentance and purification.

Faults of evil deeds are perceived by the master. Contemplating the master, prostration and offerings are done. Hanging the upper robe over one shoulder, say, "We supplicate that evil deeds may be abandoned." After that supplication, take refuge and arouse bodhicitta. Then, having mentally visualized our evil deeds above one's tongue, we say,

"Whatever evil deeds we have done to the three jewels, to the master, our parents, or other sentient beings, by the power of ignorance, we repent and purify all these."

By thinking this forcefully, the bodhicitta in the five eyes of all the buddhas and bodhisattvas dwelling in the ten directions will completely grasp us. For the purpose of attaining the enlightenment of the buddhas, say three times,

"We confess these. From now on we shall try to control ourselves."

After that, enter for a little while into emptiness meditation. Then, from the heart centers of the representations, white light rays arise. Visualize that body, speech, and mind are purified.

Then in the sight of the master, request the vow. Afterwards the students give thanks, Here at first say the liturgy with "I," for oneself. Later "we" is said in practicing with others.

Fourth, as for producing knowledge of being able to train in these, the Sutra of the Great Lion's Roar Requested by Manjushri says:

The karma of evil deeds which we have done because of unawareness should be confessed. Afterwards, by recognizing and confessing our faults, we shall not remain associated with that karma.

The Revelation of Instructions says:

Those who produce bad karma through evil deeds,
By virtue can put an end to that bad karma,
Like the sun appearing, rising out of clouds,

The Sutra of the Treasury of Buddhahood says:

Even those who have murdered their parents or a buddha, By meditating on emptiness are completely liberated.

The Revelation of Instructions says:

Those who have done intolerable deeds,
Those who are blocked by having disparaged me,²⁶¹
By fully confessing and controlling themselves
By this will be fundamentally released.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Whoever was careless, then has become careful
Will be as beautiful as the cloudless moon,
And as happy as Angulimala
Was made by attainment of the joy of seeing.²⁶²

iv) rejoicing in virtue

As for the fourth limb:

May we always rejoice in the limitless stores of merit
That have been accumulated by sentient beings.

If we meditate with rejoicing on our sincere and natural wholesomeness, we will attain the root of virtue, equanimity, and the merit will be immeasurable. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

To weigh the Mount Merus of the cubed thousand worlds
And total up the measure is logically possible.
But this cannot be done with the goodness of rejoicing.

Sincerely rejoice like that, and say these words about the arising of good conduct:

All the merits of beings in the ten directions
Once- and non-returners, and pratyekabuddhas,
The buddha sons as well as all the victorious ones
As many as they may be, we rejoice in them.

v) Urging to turn the wheel of Dharma

As for the fifth limb:

So that all beings without remainder may cross over
We ask that the unsurpassable wheel of Dharma be turned.

The Buddha Bhagavat, after becoming enlightened, did not teach the Dharma until Bhrama offered a mandala and supplicated him. Similarly, visualizing that we are in the presence of the gurus, we supplicate them, saying:

All those who are the lights of the worlds of the ten directions,
Who have unobstructedly gained enlightenment and awakening,
We urge those protectors for the benefit of all beings
To turn the unsurpassable wheel of the Dharma

By that obscurations of abandoning Dharma are cleared away. From then on, from generation to generation, our being will always inseparably hold the holy Dharma.

vi) Requesting not to pass into nirvana

As for the sixth limb:

From now until the ocean of samsara is emptied
We supplicate the buddhas and the buddha sons
Always to remain, not passing into nirvana.

Just as formerly our teacher supplicated the spiritual friend Tsanda not to pass into nirvana, so as many buddha bhagavats as dwell in the world and guru spiritual friends who in their last morning intend to pass into nirvana, we supplicate to remain until samsara is emptied:

The teachers who intend to pass into nirvana
We request you with palms joined
To remain for as many kalpas as there are atoms in the universe
For the peace and welfare of beings.

By that evil deeds that bring about short life, untimely death, and other dangers to life are purified, and immeasurable life is established.

vii) Dedicating the merit to enlightenment

As for the seventh limb:

By this merit may we, as well as all sentient beings,
One and all without exception become enlightened.

We dedicate it so that the virtuous roots of ourselves and others may have the goal of complete enlightenment, and so that that transformation may be the cause of others arousing bodhicitta:

By prostrating, offering, confessing,
Rejoicing, requesting to teach, and asking to remain,
Whatever trifle of virtue we have accumulated,
We dedicate for the sake of enlightenment.

As for the cause of dedication, we are connected with all of the virtue of ourselves and others throughout the three times. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

All the virtue as that sentient beings may have
That was and will be, and now is being produced,
The purity of all the goodness there is,
All that goodness is in each of us.

Dedicating the merit of this should be done only by buddhas. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, these virtuous roots, are to be dedicated only by the buddhas. They are not to be dedicated by shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and those on other levels.

The purpose is so that all sentient beings may attain enlightenment. The same text says:

It is dedicated for the sake of all sentient beings, and not merely for one's own complete attainment. This is because, by so doing, one would fall to the level of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas.

All dharmas are non-existent yet apparent, like dreams and illusions. In dedicating merit, we should know that merit too is like a dream or illusion. The same text says:

Subhuti, all dharma are like a dream, like an illusion. Merit too should be dedicated as being completely like a dream, like an illusion.

The Sutra Requested by Bhadra says:

Whoever does not perceive a gift that is given
As being a gift, or being given by anyone,
By this same equality of giving,
May goodness become complete and be perfected.

If, on the contrary, through conception or attachment, one thinks of the virtuous roots as really and truly existing, that is not good. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

Just like eating good food that is mixed with poison
It is taught that the whiteness of dharma is overcome
By being mixed with discursive thoughts and conception.

Also it says there:

Why so? When there are no characteristics, there can be dedication to enlightenment. But when there are characteristics, there can be no dedication to enlightenment.

Therefore, we should be without conception or attachment. The Abhisamayalankara says:

When this has the aspect of being without characteristics,
Then it has the characteristic of being right.

As for the essence of dedication, by directing the virtuous roots to enlightenment, the mind is transformed and its power is bound by these particular words.

The Display of Qualities of the Field of Manjushri says:

All dharmas, having been conditioned by these,
Are consecrated by the dedicated roots.
Whoever puts forth such an aspiration,
Such a one will surely establish suchness

As for the difference between dedication and aspiration²⁶³, {{571.5}} words and vows of aspiration after the merit of the wholesome causes have been dedicated, are dedications. Wishes which are merely wholesome causes dedicated are aspirations.

Moreover, dedication and the power of the words transform the aspiration of the giver into enlightenment and so forth. What teachers of today say is said from a viewpoint without certain knowledge. Moreover, since this is personal testimony, the guru and the sangha, if they follow those words, accord with establishing mental partialities. When the words are taught to be truly established up to the first bhumi, they do not follow properly. Visualize that as witnesses of our establishing dedication in the sky in front, buddhas and bodhisattvas are heaped up like heaps of clouds. Becoming as kind as the Victorious Ones in former lives, when they gave their own flesh and blood to evil spirits, say as has been taught:

By this merit may all attain omniscience.
May it defeat the enemy wrong-doing.
From the stormy waves of birth, old-age, sickness, and death,
From the ocean of samsara may we free all beings.

Some say that after this we should expand into empty space, but this is completely improper. If it is asked, but isn't what they have done conceptionless? Phenomena appear without intellectual understanding. Merit is like a dream. The one who collects it is like a dream. The practitioner is also like a dream. Though non-attachment to three spheres²⁶⁴ as truly existing is called objectlessness,²⁶⁵ empty meditation is nihilism without any merit at all. We should understand this to be a bad tradition and abandon it.

In general, whatever merit is produced, the preliminary preparation of excellent²⁶⁶ bodhicitta has been accomplished; the main basis, excellent prajna without conception or characteristics, has been accomplished; and the conclusion, the dream-like dedication has been accomplished. Connection with these three excellencies is called "merit in accord with liberation." There is no other cause of the path of buddhahood than this. If this is not accomplished, "that which is in accord with merit," in the sense of accompanying the fruition of particular merits, should be known as being exhaustible.

b) How one's being is purified by this

As for the purpose of the aforementioned seven limbs, for example:

Just as, in a piece of cloth that is cleansed by washing,
The colors with which it is dyed shine through in clarity,
Within the mind that is trained by these preliminaries,
Supreme and actual mind will shine through in one's being.

If defilements hinder the arising of genuine mind, it will not arise. If these hindrances are purified, it will arise. Just so, a filthy cloth that is no longer colored needs laundering²⁶⁷ is to make its colors be as they are.

c) How those that have this foundation are immeasurable

Those who produce the seven limbs:

And so the limitless fruit of this meritorious practice
Encompasses the whole of space like dharmadhatu.

The Sutra Requested by Glorious Secret says:

Whoever, having visualized the buddhas
Of the ten directions and three times,
Joins the palms, prostrating and offering
Rejoicing in merit, confessing evil deeds,
Urging to teach, and asking to remain,
As for the heap of merits of doing this,
It always arises filling the whole of space.

b. the actual arousing of bodhicitta
{{574.3}}

Now as for the actual main ritual, after doing the preliminaries:

Therefore, after having three times gone for refuge
To the Buddha and Dharma, and to the excellent sangha, Supplicate the lords and their sons to consider us.

Just as the former buddhas together with their sons
Dwelt in the practice of arousing bodhicitta.
So from now on, in order to benefit sentient beings
May I dwell in the practice of arousing bodhicitta.
So that those who have not crossed over may cross over,
So that those who have not been liberated may be liberated,
So that those who are not released may be released.
May we establish all sentient beings within nirvana.

And also:

From this time on, taking this name which has been given to me, I so and so, until attaining the essence of enlightenment, go for refuge to the buddha bhagavats, the supreme ones among those who go on two legs, the supreme ones among those who are without desire.

To the holy Dharma, the supreme ones of collections, and to the sangha of those who are non-returners because they are noble ones, to those three and to all the buddhas dwelling in the ten directions I supplicate. I supplicate the great bodhisattvas dwelling on the ten bhumis. I supplicate the vajra-holder gurus. Just as formerly the buddha bhagavats and bodhisattva-mahasattvas aroused the mind of great enlightenment, so I, [the name that was given], too in order that sentient beings who have not crossed over may cross over, and those who have not been liberated may be liberated, and those who have not been released may be released, and those who have not gone completely beyond suffering may go beyond suffering, from this time on until reaching the essence of enlightenment, arouse the mind of great enlightenment. (Say that three times)

Also, as it is said in the Bodhicharyavatara, after one has previously done the supplication to the three objects of supplication [as above] : 3.23-4

Just as formerly the all sugatas
Aroused the wish for supreme enlightenment,
And, having done so, dwelled upon the bhumis
Of the training of a bodhisattva

So, for the liberation of all beings,
I shall arouse this wish for enlightenment,
And I shall train successively in the bhumis
Of this training, just as they have done.

Say that three times.

c. Afterwards, as for the short teaching of exertion in the two bodhicittas,

Now that this sequence of stages of bodhicitta has been established, guard the learning and try to produce its natural benefits. As for the ritual:

Therefore, let us try to arouse these two bodhicittas,
Recite the liturgy three times every day and night.

Cultivating bodhicitta, supplicating, and so forth have many purposes.

4. The purpose of the three recitations of that ritual

The first arouses the bodhicitta of aspiration
The second arouses the bodhicitta of entering.
By the third these two become stable and are purified.

The Ocean Cloud says:

By the first, second, and third recitations, aspiring, entering, and both are made stable and excellent.

Aspiring and entering have a single essence and are not different things. Though in the ritual they are joined as if they were different and three different characteristics arise from the three recitations, they are not different in essence. This is because their nature is a single mental substance, a single time, and a single action. The Bodhisattvabhumi says:

Since these two, aspiring and entering, are inseparable in nature, they are a unity in producing benefit for others. It should be known that they are not different in nature.

5. as for meditation on joy {{577.3}}

Now that we have aroused bodhicitta:

Now we are the remedy for sentient beings.
We have a bodhisattva name as the Buddha's child.
Within samsara we fearlessly benefit sentient beings.
We are always concerned with their benefit alone.
Thus there is a meaning to samsaric human life.

From the instant bodhicitta is aroused, it is held. Those who have this mind unimpaired are known in the samsaric world as bodhisattvas. If we do not impair the virtue of our own family, but increase it, we meditate in immeasurable joy. Directly or indirectly, we benefit sentient beings. If we cannot, still we aspire to do so. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 3.25

Thus by those who are intelligent,
Having aroused this excellent bodhicitta,
Having entered into and expanded it,
Mind will be ennobled and uplifted.

Today I have the fruition of my life,
I have gained the meaning of human existence,
I am born into the family of the Buddha
I have become a child of the Buddha.

Whatever I may do from this time on,
I will try to act in accord with my family.
I will try to act so as not to trouble
This family which is so faultless and noble.

Like a blind man finding a precious jewel
In a heap of filth and discarded rubbish,
Just like that, and seemingly by chance,
Bodhicitta has been born in me.

How many terms are there for bodhisattvas? There are sixteen. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

They are known as bodhisattva, and mahasattva,
Wise ones, and the excellent luminous ones,
The buddha sons, the ground of victorious ones.
Buddha producers, or the buddha sprouts,
Skillful ones, and excellent noble ones,
Ship-captain guides, and the supremely renowned,
Compassionate ones, and those who have great merit,
Noble lords, and possessors of the Dharma.

These words are said to spread the benefit of bodhicitta to those who have not yet aroused the attitude of enlightenment, These words are said to spread the benefit of bodhicitta. The forty-fourth Chapter of the Gandavyuha

*Sutra*²⁶⁸ tells how Sudhana, after Manjushri aroused in him the wish for enlightenment, went ever more southward to seek this learning. At the bank of the southern ocean, in a tower called "having an essence ornamented by Vairochana" surrounded by a retinue of many hundreds of thousands of bodhisattvas, Maitreya was teaching the Dharma. Sudhana saw him from a distance of five hundred yojanas. He was glad and rejoiced, and did ecstatic prostrations. Having seen him, Maitreya extended his right hand, and placed it on Sudhana's head. To the retinue he contentedly expressed Sudhana's praises:

Look now, how with thoughts that are completely pure
This Sudhana, who is born of stable, enduring riches,
Seeking the practice of supreme enlightenment,
This knowing and capable one has come before me now.²⁶⁹

Also it says there:²⁷⁰

Welcome, you who are kind as well as compassionate.
Welcome to the vast mandala of Maitreya²⁷¹
Welcome to that which viewed, completely pacifies,
And which is not exhausting at the time of practice.

This and so forth was taught. Sudhana joined his palms and requested. "Noble one, if I truly enter into unsurpassable enlightenment, please teach how I shall earnestly seek the practice of a bodhisattva?"²⁷²

The answer was, "O son of noble family, You have been completely accepted by the spiritual friend."²⁷³ Why so?

Son of noble family, bodhicitta is like the seed of all buddha dharmas. It is like the growing field of the white dharmas of all beings. From the essence and benefit of that up to the examples, Sudhana having properly been taught, had these benefits and immeasurable others.

What is taught here is extensively presented in the sutra.

6. the three aspects that are always to be trained in to take advantage of the opportunity.

a. The brief teaching

After arousing bodhicitta, there should be the stage of serious training in it. This is how to take advantage of the opportunity.

Having germinated these seedlings of the two bodhicittas
Within the good soil that is the mind of sanity,
Try hard to keep them and increase their purity.

By arousing the luminous mind of bodhicitta repeatedly, things become purer. As for maras and straying which we have not able to cut. The Sutra of the Ten Dharmas says:

The precious jewel by nature
Is a source of blazing light.
If we accept and reject,
That beauty is torn in two.

So even having the gotra
Realization of bodhicitta
Must be free of dualistic extremes
So that maras do not arise.

After the sprout of this attitude has arisen, grasp it without deterioration. Purify defilements and strive only in means of increasing virtue. These are established chiefly by the practice of guarding the supreme mind. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.18

Thus as for this attitude of bodhicitta

I should hold to it and try to guard it well.
Aside from this practice of guarding the mind of enlightenment
What is the use of the many other practices?

Also it says there: 5.1

Those who have the wish to guard this discipline²⁷⁴
Should keep and guard the mind, using their fullest attention.
If we have not trained in the discipline of mind,
We shall not be able to guard and keep that discipline.

By letting the elephant of mind go free,
It will produce the harm of the unremitting hell.
But in this way a mad elephant, who is unrestrained,
Will not do such harm as an uncontrolled mind can do.

If the elephant of mind is truly tied,
On all sides by the rope of constant mindfulness,
We shall be in a state that is without all fear
And everything virtuous will come into our hands.

b. The extensive explanation of exchanging self and other and so forth,

Here is the extensive explanation of how is it grasped, purified, and cultivated:

I shall take in all the suffering of sentient beings.
May my happiness become that of these beings.
May we never be separate until they are enlightened.
Let us practice such sending and taking in our thoughts.

I shall meditate on the four immeasurables,
Which are cultivated in the case of aspiration.
Abandoning whatever does not accord with this,

Thereby let us guard the mind of bodhicitta.
That which is cultivated in the case of entering,
Is said to be the practice of the six paramitas.
Try to abandon whatever does not accord with this,

Resting in the nature of aspiring and entering is said to be grasping the mind of enlightenment. Because what does not accord with this is abandoned, our effort becomes purified.

Cultivating the exchange of our own happiness with the suffering of others is called "cultivating the mind of bodhicitta." Thus, we can cultivate²⁷⁵ a great deal joy and happiness, and while we always have happiness alone, we ourselves bear the burden of sentient beings, and equalize self and other. That self and other should be exchanged is the collective instruction of the sutras. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.16

Without discouragement I should gather the supports
And making a great effort, I should master myself,
Seeing that there is equality of oneself and other,
I should therefore make an exchange of self and other.

Here as the first topic,²⁷⁶ when the immensity of the task of benefiting sentient beings and the immensity²⁷⁷ of realizing enlightenment is heard, without discouragement, thinking, "How could I do that?" one should try to do so. This is the fundamental point. Moreover, if lower sentient beings attain the human body, if I from now on make an effort, they will be established in enlightenment. If these lower ones having looked at the teachings of attaining enlightenment, think that it is difficult, the Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.17

If I say, "how shall I be enlightened,"

Discouraged, I will not accomplish it.
That is the reason why the tathagata,
The one who teaches truly, taught this truth.

Gnats and flies on meat and honey bees²⁷⁸
Likewise mosquitoes and other bugs and worms
Even these by great enough force of effort,
Will gain enlightenment so difficult to attain.

One Like me with the gotra and human birth
Recognizing benefit and harm,
If I keep to bodhisattva conduct
Why should I not attain enlightenment?

The *Sutra Requested by Laksang*²⁷⁹ says: 583.3

Laksang, Moreover, a bodhisattva should train in this way, thinking, "If even those who have become lions, tigers, dogs, jackals, vultures, cranes, crows, owls, worms, bees, and carrion flies will attain enlightenment, those like me who have become human beings, because of that life, why should we not make an equal effort at attaining enlightenment

Laksang, moreover a bodhisattva should train in this way, thinking, "If a hundred people or a thousand have realized and attained buddhahood, why should I too not realize and attain it?"

The Display of the Basket Sutra says:

Then the power of Avalokiteshvara arose from Singha Ling. In the country Destructible Realm²⁸⁰ in the great city "Place of Excrement and Urine," from a place where there were a hundred thousand kinds of insects, at that time, an emanation arisen from the power of Avalokiteshvara arose in form of the sound of the insects, saying, "I prostrate to the Buddha.

These insects afterwards remembered "I prostrate to the Buddha." Having conquered the twenty-peaked mountain of the view of a transitory collection, all these became a bodhisattva named Fragrant Perfume, who was born in the world-realm of Sukhavati.

There are two ways in which we should make an effort to liberate the limitless sentient beings who have been our fathers and mothers. Even if we have made no effort at all in regard to the suffering of dwelling in samsara, if we accomplish enlightenment, it all will be conquered. If we have not previously accomplished that, there is samsara. Since samsara will occur, we should make an effort to do that. If one will not bear any suffering of fatigue for others, since in the womb one will certainly bear limitless suffering, which is hard to bear, one should be without discouragement. As for this,

The Precious Mala says:

For the benefit of measureless sentient beings,
Desiring a measureless enlightenment,
One produces a merit without measure.
From this²⁸¹ state of immeasurable enlightenment
By the accumulation of the four immeasurables
We shall not be obstructed and kept off far away.

If we do this, there will be obtained
What is known as "Limitless merit" And "limitless wisdom. "
By those the fearful sufferings of body and mind
Will be quickly cleared away and cease to be.

By one's having a body in the lower realms due to evil deeds,
Sufferings of hunger, thirst, and so forth will arise.
Not made by evil deeds, but by merit,
There is no other samsara.

As for the mental suffering due to stupidity,
Arising from craving, fear, desire, and so forth,
By the wisdom that does not depend on them,
These and that suffering will quickly be abandoned.

By such suffering of body and of mind,
If we thus have been untouched and completely unwounded,
If we have reached the end of our time within the world,
How will we be led by the world, so that we are sad?

If suffering were going to be short,
Why speak of its being long and hard to bear?
If we were happy because there was no suffering,
How could we fall into harm for a limitless time?

Here, if we did not have any bodily suffering,
How could there be any mental suffering?
As for this because of compassion in the world,
We remain here, staying for a very long time.

Thinking in this way, we will not be discouraged,
Having the attitude that buddhahood is far off.
Having exhausted defilement, for the sake of virtue,
One should always strive to attain that blessed state.

If one thinks, "how could one bear to remain thus for a long time within samsara for the benefit of sentient beings?" that is not how it is. Since bodhicitta exists, one is happy, and since in that sense there is no suffering, one can bear it. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.28ff

By merit the body will be in a state of happiness.
And when because of knowledge the mind has become happy,
Though they remain in samsara for the benefit of beings,
How will those who have compassion then be sad?

As for this, because of the power of bodhicitta,
Having exhausted the power of former evil deeds,
One will therefore gather up an ocean of merit.
This is explained as better than the shravakas.

Therefore, mounted on the horse of bodhicitta,
Which clears away all weariness and desperation,
One will go from happiness to happiness.
Knowing bodhicitta, who could then despair?

All sentient beings have the nature of illusion, whose painting-like phenomena and space appear as the primordial unborn. Therefore, in truth there is nothing that needs to be done, and we should rejoice. The Spiritual Letter says:

As for mind it should be understood
Like paintings done with water, earth, and stone.

The Edifice of the Three Jewels says: 586.5

For example, though the space of the sky has been there for more kalpas than there are grains of sand in the river Ganges, it has no sadness or depression. The space of the sky is not born, destroyed, burned up, or separated.

Why so? Because the space of the sky is not a real thing. Similarly, for the bodhisattva who knows that all dharmas are not real things, the attitudes of sadness, weariness, and depression will not be produced.

We need not be concerned with establishing enlightenment and performing benefits for others. These manners also are thought to arise according to the oral instructions of the mahayana. We should establish thirteen varieties of benefit. What are these? All sentient beings are equal in having been our fathers and mothers again and again, are equal. As at that time by their kindness there was only benefit, one should return their kindness and do benefit for sentient beings. The Noble Sutra of Complete Nirvana says:

This great earth has been made merely as a lump the size of a pea. If one counts the single sentient beings who have not been my father and mother, though this great earth is exhausted, the count of a even single sentient being who has not been my father and mother will not be exhausted.

Moreover, if we count the times we have been benefited by sentient beings, it is a greater burden of deeds than we can keep in mind, so that we shall be overcome. To clear it away, we should also benefit sentient beings. The *Lung Namje*²⁸² says:

Plains and mountains and oceans are not my burden;
My great burden is unacknowledged deeds.

Moreover if sentient beings are happy and well-off, though indeed we do not need to benefit them, since for us they formerly did evil deeds, if they are oppressed by the sufferings of samsara and the lower realms, in order to clear away the faults done by us, we should benefit sentient beings.

Moreover, sentient beings as one wish happiness and do not want suffering, but, because the means of doing this is obscured for them, they are tormented by suffering alone, and in order to eliminate this, we should benefit sentient beings.

Moreover, though immeasurable sentient beings were led by the former buddhas of the past, they were not uplifted and those buddhas were not able to tame them. If these are not led by us, the gotra of the mahayana family will be broken. Sentient beings will be without refuge or protector, and so we should benefit them.

Moreover, by the force of I and ego-grasping, they are blown about by the wind of the kleshas. Since they have gone wrong, if I speak an aspiration that I will make an effort in order to tame them, what benefit should be done for others?

Moreover, though all dharmas are empty and egoless, sentient beings who do not realize this, like people in a dream, should inspire our compassion. If they are not guided, since compassion in particular will be killed, also we should do benefit.

Moreover, though we wander here in samsara, sentient beings giving rise to kleshas of resentment and so forth arise. Now, even if the object of establishing personal enlightenment becomes more attractive than sentient beings, still I should benefit them. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Many who have pleased these sentient beings
Have reached perfection by their doing so.

Moreover, by having really performed benefit for others, because the power of benefit for oneself is established, also one should benefit them. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

What truly establishes self-benefit is also this itself.

Moreover, if one performs benefit for sentient beings, since the buddhas will be pleased, also we should perform benefits. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.119

Unless sentient beings are made to rejoice,
There is no other way to please the victorious ones.

Moreover, though bodhicitta may be aroused, if benefit is not established for sentient beings, we will fall into the state of shravakas and pratyekabuddhas, and therefore we should benefit sentient beings.

In brief, while even one sentient has not been liberated from samsara, until then remaining in samsara, we should do benefits. Day and night without sadness and weariness, if I try for ten hundred million kalpas, and know that within the being of one sentient being happy mind will arise for an instant, I should try with great power of mind.

The Mahayanasutralankara says: 590.4

The buddha sons rely on making supreme exertion.
If they completely ripen the host of sentient beings,
In order that one other mind may be rendered happy,
They will be happy to work for ten thousand million kalpas.

That is how benefits should be performed. The supporting troops²⁸³ are of four kinds. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.31

Devotion²⁸⁴, steadiness, joy, and release.

First, the troops of devotion. Since one is devoted to the beneficial qualities of bodhicitta, happiness is established and unhappiness is rejected. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.31

Devotion is produced by fear of suffering
And thinking of its beneficial qualities.

Second, the troops of steadiness. If I do not arouse bodhicitta, I am just giving up. Having aroused it, by means of sending it forth, even thinking, "this will be bad," we should persist and not lose it. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.46

Then with the observance of Vajra Victory Banner
Undertaking that, one should meditate with pride.²⁸⁵

First examine the situation's possibilities²⁸⁶
Seeing whether it should be undertaken or not.
It is better not to undertake it at all
Than that having once begun, we should then turn back.

{{591.2}}

Third, the troops of renouncing. Sometimes not harming sentient beings depends on the minor precepts of the discipline as explained being given to equanimity. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.42

As for relating to fear and celebrations and so on,
If one cannot do it, then one should just relax.

Fourth, the troops of joy. By enjoying and rejoicing in benefiting sentient beings and practicing the discipline, one enters into it. The Letter to Students says:

Whoever for the benefit of others cuts off their heads
Is like a lotus, the rejoicing eye opening treasury of vision
For its own benefit by a white parasol covered,
The divine level too should be thought of like a sharp sword with whetted edge.

The wholesome is what we should devote ourselves to or since it is the cause of the celestial realms and liberation, it should always be done. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

In spacious fragrant coolness in the heart of a lotus
Made brilliant by the food of the teachings of the Conqueror
My excellent body rising as the Sage's light makes it blossom, Remaining before the tathagata, By virtue becoming his.

The Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.42

Wherever and they go, there by the merit of that
They will be presented with the worship of fruition.

In terms of the viewpoint of sentient beings, since of all sentient beings none has not been our father, mother, and relative, we should benefit them. By becoming a field establishing enlightenment, from that viewpoint we benefit them; and since buddhahood produces joy also from that viewpoint we establish benefit. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.113

Sentient beings as well as the Victorious Ones
Likewise make buddhadharma be established in us.
So why do we not have such respect for sentient beings
In the way we do for the Victorious Ones.

Also it says there: 6.125 {{592.4}}

In order to bring rejoicing to the tathagatas,
From now on, with true comportment serve the world.

Meditating on self and other as equal explains what is done in the ordinary equality meditation. As for the extraordinary, first producing the perception of one like an enemy as one's mother, see it as a happy occasion for oneself and if ultimate good is established, rejoicing, since these are without distinction, meditate thinking "How may I establish this person's benefit?" From one sentient being, one should meditate up to those as limitless as space.

As for exchanging self and other, from the training on that, whatever happiness and merit one has, all that one completely gives forth thinking, "by that merit incidentally may they attain the higher realms and ultimately buddhahood, may I be covered with the suffering of their bad karma exchanged for that, and having received that, by its ripening within my being, for their benefit, may I experience many sufferings in the lower realms."

From the depths of the bone core of the heart, having trained the mind in such an exchange with one sentient being, one should go on to them all. By that, because of beginningless very powerful evil deeds, I later will experience the lower realms and so forth, much karma will be exhausted, and much happiness will be attained. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 8.131 593.5

My happiness and the sufferings of others,
If these situations are not truly exchanged,
The state of buddhahood will not be reached,
And in samsara I will have no joy.

Here some say: "All dharmas are similarly conditions of this. At the summit of aspiration they are consecrated." If one says that, it is not proper. This is because oneself would always be falling into samsara. Also when something unmeritorious has been done, since one is aiming at enlightenment, if one so dedicates it, it would be meritorious, since there is dedication to this special aim. Though in so saying words of Mara have indeed been produced, nevertheless such an answer should be explained. If for the sake of others one aspires to later remaining within extremes and so wandering in samsara, then it follows that even Manjushri is wandering there. His prayer says:

For the sake of every sentient being
May I later remain within extremes.

and that would send him there. Even if one exchanges self and other, there is no real exchange with sentient beings. Even when there is, it is completely exhausted, since there would be immense merit. Since the mentally exchanged sentient beings and oneself are both one's own mind, the suffering of others will not ripen within us, and our own happiness will not go forth to others. Thus, it is taught that no karmic effect is transferred. The Hundred Actions says: {{594.5}}

What is done by oneself is not transferred to others.
And the karma of others likewise is not ours.
If the share collected by one were to be effective spyod
Sentient beings would be obscured by darkness.

As for evil deeds, since they are not virtuous roots, it is not suitable to dedicate them as a cause. Other than the lower realms and suffering, they are not the cause of anything else.

The Lung says: {{595.1}}

These virtuous roots are dedicated to unsurpassable enlightenment.

From that, it is therefore taught that the roots of evil deeds are not dedicated to unsurpassable enlightenment. Therefore, virtuous causes are what is dedicated by aspiration, and though this is done, unsuitable causes are not also dedicated, just as space is not dedicated to enlightenment. Therefore, do not think in such a way, and if this should not even be heard, what need to speak of proclaiming a view that accords with it? As purifying and augmenting will be explained below, they are not elaborated here.

c. How one should rely on mindfulness and awareness,

In this way, day and night:

Always mindful, ever-aware, and being careful,
I will abandon what is unwholesome, creating an ocean of virtue.

Thus by those three meanings, the chief of disciplines is guarding one's own mind from the assembly of kleshas. Moreover the mind should be guarded by mindfulness, awareness, and, carefulness. Here by being mindful of their beneficial qualities and disadvantages of their degeneration one will not be harmed, and by remembering one's own essence, should not be allowed to degenerate. Like the string of a tensed bow, its being just so is very important. Why so? If mindfulness and awareness degenerate, the wholesome degenerates, and the non-wholesome easily arises in an instant. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.27 {{596.1}}

The bandits of non-awareness are following
After the degeneration of mindfulness;
Though merits have been fully accumulated,
As if they were snatched away by a thieves and robbers,
One will have to go to the lower realms.

As for the kleshas, this pack of thieves and robbers,
They are seeking their chance to get to us.
When they have found their chance, they ravish virtue.
Even lives of the higher realms are overcome.

Therefore we should keep hold of our mindfulness
Never letting it go to turn into somewhere else.
If it has gone, there will be harms of the lower realms.
Thinking of that keep a close track on mindfulness.

Mind should be guarded with completely pure awareness of discipline, its beneficial qualities, the disadvantages of its degeneration, the faults and virtues of samsara and nirvana, and so forth. For example, older generations of the world by being aware of many good and bad natures, put aside evil actions and entered into good ones and likewise into the Dharma. By being aware of all virtuous aspects day and night, they actually established them. Within their three gates they examined virtue and non-virtue as they arose, and counted the little pebbles of these. Putting aside non-virtue and entering into virtue, they guarded awareness. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.18

The situation of the body and mind
Ought to be examined over and over again.
Just doing this, to tell the situation briefly,
Is the definition of guarding one's awareness

Thus mindfulness and awareness are what is chiefly guarded. The same text says: 5.23 {{{597.1}}}

As for those of you who wish to guard the mind,
Guard your mindfulness and likewise your awareness
Even if in doing so you lose your life.²⁸⁷
I thus join my palms in my beseeching you.

Also guard the mind by being careful.²⁸⁸ With self-control comes, there is self-respect²⁸⁹ in not producing the kleshas. Having had to be ashamed before others, one is conscientious about guarding against non-virtue. These two have the essence of carefulness, and by that one guards against the kleshas.

Moreover, by being careful there is elimination of the kleshas and the virtuous activities of liberation. The Compendium of Abhidharma says:

What is carefulness? When having tried to live with non-passion, non-aggression, and non-ignorance, we meditate on virtuous dharmas, and guards the mind against all defiled dharmas, we possess the karma that completes all the perfections and fully establishes them.

If carefulness exists, all goodness and virtue will be established. If it does not exist, they will not. It is also taught to be the root of all the dharmas of buddhahood.

The Spiritual Letter says: {{598..}}

Carefulness is the place of amrita. Without that care,
It is taught that one achieves the place of death.
Therefore, in order that virtuous dharmas may increase,
Always act devotedly with carefulness.

The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

Generosity, discipline, and likewise patience and so on,
As many virtuous dharmas as anyone may mention,
The root of all of these virtues is this carefulness.

The Sutra Requested by Jewel-Crown says:

What is carefulness? It is just that which establishes virtuous dharmas. By the carefulness of the bodhisattvas, the essence of enlightenment is made beautiful. It is the root of the dharmas of enlightenment. It is the place of the dharmas that establish wisdom. The main support²⁹⁰ {{598.4}} of virtuous dharmas is individually grasped. Formerly heard dharmas do not go to waste.²⁹¹ Dharmas that should be gathered are gathered. Dharmas of obscurity are not gathered.

Thus if mindfulness, awareness, and carefulness are not accomplished, what we have formerly heard degenerates. Though mere faith, hearing, and effort exist, they are covered with fallen muddiness. Since they are impure, there is no liberation from samsara and the lower realms. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.25 {{598.e}}

For one who has a mind without awareness,
Hearing, contemplating, and meditating
Will be like water in a leaky vase.
They will not remain in memory.

Even in those who have heard any things,
Faith, and any genuine perseverance
Will be transgressed like falling in the mud
If there is the error of non-awareness.

On all occasions examine the mind, and whatever distractions there may be, if we have to enter into them, what is on the side of virtue and accords with that, with its retinue, we sincerely devote ourselves to its proliferation, and that non-virtue should not increase. When the virtuous exists alone, dhyana and so forth will enter into absolute virtue, and produce equanimity without remainder. Whatever and wherever something is to be produced, other than that many imperfections should not also be entered into. This is because they are hindrances to establishing that.

Thus, at the time of generosity, even if there is supreme discipline, except for merely not transgressing it, effort in it is rested in equanimity, and we must put our effort into generosity. At such times, giving and hindering by knowing how to distinguish higher and lower is important. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.42-4

Thus at the times of generosity,
Let discipline rest in equanimity.

Whatever is intended, act on that.
Do not think of anything other than that.
By always thinking of that very thing
It will in a little while be accomplished.

In that way all good will be produced.
Otherwise neither one will be accomplished.

The *Tsanaka*²⁹² says:

If with the former unfinished, one practices another,
One will be exhausted and neither will be produced.
If we do not keep one foot set steadily,
Lifting the other will be a cause of falling down.

The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.83

For the sake of the small, do not lose the great.
Chiefly think of the benefit of others.

The Compendium of Instructions, Shantideva's commentary says:

A medicinal tree must always be kept alive. If it is alive, it will be associated with benefit for others. Just so, this body should be kept and not given up, until one attains the bhumis of the noble ones. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.87

Because of impure notions of compassion
The body should not be lightly given up.

In such cases, small virtue may be accomplished, but if former great virtue is lost, the lesser will also be left behind. As the virtues of the paramitas are trained in and gathered they become progressively more and more exalted. As the higher are produced, the lower are made into equanimity. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.83

The paramitas of generosity and so forth
Are progressively more exalted than the last.²⁹³

The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Though some person with a joyful mind
Gives generously for even a hundred years,
One who keeps pure discipline for a day
Is much nobler than that other person.

Guarding by knowing the proper occasion is important. Moreover, the details of daily Dharma practice and details of eating food and so forth, and actions of conduct should be briefly told. First, on arising, rise after remembering the three jewels and bodhicitta, if even in dreams we have done evil deeds, they should be confessed right away, and if there was virtue, that alone should be rejoiced in. This is because both day and night the habitual patterns of mind are the same. The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Shariputra, if one meditates daily on the perfection of prajna, it will increase. By meditating in dreams, it will also increase. This is because daytime and dream are without distinction.

Then with the previously taught liturgy take the vow of arousing bodhicitta. The aspects of day and night should not deteriorate at all, so that they will be enhanced and increased. Then whether or not we want food, remembering the three jewels, offer one of the four parts. One is left to be given to those who may unexpectedly arrive. One pinch and so forth is offered as a torma. One part is eaten by ourselves. Also one part may be given to the three jewels, one to the protectors, and one to ourselves. The leftovers are offered to bhutas who are able to receive them. The Compendium of Action says:

Food should be divided in four parts.
The first is offered as pure food for the gods.
After that one to the guardian protectors.
Very large tormas are to be presented.
Remaining from one's personal food and drink
The leftovers are given to the bhutas.

According to what is taught in the vinaya of the holy Dharma, of three parts the first is offered to the three jewels, the second left for monks, brahmins or kshatriyas who may happen to come by, the third one enjoys.

At the time of eating, eat with the attitude that food is unclean, the attitude of sadness, and the attitude that one is benefiting a city of the family of worms and that for a little while one should dwell in a great ship crossing to the essence, enlightenment. However, do not eat with any attitude that increases desire and greed.

Also of the four parts of the body, one is empty, two are food, and one is drink. The Eight Aspects says:

Two parts are food that is eaten
One part is said to be drink
One part is of air and so forth.
Those complete the four parts.

Or also according to its arising from the basis of food, there are three parts, two of which are food and drink, and one of which is empty. If there is starvation, a host of worms will harm one, certain illnesses will arise, and one will not be able to undertake actions. If one is very full, in consequence many illnesses will arise, and it is said that there are the faults of samadhi becoming unworkable and so forth. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.85

One should eat no more than what is sufficient

That is how one should eat. Then the subsequently-impermanent mind establishes the dedication of food. As explained in the scriptures:

The patron king and
The host of other beings, also living in cities
May they always gain happiness.

Then if one is going somewhere, looking ahead just a yoke's distance to examine the path for living beings, one's mind will not be deceived. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

Look for just a yoke's distance, and in going one's mind will not be confused. Also look with eyes cast down and if someone comes smiling say, "It is good." At dangerous times look in all directions. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

As for giving in to useless distraction,
We should never aimlessly look around.
Keeping my mind always true and resolute
We should always keep the eyes cast down.

However simply for the sake of comfort
Sometimes one should look to the directions.
If some²⁹⁴ should then appear before one's eyes.
One should look at them and bid them welcome.

To watch for dangers on the path and so on
Look again and again to the four directions.
For comfort, having turned the head around,
One should look and check the path behind.

Having examined both before and behind,
One should proceed and either come or go.
Thus on all occasions one should act by because of having knowledge of what should be done.

Then, sitting under trees and so forth, perform what is good, meditating, reading, and so forth. Sometimes if one wants to listen to the Dharma, one should see noble persons. Never speak haughtily and roughly. One should speak as is taught in the Moon Lamp

Before a great being like you, how could I not be confident. You have great prajna.

That and so forth is how one should speak. If someone wants to hear the Dharma, it is explained that we should examine whether they are a vessel. If great things are explained to those of small mind, they will abandon Dharma and go to the lower realms. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

When they hear, those of small mind will abandon.
Having abandoned, they will be without refuge,
They will go to the unremitting Hell.

Likewise small things should not be told to great people. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.90

Those who are suitable vessels of the vastest Dharma
Should not be joined to teachings meant for lesser beings.

Explaining the Dharma to a woman alone without a companion is inimical to pure conduct, and one will become the object of slander. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.89

Nor to a woman without some other person there.

The White Lotus says:

The wise, when at any time
They explain the Dharma to women,
Should not go alone.
They should not stay and joke.

Moreover the path of conduct should not be explained to those who do not respect it and so forth. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.88

Do not explain the Dharma to those with no respect.
To those who wrap the head, like people who are sick
Who carry a sword or staff, or have a parasol
Or anyone who wears a hat upon the head.

Then in a spacious place ornamented with lion thrones and so forth, without personal desire for respect, veneration, and so forth, one explains the Dharma with an attitude of benefiting others. The White Lotus says:

In a clean and pleasant place, on a spacious seat,
Excellently arranged and carefully-spread,
Well painted with the finest excellent colors,
Well-dressed, wearing a good clean Dharma robe,
Always without the least desire for these,

Eating and drinking any food and drink,
Not having a wish for one's clothes and for one's seat,
One's robe, and medicines for curing sickness,
Not receiving anything from one's retinue,

Skillful in respect to others, may I always Establish these sentient beings in buddhahood.
To benefit the world, may I think of the Dharma,
As the total requisite of my happiness.

That is how it should be done. Whatever sorts of persons one meets with and whatever they say kill pride and without disrespect smilingly give the teachings in pleasant speech. The Moon Lamp says:

Smiling like the waxing moon and gentle
To the older generation and the younger
One should always speak with sincerity.
And be without pride in everything that is done.

The pleasant conversation of the world
One should speak properly in a timely way.
A variety of distracting words of chatter
Because of fear one never ought to speak.

Pleasant speech and praise may be used when without loss for oneself they make the minds of others happy. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

To all of those that we hear who may have spoken well
We should tell them so and say to them "well said!
If one sees persons performing meritorious actions, praising them creates supreme and excellent joy.

If they are hidden, good qualities should be spoken of.
And if they are spoken of, we should repeat that later.
If someone talks about our own good qualities,
Think that virtue in general is known and understood.

All undertakings are done so that we can be happy
This is rare for even those who have the price.
In view of that, let us be happy at finding joy
In any virtuous deeds that may be done by others.

Nothing will be lost by acting in this way,
And in the coming life we have great happiness.
But faults will make us here unhappy and miserable
And in the life to come we have great suffering.

When speaking we should be relevant and to the point
Keeping the meaning clear and speaking with pleasing speech.
We should have abandoned both passion and aggression
Speaking softly and only for a moderate time.

Then by this rejoicing, excellent ones are perceived as teachers, middling ones as companions, and lesser ones as retainers, old ones as fathers and mothers, young ones as children. Those of the same age are perceived as brothers and so forth, and by that they are made devoted. The Sutra of the Ten Dharmas says:

By body, speech, and mind being separate from receiving evil topics perception is produced of the preceptor as teacher. Perception of the preceptor as master is produced. Behaving purely for the older, middle, and young generations, they are so perceived, and devoted reverence is produced.

Generations of Beings says:

Holy ones will never pamper their bodies.

The spiritual friend relies on a gentle manner.
If one is near them a particle of their virtues,
Even if one does not practice, is established.

Hidden transgressions and subtle improprieties should not be done. The same text says:

As for unseen evil deeds that may be done,
As with poisonous food, how will there be happiness?
That by the gods and the purified eyes of accomplished yogins
These will not be seen is quite impossible.

Thinking how the freedoms and favors are so difficult to obtain and how the arising of a buddha is difficult and so forth, be conscientious. The Sutra requested by Guarder of the Horizon says:

A buddha, a great sage who benefits the world
Only arises once in a thousand million kalpas,
Now that they have attained the holy freedoms and favors,
Those who want liberation should abandon unconscientiousness.

This body, to guard the Dharma, should be guarded from sickness and dōns. Thinking of it as a ship, do not reject its food, clothing, and so forth. We should not torture ourselves with useless mortifications and ascetic practices. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.70

Even as a mere support of coming and going
The body should be thought of as being like a ship.
In order to establish benefits for beings,
The body must become a wish-fulfilling body.

The Four Hundred says:

Though this body indeed is seen as an enemy,
Properly regulated, it lives for quite a long time.
From that a large amount of merit can be attained.

Also it is impermanent and the mind that aspires to enlightenment should be produced. The Expression of the Realization of the Seven Princesses says:

Samsaric bodily life is a dewdrop on the grass.
If one is long accustomed to not depending on it,
One will always attain the state of mahasukha.

Life is also guarded because of its bestowing wealth. For the sake of the great Dharmas of arousing bodhicitta and so forth, life must be guarded without deprivation. The Sutra of Instructions to the King says:

By me, the bestower of wealth, the body, is guarded.
Bestowing wealth and the body, life is guarded.
Bestowing wealth and body, as well as life,
The Dharma especially is to be guarded.

The mind should be examined. By eliminating faults that are seen, the kleshas will not become firmly entrenched. The Request of Bhrama says:

If one completely knows the faults of mind,
The faults of mind will not be stabilized.
If mindfulness is good within the mind,
One will attain the place of faultless peace.

Moreover, a tooth stick, spit, excrement and so forth should be disposed of in a solitary place not frequented by people, where it will be inconspicuous. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.91

Personal refuse such as tooth cleaning sticks and spit
Should not be thrown away where they will be visible.
It is vulgar for persons to urinate and so forth
In water or on good land that is used by other people.

The Vinaya also teaches that defiled things should not be thrown away in usable water and so forth. Also at mealtimes, the Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.91

We should never eat with a mouth that is full of food, Noisily, or with talking, or with an open mouth.

Wherever we are, and particularly with the guru or among many people, indecorous bodily behavior, sleeping, lying, strutting the soles of one's feet forward, rubbing one's hands together, and so forth, should not be done. Be straightforward. Everything should be done gracefully. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.92-3

One should not stretch the soles of the feet toward other people,
And likewise not rub the hands together in their presence.

One should never travel lying in a bed
Nor be alone with women who are committed to others
Having seen and asked the conduct the world approves,
One should abandon anything that will be offensive.

Sloppy worship, laughing at the view, flirting, and all such unpacified aspects of body, speech, and mind should above all be completely controlled and tamed. The Flower Garland of Vinaya says:

Songs, and dances, and jingling ornaments,
Any seeing and entering into them
As well as the evil of having directly transgressed,
Are causes of straying from the life of discipline.

So doing necessarily leaves one far from enlightenment. The Sutra Requested by the Guardian of the Horizon says:

Uncontrolled, and wild and arrogant;
Disrespectful and proud, with much desire;
With rigid kleshas and overcome by them,
Such people are far from supreme enlightenment.

As those who do not tame themselves cannot tame others, first we should make ourselves peaceful and tamed. The Compendium of Limitless Good Qualities says:

Some, while they have not tamed themselves speak the words of noble enlightened beings. Acting in contradiction to their own words, they cannot tame others. When we have realized this, placing all beings in our hearts, we should try a little to tame what is untamed in ourselves.

The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Those who have not crossed cannot bring others across.
Those who are not liberated cannot liberate others.
Those who are blind cannot show the path to others.
Those who are liberated can liberate other beings.
Those with eyes can show the path to those who are blind.

The Ten Dharmas says:

Just as I make an effort so that all sentient beings may cross over, make an effort so that all sentient beings may be liberated, make an effort so that all sentient beings may enter into peace and gentleness; since by not taming, pacifying, and guarding myself, this will not be my lot, I should be pacified, tamed, and guarded.

Similarly, if by others benefit is received and harm arises for myself, let it be a cause of good karma and enlightenment. Among all like one who endures sadness and weariness from others by producing a very humble mind or outcast-like {{612.2}} perception, become gentle, do what needs to be done, and remembering all that is said, be heedful and conscientious. Disparaging others and behavior because of desire and aggression should not occur even in dreams. Daily, morning, noon, afternoon, and night, and again late at night, at midnight, and early in the morning, there should be threefold accumulation of prostrations, confession of evil deeds, and dedication of merit. Train in chanting the Three Accumulations,²⁹⁵ and confessing falling away from enlightenment. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.98

Three times in the day and also three at night
Chant The Sutra of the Three Accumulations.

Moreover in all actions and behavior one should spend one's time in virtue alone. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

As in the activities of the buddha sons
They formerly entered into the various realms of the senses,
Just so by words according with my family,
What they formerly did for beings I too shall do.

That is the idea. It is taught extensively in the *Completely Pure Realization of the Flower Garland of Buddhahood*²⁹⁶:

When bodhisattvas enter into a house, they arouse bodhicitta, thinking "May all sentient beings attain the city of liberation." Similarly, When they go to sleep, they attain the dharmakaya of the buddhas. When they dream, they realize that all dharmas are like a dream. When they awake, they awaken from ignorance. When they arise, they attain the body of buddhahood. When they kindle a fire, the fuel of the kleshas is burned. When it blazes, the fire of wisdom blazes. When they move, they attain the amrita of wisdom. When they eat food, they attain the food of samadhi. When they go forth, they are liberated from the city of samsara. When they descend stairs, they are entering samsara to benefit sentient beings. When they open a door, they open the gates to the city of liberation. When they shut a door, they shut the gates of the lower realms. When they set out on a path they tread the path of the noble ones. When they go upwards, they bring all sentient beings into the happiness of the celestial realms. When they descend, they cut the continuity of the three lower realms. When they meet sentient beings, they meet buddhas. When they step forward, they are going to do benefit for sentient beings. When they lift sentient beings,²⁹⁷ they are bringing them out of samsara. If they see persons who possesses ornaments, they will attain the major and minor marks. If they see persons without ornaments, they will possess the qualities of purity. If they see a full vessel, it is filled with buddha qualities. If they see an empty one, faults are emptied. If they see people rejoicing, they will rejoice in the Dharma. If they see them sad, they will be sad about compounded things. If they see happy sentient beings, they will attain the happiness of buddhahood. If they see sufferings, all the sufferings of sentient beings will be pacified. If they see sickness, there will be liberation from sickness. If they see returning of kindness, they are returning the kindness of all the buddhas and bodhisattvas. If they see it is not acknowledged, they are not acknowledging wrong views as kindness. If they see disputes, they can eliminate all the disputes of the fathers. If they see praise, all the buddhas and bodhisattvas are praised. If they see discussions about the Dharma, the confidence of the buddhas is attained. If they see bodily form, they see all the buddhas without obscuration. If they see a stupa, they become a stupa for all sentient beings. If they see merchants, they will attain the seven aryan riches.²⁹⁸ If they see homage, they arouse bodhicitta, thinking, "May the world along with its gods attain the non-manifestation of the center at the crown of the head."

Moreover, for all who are uselessly disturbed, with sadness and fickleness of mind, doodling in the sand, babbling, thinking discursive thoughts and so on, when distractions arise, until they have abandoned these by mindfulness and awareness, may all the actions of body and speech and the thoughts of mind be caused to become Dharma. When they go to sleep at night, lying on the right side, may they sleep with their heads in a northerly direction. Remembering death and recollecting the three jewels, may they sleep resting their minds in dharmata like the sky. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.96

As the Lord slept, passing into in nirvana,
So should we sleep in the desired direction.

Day and night aspire to the activities of the excellent noble ones, or sing the meditation songs of the masters, the Seventy Aspirations and so forth, performing them before statues, stupas, and so forth. Here as to what is taught by the "Twenty Verses" The Precious Mala says: {{616t}}

- 1 To the Buddha, the holy Dharma, and the sangha,
And also to the assembly of bodhisattvas
Always paying homage and going to them for refuge,
Let us prostrate to those who are worthy of veneration.
- 2 We should bring evil deeds to a state of total extinction
Completely accomplishing all that is meritorious
As for the merits of the host of sentient beings
We should rejoice in any merits that they have.
- 3 Having bowed our heads and joining our palms together, 616.2
For the sake of their turning the wheel of the Dharma
And so that they will remain among beings in this world,
We therefore make supplication to the perfect buddhas.
- 4 By the merits of having performed this liturgy
Whether it is performed or not performed by me
As a result may sentient beings without exception
Possess the unsurpassable attitude bodhicitta.
- 5 May sentient beings have perfect spotless faculties
Their lives transcending any lack the excellent freedoms
And have complete control over all their actions
And be well nourished having all their needs fulfilled.
- 6 May all embodied beings abiding in the three realms
Have jewels in their hands as a sign of ultimate wealth
May all the requisites be utterly limitless
And in samsara may they be inexhaustible.
- 7 Always having all that is indispensable
May they become supreme and turn into excellent beings.
- 6 May embodied beings have all the required knowledge
And the ability to do what must be done.

- 8 May they have excellent color, and excellent healthy bodies.
May they be exalted and brilliant in their presence,
May they be without any illness and suffering,
And may they have tremendous power over life.
- 9 May they all be capable in the ways of upaya,
Free from any kind of fear of suffering,
May they be diligent in relation to the three jewels,
And possess the great wealth that is the Buddha and Dharma.
- 10 May they be joyfully kind and very compassionate
Resting all the kleshas in equanimity,
Adorned with generosity and discipline,
Along with patience, exertion, meditation, and prajna.
- 11 May they completely perfect the two accumulations.
May they be glorious with the major and minor marks.
As well as the ten bhumis, which are beyond conception;
May they attain the various powers and masteries.
- 12 May we and other sentient beings, whoever they are
Be adorned by virtues such as these above,
And be liberated from all our various faults
Like the kind and excellent being known as Maitreya.
- 13 May we be the hope of every sentient being.
Completely having perfected all good qualities;
And always may we have the power to clear away
The suffering of all embodied sentient beings.
- 14 In all the various worlds whatever beings there are
Who are afraid of anything, may all those beings
Who even hear so much as the sound that is our names
By having done so, later become completely fearless.
- 15 May beings by seeing us and by remembering us
And even by their only having heard our names
Be sure of the natural state that is free from all disturbance
And so attain complete and perfect enlightenment.
- 16 And in all succeeding generations of beings
By means of having gained the five-fold higher perceptions.
Always for any sentient beings that there may be May we continue to do such benefits as these.
- 17 Whatever beings there may be within the world of samsara
Desiring the performance of any evil deeds
Nevertheless may even these be without harm, Reversing evil action once and forever after
- 18 The physical elements, earth and water, fire and air,
Are like a field full of health-giving medical herbs
Or a forest of trees that grows in the wilderness.
They ceaselessly provide what people naturally want.
- 19 Though the lives of sentient beings are impoverished
May I become even poorer by making this exchange:

May their evil deeds all ripen in myself.
May all my share of happiness ripen in other beings.

- 20 All the sentient beings who remain in the world of samsara
Who are not liberated, may as many as that
All without exception be completely transformed Attaining the unsurpassable state of enlightenment.

Saying this three times, three times a day brings inconceivable merits. The Bodhicharyavatara says

Therefore, in the presence of a representation
Or otherwise as it may be appropriate,
Say these twenty verses from the Precious Mala
Three times every day and three times every night.

Also this was taught by the Buddha Bhagavat:

If the merit of saying these words were given form,
As for being more numerous than the sands of the Ganges
Even the realm of the world could not contain it all.

Moreover as the sutras and the Bodhisattvapitaka say, devote day and night to training. Why? The dreamlike freedoms and favors are only there for an instant. They are impermanent like a bubble in water. If while we have them we do not set out on the path, we cannot do so later.

7. The explanation of the twenty downfalls, together with the associated qualities:

Train in keeping these two bodhicittas without harm.
Five downfalls like wrong view are said to be like a king.
Five like staying in cities are like his ministers.
Eight are like his subjects, and two are common to all.
Altogether, twenty is the number of these.
It should be known that what accords with these is harmful.
Not having them, one avoids the harm of these downfalls.
It should be known that practicing this accords with goodness.

This follows the Essence of Space Sutra, where altogether nineteen root downfalls are taught. The five characterized as being like a king, are: 619.4

- 1 appropriating the property of the three jewels,
- 2 inflicting punishment of a monk who possesses discipline,
- 3 drawing a renunciate away from discipline,
- 4 committing one of the five inexpiable actions, and
- 5 holding to wrong views.

Those which are characterized as being like a minister are staying in

- 1 villages,
- 2 their vicinity,
- 3 cities,
- 4 towns and
- 5 their environs.

The eight characterized as ordinary are

- 1 teaching emptiness to those of untrained mind,
- 2 turning back from dwelling in the mahayana

- 3 having abandoned individual enlightenment, to join the mahayana, 4 to fixate the shravaka and pratyekabuddha vehicles and enter into fixation
- 5 for the sake of possessions and veneration to praise oneself and disparage others;
- 6 and to speak of one's own profound patience.
- 7 to cultivate and take the property of the three jewels
- 8 to give the wealth of shamatha to recitation.

As for those common to all, abandoning the mind of entering makes nineteen, on top of which The Edifice of the Three Jewels says abandoning the mind of entering, not uniting with the wholesome, making twenty. The Moon Essence Sutra and the Akashagarbha Sutra also explain abandoning the mind of entering as a downfall.

If these downfalls arise, since this is unsuitable for a bodhisattva, one should try to remedy them. In the Twenty Vows four root downfalls are taught:

- 1 For the sake of possessions and veneration praising oneself and disparaging others,
- 2 To those who are suffering and without a protector not giving goods and dharma because of miserliness;
- 3 not hearing confessions storing up anger,
- 4 Abandoning the mahayana and teaching a facsimile of Dharma.

The four root downfalls, they are intended being like being conquered.

By desire of possessions and veneration
Praising oneself and disparaging others,
And those who suffer without a protector
Stingily not giving wealth or dharma
Not hearing confessions of other people
But rather heaping up anger at others,
Leaving the path of mahayana
Teaching facsimiles of the Dharma.

{{621.2}}

According to the teacher Asanga and his followers, four root downfalls are explained and also the manner of receiving bodhicitta is explained as arising from pure mind, depending only on homage and offerings, first by asking whether one's being has been defiled with obstacles, they will have very little ripening, and later one says the precepts,

If any of the four root downfalls have arisen, the way of remedying them is that the twenty vows should be taken again, during which ones defilements should be confessed three times to one's superiors before one. So it is maintained. This should not be accepted more than three times, as it is explained in the Bodhisattvabhumi.

The followers of the master Nagarjuna explain the way of receiving as karma arising in pure continuum, producing the seven limbs. The ocean-like assembly does not ask about former obstructions and does not talk about later training. What is to be guarded against is the nineteen or twenty root downfalls.

The way of remedying in the Akashagarbha Sutra is that after supplicating, one remedies them. This is done as many times as the downfalls received. As for these two traditions, the mind only and madhyamaka are different.

Now the associated factors are explained. As for the factors associated with these downfalls, for example, associated with wrong view is the obscuration of mere devotion. From this fault, one should have the idea of them all. The virtuous attitude and so forth that abandon wrong view are said to be without the fault. By not being obscured by the association, one is also said to be without the fault. All that is associated with virtue is said to be what one should train in. In particular what is connected with benefiting others is the real thing that should be trained in.

8. The individual ways of guarding aspiring and entering,

a. The way of guarding aspiring has two sections.

1) The brief teaching

Now the individual ways of guarding aspiring and entering will be explained. Now as to how aspiring is guarded by accepting and rejecting, as many things as are to be trained in the details of those, in brief:

Briefly four black dharmas ought to be avoided.
Four pure white ones should earnestly be performed.

2) The extensive explanation,

a) The instruction to abandon the four black dharmas. {{ 622.5 }}

In detail, as for the first four:

These are the four black actions that are to be avoided:
Cheating any persons who are worthy of respect,
Feeling regret for things that should not be regretted,
Speaking unpleasant words to those who are holy ones,
Behaving deviously toward sentient beings in general.

Since these are the four black dharmas, they should be abandoned. The Edifice of the Three Jewels Sutra Requested by Kashyapa says:

Kashyapa, if one possesses these dharmas, bodhicitta will be forgotten. What are these four? Slandering the guru and those who are worthy of respect. Producing regret in others for things that should not be regretted. To bodhisattvas who have aroused bodhicitta speaking with the fault of an angry mind. Behaving deviously and deceptively to sentient beings.

b. The instruction to practice the four white dharmas

As for the four white dharmas:

These are the four white dharmas in which we should place our trust:
Relying on holy ones and giving praise to their virtues,
Encouraging sentient beings to do what is truly good,
Arousing the perception of the teacher within the children.
High-mindedly do goodness and benefit for beings.

Abandoning what is false has the ground of the virtue of benefiting sentient beings. As for producing perceptions of bodhisattvas as teachers, they become special companions on the path. Dwelling in the excellent thought of non-deception is symbolized by relying on the holy ones and praising them. This is the consequence of all virtues. As for establishing all sentient beings on the path of mahayana, having particular purity, first producing bodhicitta is urged. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says: {{624.1}}

Kashyapa, if one has these dharmas, bodhicitta will not be forgotten.

What are these four? Conscientiously not speaking falsely, producing perception of bodhisattvas as teachers, dwelling in the excellent thought of not behaving deviously and deceptively toward sentient beings, and truly establishing all sentient beings in the mahayana.

As for guarding by means of what is to be stabilized, the Shri Samadhiraja Sutra says:

O prince, if one has four perceptions, bodhicitta will be stabilized. What are these four? they are perception of true spiritual friends as buddhas, perceiving the Dharma taught by them as the path, perceiving those who practice it as companions on the path, and perceiving all sentient beings as one's only child.

b. Guarding the Mind of Entering

As for explaining the details of guarding the bodhicitta of entering:

Considering others' welfare as more important than ours,
This is the practice trained in by the bodhisattvas.
If they benefit others the seven evils of body and speech,
Are actually beneficial, when they can be performed,
However, the three of mind are never to be done.

and also:

By desiring peace and happiness for one's own benefit
Even goodness is a downfall for the buddha-sons.
For the benefit of others, even that which is evil,
Ought to be practiced, the Victorious One has taught.

There are three aspects.

- 1 One should learn to abandon what is to be abandoned.
- 2 One should learn to know what is to be known.
- 3 One should learn to practice what is to be practiced.

{{625.2}} Within the first is the way of guarding the mind from the root downfalls, the kleshas, and the fault of useless activity. From the four ways of training in knowing when to give and hinder, the first three were spoken of above. As for the last, if there is an opportunity of giving through the ten non-virtues of body and speech, if it will be for others' benefit, know that it should be done. The greatness of one's own virtue will not be obscured by that, and on top of that, having observed an occasion for the three increases mahasattvas should perform the seven non-virtues. What is the benefit? Minak Dunguchen,²⁹⁹ having seen many persons killed by selfish desire, the guide, by compassion, in order that there may be liberation from limitless samsara, seems to cut off life.

Some though there is wealth, by miserliness will not give.

When there is a time of famine, if it will save lives, for the benefit of both, what was not given by the rich is taken, to give to the poor.

The bhramin's child skar ma la dga' ba is tormented by the desires of others. By desiring the goal of reversing the certainty of death, wrong activity seems to be performed. In order that those who will certainly be killed may be liberated, there seems to be false speaking. Having deceived the companions of the evil-doer, for the purpose of reversing them from being led into the lower realms, there seems to be slander. In order to purify the suffering of those who have suffering, making up and telling various stories, or telling jokes, there seems to be frivolous speech. In order to reverse those who will certainly undertake evil deeds, they seem to speak harsh words. These things are done because the purpose is virtuous.

The three evil actions of mind, should never be done, because they are only bad. Though some say that there is an opportunity of doing them, the vow is total. Manjushri having reversed the first ones, by dwelling among the tirthikas, when he was taming Kuntu Gyu, he is taught not to have fallen into accepting the wrong views that arose, and though such a teaching is thus practiced, thus, by that in body and speech, to Kuntu Gyu he taught language with the rising of wrong view, but when wrong view arose in their minds, to these by and by he expressed the virtues of the three jewels, so how would this come about? Therefore he never performed these actions of mind.

Well by doing unvirtuous actions of body and speech, he transgressed. Isn't it like eating poison? Virtuous mind, as in mantra, by grasping poison is without fault. The Twenty Vows says:

If these are done with compassion and for the sake of kindness
It is virtuous mind and the act is without fault.

But the Objects of Mindfulness says:

Though it is taught that a sentient being who cuts off one life will be tormented for an intermediate kalpa in the ephemeral hells, and though it is taught that an evil deed is always done if one thinks that; because the Buddha's word is intended for the minds of sentient beings of different capacities, that sometimes one and sometimes many and sometimes certain and sometimes uncertain are taught should be known not to be contradictory.

The Praise of the Teachings says:

Because of what is given and what is being held back,
Sometimes the words to you are "it is one and certain."
Sometimes "it is not certain" also has been said.
Therefore these are not in mutual contradiction.

In such a way there is provisional meaning and true meaning. Having the intention and what should be known to have the four hidden intentions, is very much in contradiction.³⁰⁰

These divisions will be explained extensively below. As for training in the means of knowing knowables, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

As for any not known by the buddha sons,
Such knowables as these do not exist.

Contemplation and learning should be earnestly undertaken in the worldly topics or sciences, and whatever world-transcending dharmas there are. This is so that omniscience may be obtained. If one summarizes these, there are five divisions to keep track of; arts, crafts, the art of reasoning, the reasoning of Buddhists, and the reasoning of non-Buddhists. The same text says:

If there is no effort with the five topics of reasoning, Even the supreme noble ones will never be omniscient. Cut off other pursuits, strive for your own omniscience.

In particular when the details of the vow of training are known, it is very important to guard them. Moreover, in the way previously taught, downfall and non-downfall, associated qualities, what is to be trained in, and the reason why this is done should previously be known. There are twenty root downfalls. Because these downfalls are absent, we are joined to virtue and there is no downfall. Moreover when we enter into meaningless speech, entertainments, and so forth; if passion and aggression are produced, the fault of having kleshas will be produced. Even if these have been produced, when one enters there is no need to grasp them, and by mindfulness and awareness, meaningless kleshas are produced. If we enter into passionless for the sake of others, there is no downfall. If we enter into desire, there is the fault of that. It is associated with it. If one enters simply the joy of others, it is the same. One should learn, meditate, and so forth that the antidotes are impermanent. When one has seen transgressions, confess and renew the vow. For example, if for reasons not connected with virtue, we dig up the earth, we commit faults of uselessly cutting roots and so forth. If the same thing is done for the sake of virtue, there is no downfall. While we does not remember that it is useless, there is the associated fault of doodling in the sand. One should learn that this should be accomplished with mindfulness and awareness. Having remembered what is to be learned, it will be renewed, and our vow will be renewed. All actions of body, speech, and mind should be known to be joined to that. If there is transgression, from also knowing how to renew, if aspiration is transgressed it can be cured. Moreover, as for the conditions of transgression, discouragement, procrastination, and entering into other paths; as for discouragement, if we think that we cannot produce the benefit of others as we can one's own benefit, we get discouraged. As for the antidote, because we have attained the freedoms and favors at this time of arousing bodhicitta, discouragement is abandoned. As for the praise of confidence, the Mahayanasutralankara says: {{630t}}

Sentient beings become human
So that every measureless instant
They can try to gain perfect enlightenment.
So let us not be discouraged.

As for procrastination, not seeing the benefits of the path, and having seen the faults of asceticism, as an antidote to that, having been taught the benefits and joy of it, as for the instruction in patience, the Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.30

Therefore, having mounted the horse of bodhicitta,
Which clears away all weariness and discouragement,
One goes on from happiness to happiness.
Knowing bodhicitta, who could then despair?

If one grasps the paths of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas as being better than the mahayana, also one will be sent into them, so as an antidote, from the two meditations on transgression and benefit, as for the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas being far from perfect enlightenment the Manifestation of Enlightenment of Vairochana says

The paths of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas are eighty-thousand great kalpas away from the unsurpassable fruition.

As to the immeasurable benefits of the mahayana, the Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.29

As for this, because of the power of bodhicitta
Former evil deeds will completely be exhausted.
Because a heap of merits is accumulated,
It is nobler than the path of the shravakas.

The Precious Mala says: 630.6

There is no looking at the benefit for oneself
The benefit of others is joyful as one taste.
The arising place of virtues in the mahayana.

If mind is sent outward one is far from enlightenment, and the sufferings of samsara and the lower realms are immeasurable. As for the way of curing, before statues and so forth with remorse and repentance confess and take the vow. Also this arises by practicing as before. The number required is uncertain.

As for the method of remedying the bodhicitta of entering, conditions of defilement are three: the bodhicitta of aspiring is lost; The opposing root downfalls arise; the condition of abandoning training is offered.

As for the faults of defilement. If formerly accumulated merit manifests, by its being degraded later, we will have no happiness, we will not meet with the mahayana, and by breaking one's vow our place will become degraded. By the heaviness of defilement, we will wander for a long time in the lower realms. The Letter to Students says:

Those even when alone will truly examine their minds
Producing an association with genuine karma

On the earth, at the center they become principal holy ones.
These excellent students will respect the guru
Modest, producing a host of virtues, noble people.
Supremely motionless, they follow the view of kindness

For even those brilliant ones rejoicing in truth and tradition,
Life is easily lost and there are no promises.
For a while all beings have faults and evil deeds
That will send them all into unbearable hells
Throwing away the natural state, indeed they suffer.
For the wise on earth what suffering is worse than this?

Whoever receives the sages' life-granting Dharma path
Like a great ship, having received it, they throw it away again.
In the midst of the ocean of samsara like dancers
Think the deceptive thought that their joy is assured.

Therefore, the Bodhicharyavatara says:

Though merit is easily defiled
Mind is never defiled.

dge ba gzhan yang nyams bla yi sems ni nam yang nyams mi bya

If one breaks the session, if it is lost, with repentant mind having confessed as before by practicing the rite three times it will be renewed. The count is uncertain. By the mahasiddha Nagpopa three means of renewal are taught. Lesser ones by the power of grasping things as solid, having apprehended them in their minds, confess their faults before others. By subsequent vows, as they are gradually distanced from those faults, rising from the downfall occur.

The middle ones, having pleased the deities of vidya mantra and secret mantra, the bodhisattva Akashagarbha and so forth, having attained the blessing of the deity, arise from that downfall.

Some who are excellent, when someone says they have a downfall, remain effortlessly within bodhicitta. As to how, it is taught in the Noble Mahayana Sutra Teaching that all dharmas are Without Arising:

Manjushri, the bodhisattva who knows no-action and no-arising attains complete purity from karmic obscurations.

Here, "we should follow this" is well-thought. Those of inferior mind do so before the bodhisattva sangha or a special object. They supplicate having performed the seven-fold service, or should renew them, or supplicate such and such a mahasattva to consider them:

For I, so and so, such and such a downfall has arisen. This for the sake of all sentient beings, I confess and supplicate it be made pure.

Say this three times, and because of others:

These transgressions I see as transgressions and from now on I will control and vow well to avoid them 633.6

Let that be vowed. By saying that one is liberated from faults, according to the Bodhisattvabhumi. Also in between perseveringly doing the developing and fulfillment stages of the deity before their respective yidam deities, having done the seven-fold service, by confession and having retaken the vow, they remedy the downfall. Here the deity of vidya mantra in general is Shri Akashagarbha. If one wants to confess before him, one should confess continuously day and night. From the time one arises this is done. In the later part of the night to all the buddhas and bodhisattvas of the ten directions, and in particular Shri Akashagarbha, call by name and prostrate, and continuously speak out strong confessions of one's evil deeds of transgression. When dawn comes, say this:

Please do what I ask.³⁰¹ For Shri Akashagarbha, if I confess my transgressions, having purified them, by consider, quiet them and grant your blessings.

Say that three times. When the sun rises, in view of purity of transgressions, body and mind are happier than before, and even the sun arises more gently. The air is pure, and good dreams display themselves, so it is taught.

Some excellent beings, sitting cross-legged, first call by name whatever dream and illusion-like transgressions there are. In the space in front are the buddhas and their sons. After confessing to them, identify the essence of these very transgressions outer, inner, and in between, by having examined their color, shape, and so forth. They do not arise from anywhere, do not abide anywhere, and do not go anywhere. Knowing them to be in nature like space, resting within that state, one will be liberated from all transgressions. The Extensive Sutra of the Great liberation in the Ten Directions says:

If the bodhisattva has four dharmas, all will arise separated from degeneration of discipline and the faults of the kleshas. What are these four? Because dharmas have no coming, dharmas are ceaselessly seen, because dharmas arise interdependently through causes and conditions, and because they are empty of nature. If they have these four, there will be no arising of degeneration of discipline and faults of the kleshas

The Dharmaraja Sutra says:

One sentient being, if one knows non-duality, all obscurations will completely be abandoned. For example, as on a mirror with a thousand years accumulation of dust, there can later be not a particle, this too is like that. For example, in a dark empty house, dark for a thousand years, though darkness has lasted for a thousand years, a lamp will make it non-existent. So by the mind knowing the genuine truth of essencelessness, the evil deeds of countless kalpas will instantly be removed.

The Sutra of Entering into the Absolute says:

The son of the gods White Lotus asked, Manjushri, "How should karmic obscurations of be abandoned?"

He replied, "Son of the gods, as for karmic obscurations, if one knows that karma itself is primordially unreal, it will effortlessly be cleared away. That is like wiping with a cloth a conch that is covered by charcoal. These are guarded against by means of knowing their objects, it has been taught.

9. The teaching of the stages by which beings should practice this

Now, by means of practicing what is to be practiced, guarding is taught. From the two sections of the individuals by whom it is practiced and how it should be practiced, as for the first:

As for the buddha-sons, there are three kinds of them.
Those who have freed themselves and desire to free all beings,
These are the bodhisattvas, who are like a king.
Those who want liberation for both themselves and beings
These are the bodhisattvas who are like a helmsman.
Those who free beings and then desire their own peace
These are the bodhisattvas who are like a shepherd.
It is taught in the sutras that these are liberated,
In thirty-three measureless kalpas, in seven, or in three,

Respectively, in accord with their powers of gaining it.

This is called arousing the great desire of bodhicitta of a bodhisattva. After first having become enlightened ourselves, later we free beings; for example, as a king, having attained a kingdom, desires to establish his subjects in happiness. Arousing such bodhicitta like Manjushri is explained in many sutras.

The desire to liberate oneself and other beings equally is called "arousing the bodhicitta of true wisdom." The boat-passengers and oneself equally want to go to the other side of the river. First having liberated sentient beings, desiring to liberate oneself primordially, is called the arousing of bodhicitta of which there is no example. Shepherds of sheep, goats, and oxen, when they see narrow defiles and fearful places, or else when in front of them these have entered them, make every one come out again. This is arousing bodhicitta for sentient beings like that of Manjushri and Shakyamuni. Here those of dull powers take thirty-three and the middling seven, and the sharpest three lifetimes to perfect unsurpassable enlightenment. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Those arousing the bodhicitta of the great desire will be liberated from samsara in thirty-three countless kalpas. Those who arouse the bodhicitta of genuine wisdom will reach it in seven. By arousing the unexampled bodhicitta, they will become completely enlightened in three inconceivable kalpas. Why so? Because they have powers that are small, middling, and great. For example, they are like a universal monarch, the pilot of a ship, and a parent.

Thus, and so forth it is extensively taught.

10. from the two methods of training in what should be practiced, the activity of the victorious ones,

a. The brief teaching of the six perfections

The buddha sons must train themselves in everything,
But chiefly in the practice of the six perfections.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Generosity, discipline, patience, and exertion
And likewise the paramita of imponderable prajna,
By that treasury of powers of the Victorious One
One reaches the other shore of the ocean of samsara.

One trains in what is explained. From the common and individual natures, the common also has six parts.

Without conceptualizing the three spheres of actor, action, and object, the thought of giving one's possessions to another, along with the seed of virtue, is the perfection of generosity. Its action is to pacify the poverty of others.

Without conceptualizing the three objects, thoughts of abandoning the faults of samsara and nirvana, along with their seeds, are the perfection of discipline. Its action is to eliminate obstructions.

Without conceptualizing the three objects, bearing harm and weariness and not being afraid of their nature is the perfection of patience. Its action is aggressionlessness.

Without conceptualizing the three objects, joy in virtue is the perfection of exertion. The action is that merit increases.

Without conceptualizing of the three objects, one-pointed mind is the perfection of meditation. Its action is that the kleshas are pacified.

By not conceptualizing the three objects, realization of the nature of dharmas becomes the perfection of prajna. The action is that knowables are realized and, that one is liberated from samsara.

These paramitas have four virtues. By envisioning enlightenment as the benefit for others they are vast. By establishing true goodness and loftiness, they are precious. By transcending the world, they are without materialism. By the increase of merit, they are inexhaustible. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Vast and not materialistic,
Precious and inexhaustible,
Of generosity and the others
These four virtues should be known.

In three inconceivable kalpas or more depending on the first paramita, loftiness is established and the kleshas abandoned.
the count of six paramitas is fixed. The same text says:

Enjoyment and the body are both completely perfected.
By perfect acts and retinue one is elevated.
One never again will be in the power of the kleshas,
And anything one does will always be correct.

Second, in terms of doing benefit for others, with a view to accomplishing benefit for oneself, the count of six is fixed. The same text says:

Not impoverished and completely not injurious,
Patient with injury and not growing weary of action,
One has an excellent reason for one's feeling of rejoicing:
The benefit of others is one's own benefit.

Third from the viewpoint of the three trainings, as for the count of six paramitas being certain, the same text says:

Of the six paramitas of the Victorious One,
When they are classified from the viewpoint of the three trainings
The explanation is that the first has three divisions
The second has two divisions, and the third has one.
One includes all three, with three divisions described.

The first three are gathered under the training in supreme discipline. Generosity is the cause, discipline the essence, and patience the particular expression.

The next two are gathered under training the mind in meditation.

Prajna is gathered under the discipline of prajna.

Exertion alone gathers them all together, being associated with them all.

Describing them as being understood in stages, the same text says:

The later depend on the earlier
Since they are lower and higher,
And since they are fine and coarse,
They are taught to be in stages.

Since they arise in successive order from earlier to later, these are stages of cause and fruition. Since discipline is more excellent than generosity, there is a gradation from worse to better. The earlier they are, the coarser they are, and the easier to understand and realize. The later they are, the subtler and more difficult they are, so there are gradations of fine and coarse. They are described from those three viewpoints.

As for the way of practicing, practice generosity with no hope of complete ripening. Again and again in this samsaric realm guard discipline that does not aspire to the higher realms. To endure everything patiently, meditate on patience. Exertion gathers all these virtues together. Meditation eliminates ideas of the formless realms. Prajna should be established non-dually with upaya. The same text says:

Generosity without hope
Discipline not desiring Samsaric agitations.
Patience bearing everything,
Exertion gathering virtue,
Dhyana that is not formless,
Prajna possessing upaya,
These are the six paramitas.
By their stability
We are united with truth.

As for the ascertaining features³⁰² the same text says:

Removing poverty, obtaining coolness, and bearing anger,
Union with passionlessness, and grasping of the mind,
Are said to be done for the sake of knowing the absolute.

Removing poverty is generosity. Cooling the torments of the kleshas, and guarding against them is discipline. Forbearance of inner anger is patience. Union with the level of buddhahood is exertion. One-pointedly grasping mind is dhyana. Knowing the nature of dharmas, absolute truth, is prajna.

b. The extended explanation of the individual natures of the perfections,

1) Generosity,

a) Identifying the object,

Now from the six explanations of the individual natures, as for the nature of generosity:

Seeing that sentient beings are tormented by poverty,

b) The general teaching on the nature:

They give them limitless gifts of desirable articles,
Like food and clothing, horses, wagons and oxen.
Greater are such gifts as one's own sons and daughters.
But greatest is to give one's head and eyes and such.
This establishes worldly and spiritual benefit.

c) The benefits of generosity:

Thus we will conquer all our avariciousness.
Consequently giving rise to wealth for others.

Material generosity perfects the accumulation of merit and Dharma-generosity the accumulation of wisdom. Without avariciousness, the continuity of birth as a preta is cut off. Actual wealth arises for the benefit of others. The world of the noble ones is grasped. The Sutra Taught by Questions says:

By material generosity the accumulation of merit is perfected. By Dharma-generosity, the accumulation of wisdom is perfected. These two establish omniscience. What is material generosity? It is like this. There is giving, great giving, and supreme giving. Giving is of food, clothing, chariots, and elephants to others. Great giving is of sons, daughters, and spouses. Supreme giving is of things difficult to do. Heads, eyes, arms, legs and so forth are given.

What is Dharma-generosity? The lesser is giving pens, ink, and books. The greater is giving teachings, of the shravakas, of the pratyekabuddhas, or of the supreme Dharma, according to the fortunes of beings. To enter into grasping unsurpassable enlightenment and display the inconceivable Dharma like the sky is the supremely great.

Householder bodhisattvas practice chiefly material generosity, and renunciates Dharma-generosity. About this the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Bestowing benefits,
And depending on mind, the root,
Perfect both action³⁰³ and mind
Accepting these two and perfecting
While being without stinginess,
Giving dharma and things without fear.

Having known such generosity,
There is genuine accomplishment
For those who are capable.

The essence is being without miserliness. The cause is pure, generous thoughts. The fruition is perfection of body and enjoyment. The action is taking care of both oneself and others, and perfecting the two accumulations.

As for distinguishing the qualities, the same text says:

Buddha sons, when they meet with students, give even their lives.
Even if they receive compassion from other beings
They take no care of fruition of human hopes and wishes.
Generosity brings all beings to the three enlightenments.
By the wisdom of generosity having been perfected,
They are placed in the inexhaustible realms of purity.

2) Discipline,

1) Explanation of the nature and expression of praise

As for the explanation of the perfection of discipline, since externals are non-existent, the inner abides in enlightenment:

By controlling ourselves with the highest discipline,
Peace and happiness of mind will be attained.
By prajna we will gain perfection of the two benefits.

2) the brief explanation of what is to be trained in and the instruction to guard it:

The vows and accumulations of Dharma and benefiting beings,
Buddha sons will always guard these three disciplines.

3) The divisions of individuals who guard it and the explanation of the root as bodhicitta:

Householders take the precepts of a lay disciple.
Renunciates take the vows of monk, shramanera, or novice,
And the discipline of guarding both the two bodhicittas

Here, in addition to whichever of the seven pratimoksha, or self-liberation vows may be appropriate, there is the vow of the bodhisattva discipline, including vows of arousing the two bodhicittas of aspiring and entering. The single bodhisattva vow has no divisions corresponding with the seven families of personal enlightenment. Those seven families are the male and female genyens, getsuls, and gelongs, and the lay disciples. Counting male and female observers of the precepts for a day there are nine families. On the side of householders, the vows of genyen and day-precepts are divided into two. On the side of renunciates, there are getsuls, genyens, and fully ordained gelongs. It is said that on top of these the vows of arousing the two bodhicittas are possessed. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

As for those who dwell on the side of the renunciates,
They have an amount of virtue that is immeasurable.
With regard to householders industrious with their vows
They are more excellent than even those bodhisattvas.

That explains the renunciate bodhisattvas. The sutras say:

Householder bodhisattvas and renunciates,
Those who have the forms of females and of males
Supremely many billions and millions have one means.

Of the two kinds of genyens, as for genyens who observe a few precepts, there are the "root four genyens," who keep the four root precepts, and abandon wrong objects of sexual desire. Genyens of pure conduct, keep these basic four and also abandon impure conduct.

As for the getsuls, the Radiant says:

Renouncing cutting off life, and taking the goods of others,
Impure acts and false speech, alcohol and so forth,
Dances, garlands and such and sitting on high seats,
And receiving food, gold, or silver any time after noon,

Because of taking these ten precepts, the mind is also guarded from the associated faults.

For women there are also the twelve renunciation producing antidotes of not touching anyone and so forth. Since women have greater kleshas, they are studied for two years to see if they can keep their vows and if they are stable.

For gelongs there are four basic rules involving expulsion from the sangha, the additional thirteen precepts, and the thirty of abandoning, which if they are broken one must abandon the object involved and so forth, 253 precepts in all. Gelongmas, fully ordained nuns, have 364 or more. This is according to sarvastivadins, mahasangikas, sthaviras and many others in the collections that they individually revere regarding training in different disciplines. The Bhumi Collection says:

When in addition to the precepts of renunciation, they have those of arousing the bodhicittas of aspiring and entering without corruption, this is said to be bodhisattva renunciation. Those who have this discipline have a discipline that binds their being away from corrupting activity. This is called the precept of supreme discipline.

In terms of the merit of the attitude of renunciation these are together with Bön. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.11

Attaining the wish for renunciation of such things³⁰⁴
Is what is explained as being the perfection of discipline.

Restraining natural degrading activity, the vows of personal liberation³⁰⁵ bind non-merit. In samsara the gods must take human bodies in order to attain the happiness of the benefit for oneself. Not only do they not take care of others, but accomplishing benefit for them is only is taught within the bodhisattva discipline. As for mantra discipline, in addition, the karma and kleshas involved in ordinary grasping are abandoned, and in the two stages of meditating in the stages of development and fulfillment, one is made into a worthy vessel.

At the time of the vows of personal liberation there is no opportunity of properly committing faults of the nature of the ten non-virtues. In the bodhisattva vow seven can be committed to benefit others. Mantra depends on the skillful means of non-abandoning or non-renunciation. As fire arises from wood, this cause of the arising of wisdom is produced only by that profound path.

Within the continuum of a single being, the single essence exists with different aspects. If objects of choice occur simultaneously, the higher ones are preferentially guarded. The lower part is gathered into it. Though there seems to be complete contradiction with the lower part, the essence is not lost, and so there is no real contradiction.

For example, in tantric practice drinking is not a violation, even though drinking liquor is taught to be a downfall by the shravakas, and by the bodhisattvas said to be an associated fault. At that time, the object must not be consumed by the practitioner as a monk or bodhisattva. But when the deities are visualized, things change. Things must become intoxicating liquor. By mantra, mudra, and samadhi, they are transformed into amrita and one is supposed to enjoy them. Perceptions and thoughts must become many other things, transformed into perceptions of gods and mandalas. By their becoming amrita and faultless divine offerings, feast practice is perfected. By meditating with the accompaniment of view and samadhi, the good qualities become exalted, and in such a way the nature of these precepts will all be known.

In brief, however faults are produced, they are stopped. The good qualities if goodness is produced, are bestowed. Generally, to know this clearly by visualizing is very important. The Precious Mala says:

Generally it is done by visualizing
Therefore this is praised in all the shastras.

In brief, guarding the mind from harmful behavior for the benefit of others is the vow of discipline. By the two accumulations and the six perfections, an assembly of good qualities which have not previously arisen are produced. Increasing this arising is the discipline of gathering virtuous dharmas. They are chiefly gathered by discipline of mind. Those skilled in upaya, whether real or from one's mind, accomplish the benefit of sentient beings. By the four bases being gathered, others are made joyful, their situations uplifted, and good and virtuous seeds of ultimate certainty planted. Such caring for the happiness of others is the discipline of producing benefit for sentient beings.

By these three disciplines, the three disciplines of the path are accomplished. Having perfected the two accumulations, one becomes enlightened.

1) By the discipline of the vow, one attains perfect abandonment of the two obscurations and their habitual patterns. 2) By the discipline of gathering virtuous dharmas, perfect realization is attained of nature, extend, and so forth.

3) By the discipline of benefiting sentient beings, one attains perfect buddha activity, taming whatever needs to be tamed along with the spontaneous arising of the two benefits. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Kashyapa, this bodhisattva discipline has three aspects. There are the discipline of the vow, the discipline of gathering virtuous dharmas, and the discipline of accomplishing benefit for sentient beings. By the discipline of the vow, the mind is guarded from what is unwholesome. By the discipline of gathering virtuous dharmas, the virtuous roots are established. By the discipline of accomplishing benefit for sentient beings, one devotes oneself to the benefit of others.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

These six accomplish peace by having wished for it.
They will give the gift of life in the higher realms,
They are the supports of peace and fearlessness
By them one will possess the accumulation of merit.
One attains the nature of the symbolic signs.
One has the topics that are contained within the vow.
Having completely known a discipline like that,
Those who are capable will really establish it.

The essence has seven limbs. These are the topics of discipline. Bound by the vow of personal enlightenment, are

- 1). The perfect procedure
- 2). The sphere.³⁰⁶

Only the subtlest faults are viewed as topics of fear. The bases of the precepts are genuinely received. They are learned. So it is explained on the level of the shravakas.

- 3). As for the cause, it makes one attain peace, nirvana.
- 4). As for the fruition, one exists in the higher realms.
- 5). As for the action, it produces the support of all the good qualities. The kleshas are pacified and one is made fearless about oneself and others.
- 6). As for the good qualities, it possesses the accumulation of merit.
- 7). As for the divisions, there is that arising from receiving the harvest of genuineness, and that attained by dharmata. The first, is personal liberation. In attaining dharmata, both samadhi and spotless karma arise. There is the mind of actual samadhi and the path of seeing and so forth, the undefiled level of the noble ones. The Abhidharmakosha says:

It is called the vow of personal liberation
Spotlessness and samadhi will arise as a result.

These disciplines are undefiled. They are not changeable by downfalls. They are not mixed with the personal liberation of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas. The sutras are not lacking, since they are part of the mahayana. Having those four aspects, they should be produced as the support of good qualities. The Spiritual Letter says:

Your discipline is undefiled, and indeed not lacking.
Not mixed, and unchangeable, it is a pure reliance.
Discipline, whether at the levels of cause or causeless
Is taught as the ground and support of all good qualities.

As for these virtues of discipline, The Mahayanasutralankara says:

The buddha sons always receive discipline of the nature of the vow and effort. Though they have no desire for the celestial realms, they genuinely attain them even though they produce no desire for them. By this discipline, all beings are also established in the three enlightenments. By the wisdom of discipline being completely accomplished, they are inexhaustibly established in the pure realms.

3) Patience,

- a) the general teaching on the divisions,
{{652.3}}

Then as for the perfection of patience:

Three kinds of patience also need to be established.
One gives no thought to how much suffering is involved
In the various kinds of outer and inner injuries.
Because of compassion one has devotion to the Dharma.
Third there is that of compassion that has no reference point.

Not getting angry at harm or injuries produced by externals is the patience of fortitude. Enduring hardships in liberation and in establishing the dharma for oneself and others, this patience does not care how much suffering is involved.

Compassionate patience is being tireless in benefiting others.
Not being afraid of the profound meaning of emptiness is the compassion having no reference point of nature. As for the meaning of these, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

Fortitude knows but does not care how much it must bear.
As for compassion, patience depends upon that dharma.
As for the five benefits, they are truly explained.
They are the producers of the two benefits.

Having the main thing and all the ascetic practice
There is the patience that aspires to those three things.
When patience such as that has been completely known,
By the wise it is said that it is truly established.

The essence is not being angry with others and bearing adversity. The cause is compassion. The five benefits are the fruition. The sutras say:

- 1 There is not much resentment and discord.
- 3 There is much happy and blissful mind.
- 4 There is no regret at the time of death.
- 5 The body abides in peace,
- 6 and one will be born in the bliss of the celestial realms.

Their result is to produce benefit and happiness for both oneself and others. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

The buddha sons bear all the harms of human beings which is very hard to do. Since they cannot care for the celestial realms, they are not afraid of not going there, and do not care about their benefits. By that same patience they establish all sentient beings in enlightenment. By the wisdom of patience being completely accomplished, they place beings inexhaustibly in the pure realms.

b. The way of meditation

{{653.6}}

As for the brief teaching of meditating on patience:

Just as no greater evil exists than that of aggression,
No merits are so difficult as those of patience.
By strenuous efforts in these various kinds of patience,
Let us strive to quench the great fires of aggression.

The supreme good is enlightenment. Moreover, the merit established by patience is greater than others. The greatest suffering is hell. Since this is produced by aggression, and since there is no greater evil than that, by various means, it should be joined to austere meditation on patience. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.2 {{654.3}}

Just as there is no evil which is as bad as aggression,
No austerity is so difficult as that of patience.
Therefore it is proper that we should strive earnestly
Meditating on patience in various different ways.

The Spiritual Letter says:

There is no austerity like that of patience
Though we cannot do away with occasions of anger
By abandoning anger, there is irreversibility.
By this being attained, buddhahood is promised.

c) Many objects are tamed by taming mind alone

If each of many objects of anger has to be dealt with, it will never be accomplished and they will not be pacified. As for the means of bearing them:

The uncontrolled harm of things is entirely limitless.
We can never succeed in pacifying them all.
When mind alone is tamed, then everything will be tamed.
So guard the diligence of keeping mind subdued.

The Bodhicharyavatara says: 5.12 {{655.1}}

Unruly sentient beings are as limitless as space
It will never be that all of them are subdued;
But if thoughts of aggression alone have once been overcome
That will be like conquering all our enemies.

d) How harm is a condition of establishing patience:

The good of patience comes about depending on harm.
Such qualities as kindness and compassion rise.
Enemies, like teachers, are friends to enlightenment.
Rely on them patiently, feeling respect and joy.

Just as masters and preceptors are beneficial to renunciation, if one has no enemy, patience will not arise, and therefore we should put up with enemies. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.103-5 {{655.3}}

If we do not endure them in a patient way,
The cause of gaining merit will thereby be prevented.
It is only we who are our own obstruction
Hindering what is the cause of gaining merit.

That which if it there another comes to be.
that is the very thing which is called the other's cause,
That on whose occurrence something comes to be
How can that be called a hinderance to it?

The timely appearance of a beggar seeking alms
Does not produce a hindrance to generosity
Calling those who are bestowers of renunciation
Obstructions to it is equally unsuitable.

Times of harm, conditioned by minor suffering of unhappy mind and so forth condition the arising of compassion and sadness and so forth, and therefore we should bear them. The same text says: 6.21 {{655.e}}

Moreover as for the virtues arising from suffering,
By sadness, it clears away arrogant haughtiness
For those within samsara compassion will arise.
Evil is avoided and we rejoice in virtue.

Those without merit can attain it by meditating on bearing angry thoughts. They can feel joy in them and be devoted to them like the teacher. The Uttaratantra says:

With Joy and devotion like that for the teacher.

Also it says there:

Therefore if we have a completely angry mind
And patience arises only in dependence on that Since that is the very thing that is the cause of patience,
It is worthy of homage like holy Dharma itself.

e) The thought that the condition of anger arises from oneself.

This will never be accomplished without ourselves,
Just as an echo arises from mutual dependence.
This mass of terrible harms that one has turned to evil,
Proliferates due to karma and incidental conditions.
So it is to be expected that this would come about.
The only means by which this karma can be exhausted
Is taming the mind and therefore we should strive for this.

If we were not there, our anger and contention with others would not arise. Anger and contention mutually depend on each other. If we do not harm others, harm to ourselves will not arise.³⁰⁷ Therefore it is useless to do harm, and certainly it is proper to bear it. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.106

Thus if we do no harm to any other persons,
There will be no one who will then do harm to us.

Therefore not established with work and weariness
This is like a treasure appearing in our house.
As they are associated with enlightened activity
Then I should rejoice that I have enemies.

When some little condition to harm me is produced, that arises from my own former karma, and so it is proper to bear it. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.46

Being summoned to action by my personal karma,
Those who do harm to me arise within my life.

If I am angry, with what actually harms me, that materialistic anger is properly directed at sticks and so forth or at unpleasant words. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.41
657.4

Though actually it is done by the stick that he is using,
If it is to the user that I address my anger,
As he as well as I is motivated by anger
It is all the fault of anger--I should be angry at that.

In particular, if we are angry when unpleasant words are spoken by other people, not being angry at the inner source, one's own ear, but being angry at the external speaker is illogical, because it produces suffering. If one thinks like that, fame and praise are harmful, and drive us to the lower realms. Patience is the opposite. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.100

As for me who am devoted to liberation
I should not be bound by possessions and social position.
Why should I be angry at the very persons
Who are producing liberation from this bondage

When they wish for me to be in suffering,
It is actually like a blessing by the Buddha,
I will go by that to the level without outflows.
Why should I be angry at the occurrence of that?

Also: 6.103

If it is merely because of obstruction by my faults
That I will not be patient with this enemy
It is only I who will be hindering
That which is an occasion for and cause of merit

If harm is a prerequisite for patience, anger is not the right response. If harm comes from one's own karma, it is not the enemy that harms us. If it is nonexistent, even generosity will not help. Having let it go, everything becomes like waking from a dream. The limitless purposes of beings and harms of wealth are bondage. Again: 6.55

Since worldly possessions are producers of hindrance,
If I do not want these hindering blockages,
I should throw away these troublesome possessions
Lest the evil of my deeds be stabilized.

It is even better if I die right now.
There is no profit to living long in wrong livelihood.
Even if I should live for a very long space of time
There will always be the suffering of death.

Supposing that one person awakens from a dream
In which was experienced a hundred years of happiness,
And another person awakens from a dream
Having experienced happiness only for an instant.

For both these persons, who have woken from their dreams,
That happiness they dreamed about will not return.
Likewise whether life is either long or short
At the time of death it is over just the same.

Having great possessions, and great abundance of wealth
Even though I live happily for a very long time,
As if I were ravished by a conqueror
I shall go forth in nakedness with empty hands.

Being angry about being disparaged and insulted makes no sense. Fame is just words. Such words are mere material things without the least benefit. The same text says: 6.90

As for veneration and honor, praise and fame
Coming from these there is no merit and no life,
There will be no more strength, and sickness will not be absent.
Nor will the body be better off than it was before.

If we truly know what is to our benefit,
What is the benefit of things that are such as these?
If we want only a little nominal happiness,
Let us rely on gambling, liquor, and so forth.

The benefit of fame takes away one's wealth,
Or If we should be killed in the pursuit of honor
How will anything be done by these mere words?
If we die, then who will have that happiness?

If their castles of sand collapse and fall to pieces,
Children start to cry, hurt by the pain of that.
Thus when there is damage to my praise and fame,
My own mind is like the mind of a little child.

Some think that because of unpleasantness, there is anger. If we become angry and say unpleasant words, why not be angry at our own words? We may wish to say them, but nothing requires us to be angry because others are arrogant. Since we are unhappy, anger that our own mind is angry is what is suitable. We are just being unhappy with ourselves. Others' words are formless and do not transfer to us, but we eagerly assimilate them and, therefore, become unhappy. If we were not unhappy, there would be neither harm nor benefit. All happiness and unhappiness of the preceding instant have ceased, like the definite appearances of yesterday morning. As last night's dream will not return, is not perceived, and is without nature, then equally there are no feelings to be the ground of anger. The appearances of today, and the dream of last night are similar. Neither is worthy of attachment with joy and sorrow as truly existing.

f) The thought about fabrications existing or not:

If sudden unwished-for events unpleasantly occur,
If such fabrications exist, then why should they be unpleasant?
If they do not why bother to be concerned with them?
Therefore let us try to be patient with conditions.

When desirable and undesirable things arise, if these fabricated things are there, in an effort of upaya there will be unhappiness, so skillful means are no use. If they are not there, there is no making or not making unhappiness. That there is unhappiness, cannot be reversed. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

If such fabrications as these the fabrications exist
Why should we be unhappy because of such an existence?
If the fabrications are actually non-existent
What is the sense if we are made unhappy by them.

Therefore, sentient beings each performing their own actions, know relationships of mother, father, and so on; For the benefits of samsara and so forth these should not be put up with. But for the sake of the master, preceptor, guru, and the three jewels, we should not be angry with others. If there is such a harmful misfortune, it cannot be reversed. If there is not, it will not be produced. By the praise and blame of others immense benefit or harm can therefore not result.

The teaching of the nature of anger as emptiness.

g) What is the nature of this unpleasantness and harm:

If examined, they depend on a nature like empty space.
Happy and sad and joy and sorrow, good and evil,
Grasping these dualistically has no use or meaning.
Try to see everything with equanimity.

Harm-producing forms and one's own form are without a particle of difference, and so doing harm and being harmed do not exist. The minds of both are not perceived at all externally or internally. Their words too, if examined have no nature at all, and so the one who harms, harm, and the object of harm are empty of nature. As for joy and non-joy, good and bad, nothing is ever lost at all. For even the appearance of harm no essence is established. These phantoms and mirages etc. are like the eight examples of the confused relative. In the absolute, meditate on patience like space, The Bodhicharyavatara says: 6.32

If thus we know these apparitions as phantom-like,
There will be neither subject or object for our anger.

Also, if we consider primordially unborn emptiness, The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Thus for things like that which are completely empty

What is there to gain, and what is there to lose?

and also the Bodhicharyavatara says:

What joy is there to be found, and also what non-joy?
If one tries to examine these and look for them
Everything like this is like the space of the sky
It should be grasped as being completely like the ego.

Thus, if one meditates with many skillful means, patience will be established without hindrance. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

If we are thirsty, they will not easily be at hand.
These are things do not exist in any way at all.

By familiarity with that, in this life we are on friendly terms with everything, and by things being pleasant we are happy. Later we attain the special celestial realms and enlightenment. The same text says: 6.133

Arising from the cause of rejoicing by sentient beings,
May we see in the future attainment of buddhahood.
Why do we not see that in this very life
There could be great splendor, glory, and happiness?

By the patient endurance of samsaric life,
There are lack of sickness as well as beauty and splendor.
There is support of life that lasts for a very long time
And the bliss of becoming a universal monarch.

4) Exertion,

a) How it is for individuals who have it

Now there is the explanation of the perfection of exertion. For beings..

Joyful in the wholesome nature of this effort,
Wholesome dharma are not exhausted, but gather like clouds.
Or bees within a cluster of fragrant lotus flowers.

The scriptures say:

By exertion enlightenment exists,
But by non-exertion it does not.
By exertion happiness is gathered.
By exertion good qualities increase.

b) The incompatible aspects:

What does not accord with this is the three kinds of laziness,
Attachment to bad actions, discouragement, self-contempt,
Not accomplishing good is the ground of every evil.
What is excellent is damaged and troubles will increase.

With laziness, faults increase, virtue is obscured, and our wishes not accomplished. To give the divisions:

Laziness attached to bad actions concerns acts that hinder holy Dharma, and agitate the mind, like always counting our goods and so forth.

Seeing difficulties, joining ourselves to the thought "Surely it can't be done," is the laziness of discouragement. "Someone like me couldn't do it!"-- such a discouraged attitude is the laziness of self-deprecation. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 7.3

There is the laziness of attachment to bad actions
That of discouragement, and that of self deprecation.

c) The measureless good qualities

As for the good qualities of the opposite of laziness, exertion:

Whoever has exertion is praised by all the world.
Whoever has exertion, accomplishes human wishes.
Whoever has exertion, their virtues will increase.
Whoever has exertion will pass beyond suffering.

To summarize the immeasurable benefits of exertion, we will be praised by worldly ones and will accomplish the goals of our aspirations. Good qualities will increase. Buddhahood will be attained. The same text says: 7.1

That only with exertion enlightenment exists,
Is like there being no motion without the wind element.
So without exertion no merit will arise.

d) The instruction that one must have exertion as a means to these benefits:

Whether in the highest dharmas of worldly goodness,
Or in those of the path that leads beyond the world,
There are dharmas of defilement and those that are without it,
What is bad is abandoned and what is good accomplished,
So let us make strenuous exertions, and truly stay with them,
So long as buddhahood has yet to be accomplished.
Going ever-higher to greater and greater truth,
Let us strive that long without any slackening.

For as long as we have not attained buddhahood, we should try to attain its superior qualities. In doing so we should rejoice in virtuous actions. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Who without exertion enjoys happiness.

As for the divisions, the armor of exertion is practicing virtue as a cause of overcoming the four maras.

The exertion of preparation completes the ten paths. Having formerly done that the exertion that accomplishes the goals of sentient beings is the cause of completing the goals of oneself and others.

There are the also three exertions in the dharma by exertion in body, striving in speech, and endeavoring in mind.³⁰⁸ Also the *Compendium*³⁰⁹ says:

There are the exertions of armor, preparation, absence of despondency, irreversibility, and never regarding as enough, with the mind completely joyful.

Or the Lankavatara Sutra says:

With exertion is that by which there is striving in the upper and the lower parts.
Having seen what accords with yoga, exertion in order to eliminate discursive thoughts, is the perfection of exertion.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Truly rejoice in virtue
Rely on faith and on zeal,
Increase the virtues of mindfulness,
As an antidote for the kleshas.

Its quality is passionless;
As for the seven kinds
Having known such exertion,
The wise will truly accomplish it.

Joy in virtue is the essence. Faith and zeal is the cause. Increasing mindfulness, samadhi and so on is the fruition. A happy mind without the three poisons is possession of the quality.

If it is divided, in each of the three precepts, it is always produced and is devotedly produced, by body speech, and mind respectively. With armor-exertion that makes seven kinds. As for the qualities, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

The nature of the exertion which is without example
Is the armor-application of the buddha sons.
Having destroyed the hosts of their own and others kleshas,
They attain the fruition of ultimate enlightenment.
By this very exertion, all beings are established
In the possession of the three enlightenments.
By the wisdom of exertion being completely accomplished,
They are established inexhaustibly in the three realms.

5) Meditation,

a. The cause establishing meditation,

Whoever has the wish to cultivate meditation
Should abandon all the distractions of various entertainments.
Pleasurable objects, like clouds in an autumn sky,
Ephemeral in their nature are no more stable than lightning.
Enjoyments are no more lasting than illusory palaces.
They are untrustworthy, and we should abandon them.
Instead we should rely on the peace of leafy forests.

All compounded things are impermanent. Wealth is fickle. Life is impermanent. Since all this is always essenceless, we should try to meditate alone in peaceful forests. The Personal Liberation says:

After they have heard much,
Abiding in leafy forests,
Their lives slip away in happiness.

The Talk of Solitude says:

In cloud canopies of enjoyment,
Displays like flashes of lightning.
Are destroyed by the winds of this life,
Like lotuses floating on water.

Quickly seeing the deceptions
Of youthful embodied beings,
The wise will therefore establish Meditation and samadhi,

Turn quickly to the practice
Of the ultimate yoga.

b) The concordant qualities:

The presence of desires will only produce a struggle.
In seeking, collecting, and guarding them there is suffering.
Arrogance, craving, and greed, increase our stinginess.
We are led to the lower realms, and kept from the higher ones.
Therefore be content, and let desires be few.

External amenities are the source of much unhappiness of seeking, guarding, endangering, unhappy mind, craving, arrogance, hypocrisy and so forth. Since they make one fall into the lower realms, they should be abandoned. Nagarjuna says:

By the suffering of seeking, guarding, and gathering,
Wealth should be known to be a limitless destroyer.

"Therefore be content, and let our desires be few." The Spiritual letter says:

Knowing how to be content among all wealth,
Is said to be the best teaching of gods and human beings.
Let all know content. If they know that excellence,
Even possessing no wealth, there will be genuine wealth.

i) Things as a cause of suffering.

With many things there are also many sufferings. For example:

Though by bodily wounds we may be full of suffering,
The suffering of riches is even worse than that.
Those who cut down their possessions have limitless happiness.
There will be less danger of being persecuted.

There will be no fear of thieves and enemies.
Praised by everyone, we stay upon the path.
Duties will be few and mental karma less.
So let us always train in having few desires.

If our desires are few, we are praised by all. If we have no wealth, we do not have to guard it from enemies and thieves. With few actions and body and mind at ease, we will practice samadhi, with little hypocrisy and so forth, and with many good qualities. The more the wealth, the more the suffering for those who possess it. As nagas have many snake-like heads, they have much suffering. The Spiritual Letter says:

As many as the possessions are the sufferings.
However, those with few desires are not like that.
As many as the heads of supreme kings of the Nagas,
So many are the sufferings rising from possessions.

Great desire for external things produces suffering. Internally, the desires of sentient beings involve immeasurable faults. By contention, passion, and offenses against pure conduct, the lower realms arise. All concerned are degraded and so forth. Since these arise from grasping desire and craving as pure, this should be abandoned. The Precious Mala says:

Sexy bodies of women
Are mostly in the mind

Their bodies in reality
Are really no so nice.

The mouth has rancid saliva.
Garbage sticks in the teeth.
In the nose are pus, and mucus.
The eye is a glass of tears.

The torso is full of filth,
And buckets of lungs and livers.
Fools who have not seen women
Desire their bodies most.

Like an ignorant person craving
A bucket of shit as a bauble
Such are these fools of this world
In their ignorant lust for women.

Also:

Whether bodies are good or bad,
Whether they are old or young,
If the bodies of women are nasty,
How will desire arise?

What is filthy, though secretly
It may have good color and form,
Is not worthy of desire,
Such is the form of woman.

The inner bones are covered
With an external skin.
There is a decaying stench,
That seems quite unbearable.

When what is unseen is like that,
This pretty skin is unclean.
A container of filthy heaps,
How could it ever be clean?

A jar full of shit is degrading
To even its outer brightness.
This body so full of shit,
How is it any different?

And more:

However you wash the body,
it shows the dirt it is.
If that does not teach impurity,
What good will a lecture do?

Of this body so received
To make a graceful display
E ma, how thoughtless and foolish!
E ma, how worthy of shame!

ii) The faults of worldly people and companions:

Limitless evil comes from gladly suffering fools.
The increase of evil deeds is the source of unhappiness.
Good decreases, giving rise to strife and kleshas.
We become ungrateful and are hard to satisfy.
There are many frivolous actions and distracting entertainments.
As we would from fire or snakes or vicious beasts,
Let us give a wide berth to all the attentions of fools.

In particular in sentient of the present dark age, who were not liberated by seven generations of previous buddhas and so forth, ultimate wildness, evil deeds, and kleshas increase. Virtue and peace are abandoned. They return benefit with harm. They uselessly afflict others in body, speech and mind. They disparage holy dharma and individuals associated with it. They have many purposes and many actions. With many occupations and distractions, kleshas naturally arise. Like living among carnivorous beasts, fire, or poisonous snakes, they are hard to deal with. The Entering into the Sphere of All the Tathagatas says:

As we will never be joyful
Among fierce ravenous beasts,
Likewise dealing with fools,
There is no happiness

The Bodhicharyavatara says:

If we acts like those with the fortune of fools,
We will certainly go to the lower realms.
Letting ourselves be led by those of unequal fortune,
What will come of associating with such fools?

For a moment or two they may be our companions,
Then within an instant they turn into enemies.
They become angry even when things are going well.
Ordinary people are difficult to please.

If we speak of their benefit, they get angry at that,
They go on to reverse our benefit as well.
If we do not go along with what they have to say,
Because they get angry, they will go to the lower realms.

Higher ones they envy, competing with their equals.
Arrogant to inferiors, or when they are praised,
If something unpleasant is said they give way to anger.
What benefit can be expected from these fools?

If one associates with them, it is impossible that passion, aggression, and empty chatter will not arise. The same text says: 8.13

Whenever one associates with fools like these
They always praise themselves and denigrate anyone else.
With talk of their rejoicing in samsara and so forth,
Some sort of unhappiness will certainly arise.

The suffering of those who so depend on their own partialities of desire and attachment becomes our own burden. By such real bonds, our minds are bound. By associating ourselves with their thoughts, one's dharma will be damaged. If we are with them, there is no devotion. If we are separate, there are immeasurable damages of unhappy torment. The same text says: 8.7-8

If for sentient beings we have produced desire,

That which is genuine is entirely obscured.
Even the thought of being sad at samsara is destroyed.
In the end we shall surely know the pains of suffering.

There by thoughts that are concerned with only this
This life will pass away in futile meaninglessness.
By our associating with impermanent friends
Even the eternal³¹⁰ dharma will be destroyed.

From the desires of foolish individual beings, comes our own non-completeness. the Dharma of holy liberation is not established because of depending on these. Instead, first staying alone in forest and mountain solitudes, not meeting with human beings, we should meditate. The same text says:

By these one's benefit will never be accomplished.
Since for oneself this benefit will not arise,
For a long time we will be distracted by these fools.

That is how one should think about it. Moreover, even if the oral instructions have been heard from the holy gurus, if they are not kept familiarly in mind, one will not be liberated from samsara. Therefore it is important to become familiar with them.

iii. The instruction of resorting to solitary places

As long as the mind has not attained stability,
So long will we be seduced by the wiles of external objects.
So let us stay in the joy of secluded forest places.

That is how mind and the oral instructions are mixed into one taste. Until one attains stability, the beginner should rely only on solitude free from occupations. The Basket of the Three Jewels says:

Beginners, in order to fully pacify the mind
And completely tame it, should stay in solitude.

iv) The instruction to remain in solitude all one's life

Once one is in a solitary place where no one is, isolated from all beings and fears, one is urged.

Until this body is hoisted by four pallbearers,
And turns to smoke upon a crackling funeral pyre,
Strictly keeping to peaceful places of meditation,
Conquer the enemy of sidetracks of body and mind.

Thinking of the impermanent nature of life, one practices samadhi in a peaceful place. The Talk on Solitude says:

Until this body by four persons
Is hoisted up upon a litter,
For so long strictly solitary,
Samadhi's peace should be my practice.

This is also taught in the Bodhicharyavatara 8.34

v) the praise of forest solitudes.

Now the virtues of the forests are explained:

In forests clear water, flowers, and fruits are plentiful.
There is excellent housing in mountain caves and sheltering rocks.
In solitudes graced by the shade of overhanging branches,
Many birds and deer dance by the river banks,
Exquisite with colorful flowers and the songs of bees.

Forest solitudes in shady valleys are the best. The ground is covered with verdant grass, adorned with a myriad of flowers. It is full of sounds of cool waterfalls and the songs of humming bees. In the faces of the rock mountains, under sheltering rocks are many fine natural houses. Clean water adorned by flowers and leaves is sufficient food. Accompanied by birds and wild animals, one has happy companions. Living with them in those places of samadhi, our aspirations from the beginningless past will be joyfully fulfilled. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 8.25

Trees and birds and various wild animals
Who dwell within the forest make no unpleasant sounds.
There is happiness if they are one's companions.
Therefore, may we always stay together with them.

When we am staying in caves or in empty temples
Or we make my dwelling by staying under trees,
May we never look back, but instead of that
May we always cultivate passionless detachment.

In places on the earth for which we have no grasping
Which are by their nature wide and unconstrained,
Acting autonomously and without desire
May we always stay in places such as these.

Also: 8.37

Therefore very bright and joyfully content,
Happy in a pleasant forest with few thoughts,
All agitations will vanish and be pacified.
Therefore may I always remain in solitude.

Also: 8.85

Contention and kleshas are emptied in these peaceful forests.

In the fortunate, cooled by moonlight in groves of sandalwood,
Whose fine and joyful houses are tremendous slabs of rock
Fanned by the soundless motion of the forest wind
The wish to help other beings is naturally engendered.

The Spiritual Letter says:

Adorned by the waxing disk of the moon
Great rain clouds pile up, as if buckled at the waist
By seeing mountain forests there is passionlessness
The nature moves like wind touching one's life with fortune.
With the crowd of capering wild animals seen in the forest
All is very delightful, and one is full of happiness.

This forest where one does as one likes goddesses secretly
Arriving come to visit one in one's rock shelter.

vi) How it arises in solitude with impermanence.

In those places fragrant with juniper trees and various kinds of sandalwood, with the scent of grass and flowers arising, with the aroma of incense and medicinal herbs:

Meditation naturally grows in pleasant solitudes.
Sweet with the fragrances of incenses and herbs.
Enjoy the four seasons, as they turn in a lotus pond,
The heat of summer, fall and winter, and the spring.
Let your sadness grow along with the gradual change,
As you contemplate the impermanence of life.

Filled by the fragrance of incense and medicinal herbs, pleasantly scented like ponds of great lotuses, fresh breezes softly rise. By the example of the passing seasons, impermanence and strong sadness arise in one's being. Relating to no one, there is neither passion and aggression. There is no need for mental grasping. Other people are not viewed and need not be. One need have nothing to do with the struggles of life. Without desire or discouragement arising from others, happiness is autonomous. Even by the powers of the gods this is not attained. The Bodhicharyavatara says: {{677.1}}
8.87-8

In Empty houses, under trees, and in natural caves,
Abiding in such places for as long as we wish
Abandon all the suffering of grasping and guarding
Without dependency, and acting as we will.

Passionless because of acting autonomously,
Without the least relationship with anyone
Knowing the contentment of such a happy life,
For even powerful lords attaining this is hard.

The Spiritual Letter says:

On the shores of forest streams of pristine water,
Blissful solitude is full of happiness.
As if daughters of the gods were swaying their fragrant censors of fragrant smell.

Bearing as ornaments continuous garlands of flowers,
Overpowering, as if it were divine,
The trees are perfect in root and fruit and leaves of green.
In forest independence fall cooling mountain streams,
Flowing in a place where there is no desire.

Beside its wide rivers fruit and flowers fall as ornaments
We are free and delightfully unseduced by a hell hole house.
In wide mountain valleys without any people very happy,
With vast experience of waving garlands of blue forest growth

At the waterside pleasant waterfalls, sounding like a drum,
Not a place for kleshas, so travelers proclaim.
Conquering our relationship with desires and the three worlds,
Shown as illusion, mirage, the moon in water, or waves.

vii. In those places how the mind becomes workable:

In some of those peaceful places:

See how bones are strewn about in a charnel ground,

Think how our bodies will be scattered in that way.
As we see the futile compounds of samsara,
Any joy we feel vanishes in the distance.
Always at peace, because there are no strife and kleshas,
Let the happiness of our minds be workable.

There are limitless good qualities such as samsara's sadness, contention, and kleshas being completely pacified. The *Gongpa Zhupa*³¹¹ says:

By devotion to places of mountains and forests,
The source of good qualities will be increased.
By resorting to solitary places,
The five desires will be completely abandoned.

Therefore living unprofessionally
Remaining with that which is not spoken by words
Having virtuous dharmas must not be harmed
By mutual confusion and talkativeness.

Peaceful empty solitude, is praised by the buddhas.
Therefore let aspiring bodhisattvas
Always put their reliance in solitude.
Do not produce desire in the cities.

viii) The benefits of relying on solitude

As for these groves or excellent qualities:

Victorious ones have praised such forest groves as these.
Saddened by samsara they keep to solitude.
The merits of making seven steps in their direction
Are such that the heap of merit that we would accumulate
By making offerings to the buddhas for a kalpa,
Buddhas as many as the grains of sands in the Ganges,
Would never equal the hundred-thousandth part of them.
Therefore let us keep to these forest places of peace.

If someone worships the buddhas with material things for a kalpa, if with the mind of sadness one takes even seven steps to go forth into the solitude of forests, charnel grounds and so forth, that has a much greater merit. The Shri Samadhiraja Sutra says:

If one person offers flowers, incense, food, and all the articles related to happiness to all the buddhas for a kalpa, and another with completely sad mind keeping to solitude, takes only seven steps, the heap of merit of that is immeasurably greater than the first.

Completely abandoning any view of body and life,
Meditating in the highest peace of emptiness,
The mind with exertion and with supreme exertion
Like a wild animal should stay in solitude.

ix) The divisions of how to meditate, together with the qualities

Now as for the explanation of how to meditate. In the forest:

Therefore, taking a cross-legged posture on our seats,
Meditate with a one-pointed mind without distraction.
Practice the attitude of a child in a temple;
Then the perfect discrimination of reality;

Then the holy meditation of the happy tathagatas.
We should know the names of the three kinds of samadhi,
Experienced by the noble ones who have entered the path;
As well as the four-fold dhyanas and four-fold formless attainments,³¹²
The experiences of those who have yet to enter it.
The mind that delights in desirable things will be abandoned.
Insight, samadhi, and higher perceptions will manifest.
There will be the five eyes and the four legs of miracle.
The mind will be transformed, becoming autonomous.

The essence of dhyana is that the mind one pointedly grasps a good object, whatever it may be. The Light of the Path says:

On whatever object may be suitable
The mind should be well-placed.

Sit on a seat. When the mind is placed in meditative equipoise, the complexities of appearance subside. As we undertake to make apparent objects of one taste with the eye of dharmata, they do not become invisible, but become ungrasped phenomena. Thus in one's own time, seeing apparent objects is like opening the eyes to two natures at once.

Sir or madam when the eyes are closed,
Such is the mind that is poised in meditation
Sir or madam when the eyes are open,
Such is the attainment of subsequent knowledge.

Meditation on the single nature is shamatha. Post-meditation is vipashyana. These two have one mind, one essence, one time, one object, and are one in their action of abandoning obscuration. The Small Commentary says:

The pure world, having the aspect of completely not grasping subject and object, includes the subsequent mind as a fruition in accord with itself, reversing perception of form and so on.

The appearances of meditation do not block appearances, but they are pure of concepts. Apparent rocks and so on, the ordinary objects of the five senses, are worldly and are so labeled. But since at that time they are without the aspects of grasping and fixation, they are also non-conceptual mind. The very mind of appearance at that time, labeling appearance and emptiness as equal, is included in subsequent mind. Meditation and the substance³¹³ which is mind are one, so meditation naturally abandons grasping and fixation. Accordingly post meditation is of one nature with the dharms of form, feeling and so forth. It has abandoned perception attached to them in terms of grasping and fixation.

Post-meditation purified by meditation is called "letting loose" attachments of grasping and fixation and so on. As for meditation and post-meditation being of one nature, everything exists at the time of meditating in samadhi until the seventh bhumi, and this letting loose of existence. Up to then individuals do not exist as a single essence. The Uttaratantra says:

The mind always accomplishing actions
Blazing like fire,
Peaceful samadhi and absorption
Are always equalized.

There are three divisions to the extensive explanation. The formless dhyanas of samadhi in the mind of someone not dwelling on the path, are called "the samadhi of a child's enjoyment." For those dwelling on the path, the samadhis of the paths of accumulation and preparation produce the path of liberation. Completely revealing the meaning, this is called the samadhi of completely revealing the meaning. From the first bhumi onward, the samadhis of the noble ones are called the spotless samadhi or the joyful samadhi of the tathagatas. The Lankavatara Sutra says:

{{682.4}}

The samadhi of child's enjoyment,
Fully revealing the meaning
And the samadhi of the tathagatas.

The stages are as in that passage. As for the fruition, the Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

By samadhi, lesser desirable qualities are rejected
Insight and higher perception with samadhi are established.

As for the meaning of these, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

As for mind, it dwells, and rests internally.
Mindfulness and exertion are what are depended on.
By that the production of bliss is subsequently produced.
One is empowered with the objects of higher perception.
Then the three chiefs of dharmas come into existence.
Having known such samadhi, skillful ones fully establish it.

The essence is grasped within the mind. The cause is continuous mindfulness and exertion. The same text says:

Having realized a flash of this with agitation,
One should do this repeatedly again and again.

The action is production of bliss. This is the support of establishing miraculous ability. The fruition is establishment of the higher perceptions, miraculous abilities and so forth. Among the divisions are the three samadhis of abiding in happiness within this very life,³¹⁴ the establishment of all good qualities, and performing benefits for sentient beings.

{{683.4}} As for the first dhyana,³¹⁵ as good qualities arise from inner dhyana, one attains joy and bliss.³¹⁶ In the stage of access,³¹⁷ and in having barely attained the main part there are conceptual thoughts³¹⁸ and sustained scrutiny.³¹⁹ The main body in particular has no conceptual thoughts and only sustained scrutiny.

The main parts of the second, third, and fourth dhyanas, have mental apprehension³²⁰ without thought and analysis. These dhyanas of which the earlier ones are preparations for the later, are explained in the Bhumi-Collection.

The samadhi that establishes all good qualities when the six pure perfections and so forth are established is the samadhi of one-pointed mind.

The samadhi establishing benefit for sentient beings, focuses one-pointedly on the benefit of beings, from the main body of this samadhi, one produces the benefits and so forth of what is desired and what one is interested in.

As for the good qualities, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

The sons of the Victorious One have many samadhis, establishing all samadhis. The samadhis exist by invoking bliss, and by the arising of compassion they support lesser beings. By that very samadhi all sentient beings are established in the three enlightenments. By the wisdom of samadhi, when this has been completely accomplished, they are inexhaustibly established in the pure worlds.

6) Prajna that realizes the natural state also has three sections.

a) The extensive explanation of the nature of the three prajnas

Then as for the perfection of prajna:

There are three stages as we develop in prajna.
These are hearing, contemplation, and meditation.
By vipashyana the host of kleshas will be abandoned.

By completely knowing the natural state of dharma and dharmin,
From living within samsara, we go to the peace of nirvana.

Hearing is the producer of knowledge of the nature, the natural state of all dharmas as they are.

By contemplating what has been ascertained, and producing liberation from the ocean of samsara by meditation, it is maintained to be prajna, which means supreme knowledge or awareness. The Small Commentary says:

Its sources are hearing, contemplating and meditating, or the union of samadhi.
By the prajnas arising from the main body of meditation and post-meditation..."

Prajna is called vipashyana or clear seeing. It is more excellent than the other perfections. However, the prajna arising from hearing on the level of an ordinary being is also important, because someone who has not heard, one cannot contemplate and meditate. The Uttaratantra says:

Practice of generosity is the establisher.
As discipline meditates on the celestial realms,
Defiling kleshas are completely abandoned.
Prajna entirely abandons all kleshas and knowables.
By that there is supremacy caused by hearing.

Also:

Prajna is supreme. As for its ground
It is hearing, so hearing too is supreme.

In this case, wishing to know the nature of all dharmas is resolved by hearing. Here the presentation follows the Precious Key that Makes One Meet and Evaluating the Treasury of Holy Dharma. From the two sections of the first, as for the presentation of provisional meaning and true meaning, the dharmata of all dharmas is suchness, naturally pure space, the nature of mind, in naturally pure luminous realization. Changeless, it transcends birth, abiding, and destruction. Its essence is the space of the sky. This is the true meaning. Words of the Buddha and shastras that teach this are included within the true meaning.

The dharmin is things that appear. this includes arising and ceasing, coming and going, pure and impure; the details of the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas and so forth. This is the dream-like appearance of variety evaluated by the details of speech, thought, and expression. All these teachings of exaggeration are the provisional meaning. All words of the Buddha and shastras that teach this are included within the relative.

For example, saying or thinking, "The nature of the mind is like the sky." and becoming haughty about that is relative. To say, "That which has the nature of the absolute is the true meaning," is as it should be. The Praise of the Madhyamaka Inconceivable by thought says:

The emptiness of dharmas is the true meaning, so it is taught.
What arises and ceases, the life of beings and so forth,
Is taught to be the provisional meaning and relative.

The Shri Samadhiraja Sutra says:

As the Tathagata, who is the teacher, formerly taught,
There are particular sutras distinguished as the true meaning.
Those which teach sentient beings who are ordinary people,
All such dharmas are those within the provisional meaning.

The Sutra Taught by the Noble One Inexhaustible Intellect says:

If it is asked which sutras are sutras of the provisional meaning? Which are sutras of the true meaning? Those sutras which are teachings for the purpose of entering into the path are called the provisional meaning. Those sutras which are taught for the purpose of entering into the fruition are called the true meaning. Those sutras are called the provisional meaning which teach a self, sentient beings, life, persons, individuals, the arising of emotions,³²¹ and an ego who owns the emotions and is a doer and a feeler, explaining these in a variety of words, and teach being egoless and having an ego.

Those sutras are called the true meaning that teach emptiness, marklessness, wishlessness, uncompoundedness, the unborn, the non-arising, no things, no ego, no beings, no life, no individual, and no self, and that the gate of complete liberation is unobstructed.

It is said that one should rely on the sutras of the true meaning and not on the sutras of the provisional meaning.

In brief, the natural state, and the sutras that teach it are called the true meaning and the sutras of the true meaning. The many means for entering into the nature, involving confused, impure dharmas which instruct the minds of sentient beings, and all the teachings of their divisions and so forth, are known as the provisional meaning and dharmas of the provisional meaning. This is how it is explained in the Mirror of Viewing the Aspects of Dharma and the First Key of Revelation. In order to explain these and so that the intended meaning may be realized, from the two explanations of the intention and the concealed intention, first, as for the intention, explaining with a little exaggeration, these teachings have a manner which is not completely straightforward. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Equality and other-meaning
And similarly other times,
And the thoughts of individuals
Should be known as the four intentions.

The intention of equality has the intended meaning that dharmakaya is equality, saying "at that time we will completely see the tathagatas." It is like that.

As for the intention of meaning as other, having intended the three naturelessnesses, "all dharmas are natureless," is taught. Thus, the characteristics of false conceptions are essenceless, since these are not established as real at all. The arisings of paratantra are essenceless, since, their arising is not established from any of the four extremes: They do not arise from themselves, because for these arising and an instant in which they arise are contradictory. They do not arise from something else, since if the essential marks of these others are analyzed, they are not established. That they arise from both would be doubly contradictory, so that is not established. They do not arise without a cause, as that is impossible.

The mere arising of whatever appears, mere interdependent arising like dream or illusion, is appearance of what does not exist. The Sutra of the Appearances of Wisdom as the Ornament says:

Manjushri, as for dreams, what appears there does not exist. Similarly all dharmas are appearances of what does not exist.

From that they are taught to be illusion, mirage, a city of the gandharvas, the moon in water, reflection, and magical emanations in space. In true reality, they have no absolute essence. This is the absolute. This is because their nature is impure and so forth and their complex essence does not exist. The commentary Ascertaining the Intention of the Sutras says:

Characteristics are essencelessness. Birth is essencelessness. The absolute is essencelessness. Having realized that, I taught that all dharmas are essenceless.

The intention of other times, it is like saying, "by merely grasping the spotless moonlight of the tathagata's marks, buddhahood is attained." This is not attained in isolation, but having gathered the former assembly of these, one will always become enlightened by them.

As for the intention of thoughts of individuals, for some attached to the view of grasping supreme discipline, it is like praising generosity as a lesser discipline.

Second, the hidden intention is so that those who delight in external things can grasp the genuine path or meaning. "Spotless moonlight," doesn't depend very much on what has that name. While according with their phenomenal style, a non-according meaning is explained. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

The hidden intention of making one to enter,
The hidden intention of other characteristics
The hidden intention of the antidote
The hidden intention of a transformation.
Shravakas and the essence
Thus tame faults and as for profound expression
These are the four called the hidden intentions.

As for the first, the hidden intention of making enter has the goal of making enter into the mahayana some of the family of shravakas who do not enter because they have been frightened by emptiness. To them it is said that form exists. The hearers, understanding that it really exists, enter. The actual intention of the explainer is that all appearances exist like a dream.

The hidden intention of characteristics is so that the essenceless natural state may be known. It is taught that all dharmas are essenceless. The three essencelessnesses of parikalpita, paratantra, and parinishpanna have already been explained.

As for the hidden intention of the antidote, some say Shakyamuni's body and length of life were short, with the intention of implying that he was less than other teachers. When it is said, "At this time I become the tathagata Vairochana," the hearers understand that he is equal to rupakaya. The explainer intends that he is equal to the completed accumulations, attainment of dharmakaya, and the benefits done for sentient beings. The Abhidharmakosha says:

As for the assembly of all the enlightened buddhas
In the sense that all the buddhas go to dharmakaya
Their body and the like are said to be equal to this
It is not that their bodies and families are literally so big.

As for the hidden intention of transformation, this dharma may be easy to understand, and in order to pacify the fault of people thinking that a dharma which is actually easy to understand is less than others, they teach it so that it is very hard to realize. For example, the Shrine Room of Telling the Reason Why says:

Father and mother are to be killed
The king is doubly cleaned, and
If one conquers the country
Together with its surroundings,
Those people will become pure.

Here "father and mother" are craving and grasping at samsaric formations. Alaya is a "king," since it is the support of the various habitual patterns. The bhramin's view of a transitory collection and discipline training in virtue and grasping supreme asceticism are those who have the two purities of nature and the incidental. The "country and surrounding regions" are the eight consciousnesses having the inner ayatanas of grasping and fixation. "Conquering" them means that if they are purified, one becomes enlightened.

Here two secret intentions, whichever is appropriate, make of one nature what is particular and different. As for the distinction of these two, Lotsawa Loden Sherap says that another meaning than what is thought by the speaker is understood for the speaker's words by the hearers. This is the intention. The meaning understood by the speaker, but not understood by the hearers is the secret intention. So it is explained and the Thekpa Dukyi Drepa Shejar³²² says:

This intention, is only mentally presented in mind, and from the viewpoint of the external grasper it is not openly proclaimed. The intention is secret to this viewpoint of the external grasper.

These two should be known to be without contradiction. Someone may explain that it has such and such an aspect, and intending that it does not depend on whether it is in fact grasped or not grasped by the other. This may be asked by another and so forth. Since not all proclamations of the teachings are complete, the rest of what is intended is the real intention. In order to bring benefit to others, to some degree depending on a double meaning, teaching in according with their appearances, it is called secret intention.

Understanding depends on the other understanding what is said by the sayer, as completed by another meaning. Therefore it is merely not false. These are the two keys of the view of scripture. Thus word, meaning, intention, and the purpose of the occasion since they are of many kinds, knowing that the sutras and tantras are revealed in this manner is very important.

That two meanings are evaluated from two presentations of the Dharma treasury, first, as for the teaching in the style of the two truths, The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

The buddhas having taught the dharma
Properly depends on two truths.
These are the worldly relative truth
And the truth of the ultimate meaning.

The Sutra of the Meeting of Father and Son says:

The truths of those who are skilled in the world are just these two.
You have received no others, nor were they seen by me.
These are the relative truth and the absolute truth
Besides them there is no third truth of any kind at all.

Here the mere nature of so called dharmas is made into a basis of division. Then the way things appear is called the relative truth and the way things are is the absolute truth. These two are divided. Also, within the way things appear, there are the confused and non-confused. The first is the nature of speech, thought, and expression at the time of existence as a sentient being. This is all and everything that arises as confused appearance, grasping, and knowledge. This is also all that is delusive, changeable, miserable, and so forth. It is the appearance of objects to a confused mind. They are the labels of speech, thought and expressions of the minds of sentient beings. As the imputed labels of such a mind, they do not touch the reality of buddhahood, and are called confused. The appearances and understanding of this time depend on dualistic appearances of incidental truth and falsity, the true and the false relative. These have an effective power according with appearances. They arise from causes. They are isolated by examination. They appear in an accordant way. Collected under earth, water, fire, and air, with the knowledge of what is intrinsic to these, they are the true relative. Appearances that have no effective power, like the appearance of two moons if we put pressure on the eye, are the false relative. The Two Truths says:

They appear to have an effective power,
By whether they really have it or do not,
They are distinguished as being true or false.
These divisions of the relative are made.

Both of these, when their nature is examined, are equal. They are equal in arising from habitual patterns of confusion. They are equal in appearing to the individual senses. Though temporarily from the viewpoint of confusion they are effect-producing appearances, all the objects viewed by the eye-consciousness and so forth are equally natureless.

The non-confused relative is two. There is the non-confusion of fruition, the wisdom of the ground, together with the buddha qualities, and the previous impermanent, called non-confused from the viewpoint of crossing over to the nature. The commentary to the Uttaratantra says:

All truths of the path are compounded. All compounded things are deceptive.

This is taught because such things necessarily change and develop. However the compounded other and the deceptive are not the same. By attaining the fruition, alone with knowledge of the rupakaya of the buddhas, these dwell in Akanishta. This is changeless. It is permanent and self-existing. It is the treasury of perfect buddha qualities. As the great appearance of the mandalas and so forth, it is perfected mastery of the wisdom of extent. Though as appearance it is called relative, since it is inseparable from dharmakaya, it abides changelessly like the sky. These will be extensively explained below.

Nirmanakaya is composed of the appearances of students. By the compassion of the buddhas these are spontaneously present. From the viewpoint of the minds of those who are to be tamed there seems to be change, but in reality no change exists. Like the moon in water, from the condition of vessels it appears to change, but the real thing, whose characteristics are not established, is changeless. Just so, though a body appears to beings who are to be tamed, its essential characteristics are not established. These three kayas are of one nature without gathering or separation. This is because dharmakaya is changeless. Moreover, just as the moon in the sky though establishing the moon in the water is not of one nature with it, similarly, though emanations spontaneously appear from the state of sambhogakaya, sambhogakaya is really changeless, and nothing is really established. Though from the viewpoint of those who are to be tamed there appears to be change, none of the things that change are established. Therefore, all aspects of appearance, pure and impure, are gathered under relative truth.

Absolute truth is the nature of things as they are. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

Not known from another, and peaceful,
Not complicated by complexities.
Without discursive thought and different meanings.
These are what are called its characteristics.

All the dharmas of samsara and nirvana are primordially natureless. They transcend all objects of speech and thought. Not realized by concepts, they are not classifiable by mind. They have no proclamations of sameness and difference. The same text says:

The buddhas, the protectors of the world,
Are also the amrita of the teachings.
The meaning is not one, nor is it different.
It is neither nothingness nor eternal.

From the viewpoint of mind, the phenomenal world of samsara and nirvana is labeled with differences of good and bad. However, since everything is primordially pure as the nature of the sky, there are no pure, impure, both, or neither. "It is completely pure" means it is beyond this sense presented by the mind. The same text says:

All is not true and not not true
It is not both true and not true,
It is not neither true or not true.
That is the teaching of the buddhas.

The viewpoint of the nature is beyond all proclamations. This is because it is beyond all identification of essences. Though, "It is like this," has been proclaimed, this is the view of ego and so forth. Such statements fall into the extremes of eternalism and nihilism. The Sixty Verses on Reasoning says:

If it is proclaimed that this is a actual thing
Passion and aggression will arise from such a view.
It will be impatiently and unsuitably grasped.
From that contention and controversy will arise

Since the nature is without assertions, it proclaims no objects, has no proclaimer, and is not identified as anything at all. This is why it is said, "It is faultless." The *Elimination of Controversy*³²³ says:

If I had any assertions,
Then I would have these faults.
But since I have no assertions,
I do not have these faults.

The natural state or naturally pure essence of all dharmas is profound, peaceful, and free from all the extremes of complexity. It has no assertions or proclamations. It is the purity of primordial space. Though its essence is inseparable, if one divides it in terms of mental exaggerations, there is birth and the unborn. Though these and everything else are established by the mind as emptiness, as complexities of the unborn there are the unliberated accountable absolute and the unaccountable absolute liberated from all the complexities of born, unborn and so forth. The Two Truths says:

Though birth and so forth are hindered by proper reasoning,
They are explained in a way according with the real
The birthless where all complexities are pacified,
Is given the merely symbolic name "the absolute."

Here if one explains the divisions according to the oral instructions, from the sphere of dharmadhatu which alone is classified as the ground, come the apparent aspects, like illusion, mirage, the moon in water, and so forth. Since the nature of what appears does not exist, this is called relative truth. The Sutra Requested by Jōnpa says:

In the surface of a spotless mirror,
Just as the moon may seem to be appearing,
Even though its nature is not established,
So the forest of dharmas should be known.

Ordinary people see appearances as really truly existing, but yogins see them as uncertain, merely like a dream. Elusive and evanescent, tenuous and diaphanous, they are simply unexaminable. Knowing all these misty appearances to be unexaminable is realizing relative truth. They are not harmed by the conditions of appearance. When there is attainment, these appearances are established as the beginningless miracles of beings and so forth. Not proclaimed as anything at all, whatever appears is natureless; mind reaches it without any differentiating of truths. If one attains this wisdom of the noble ones, the buddha fields and so forth appear, and since there is no attachment to their true existence, this is called the true relative. All conceptions and appearances of a mind attached to their true existence are the false relative. The source of arising of lack of attachment to true existence and all its appearances are the true relative.

In the absolute too, there is no attachment to the nature of mind, the natureless way things are, and all the dharmas included within that nature like the moon in water. Confused appearances are known to be essentially natureless as groundless mere appearance. Liberation of existence and non-existence and such mental conceptions into space is realization of the natural state. Realization of that nature as the absolute is called mind that realizes the absolute. The Praise to the Mother by Rahula, one of the sixteen sthaviras, says:

Prajnaparamita inexpressible by speech or thought
Unborn, unceasing with a nature like the sky,
Only realized by discriminating awareness wisdom.
I prostrate to the mother of the victorious ones of the three times.

According to that, discriminating awareness wisdom is absolute. Realizing that is realizing the absolute. The two truths are not different like two horns on a yak. When the way things are in the relative is like the moon in water, the apparent form of the moon is the relative. The moon's being without true existence is the absolute. The single nature of these two, appearing as what does not exist in the water of a pond, are the inseparably united two truths. Mind that realizes the two truths.

The dharmas of appearance, form, sound, smell, taste, and touchables, along with mental conceptions that assert and deny them, are all confused appearances like the eight examples of illusion. Realizing that what appears does not exist is called setting out from the monastery of samsara on the path of liberation.

If one mentally analyses, what does not bear analysis is relative. What does is absolute. The details of the conceptual are found to be only relative. How so? That which bears the analysis of mind either depends or does not depend on the mind. What does not is not classified conventionally as bearing the analysis. If it does, whether or not mind bears the analysis, these two are not a single aspect, since the mental examination is one thing, and it is only an object of mind. Therefore it is relative. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 9.2

The absolute is not within the sphere of mind.
It is maintained that mind is merely relative.

That is how it is explained. In brief, the complexities of mind and the appearances of complexity are the viewpoint of the relative. The non-existence of complexities, the mind in which grasping and fixation have dissolved, and the appearances of such a mind are known to yogins as the absolute. Since the two truths are inseparable, the relative therefore may also be absolute, as different aspects of a single essence.

According to what is proclaimed here, though the essence has no singularity or difference at all, according to worldly usage it is said that the two truths are of one nature. According to what is proclaimed by doctrine, what appears according to the relative, and should appear either according to the relative or not appearing according to the relative, therefore has the fault of also not appearing according to the relative. The Commentary Ascertaining the Intention says:

As for the compounded and the marks of the absolute,
These have separate marks of one and different
What is characterized as being both one and different?
This has not been properly dealt with up to now.

Though it is taught to be without the division of one and different, it is really non-dual. Of these the Miraculous says:

Inseparable absolute and relative
Is the great mandala of truth.

Moreover, regarding the differences used in presenting the two truths, there are:

1. The difference of two aspects of one essence,
2. Difference of essence,
3. The difference that refutes one, and
4. The difference of different distinctions within one meaning.

From those four differences, this is the first, making distinctions of aspects within a single essence.

It is not a distinction merely of conventional names, since there are different characteristics and aspects. The essence is not different, because the essence does not exist, and because the two truths are "inseparable" merely conventionally. It is not merely the difference that refutes one, since there are no individual natures within it, and since the single ground would have to be divided. Therefore, merely conventionally, it is like water and the moon in water, different aspects of a single essence. The Commentary on Bodhicitta says:

As molasses has many natures
And the nature of fire is heat,
Therefore of all dharmas
The nature is emptiness.

Also:

The relative is explained as emptiness.

Because it is produced and impermanent,
Emptiness alone is relative.
If it does not exist, it does not arise.

Also the Five Stages says:

The relative and the absolute,
Are individual aspects.
What is true is mixed.
This is explained as union.

In the absolute there is no distinction of one and different at all. The Sutra Requested by Maitreya says:

The inexpressible space of compounded characteristics is neither these themselves nor something other.

In the true account there are:

1. other extremes are hindered,
2. existence of/as things, and
3. the true account depending on purpose.

Of those three, it is the first. Certainly being liberated and not liberated from things is really contradictory. By refuting a third heap, the partialities of asserting and negating, these two are a valid account.

Since objects depend on the perceiver, when they are postulated, objects are confused mind that has not reached the ultimate, and ultimate non-confused mind does not go beyond duality. {{703.4}} Here the dharmas of samsara and nirvana are all confusion, and since dharmata is the non-confused object, that for the powers of mind there are two objects is certain. The causal power is something like the high points of art in relief. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

By seeing all things as being true and false,
Things are grasped as having a dual nature
Seeing what objects are is the absolute.
False seeing is taught to be the relative.

If one divides according to the different doctrines, the shravakas analyze the absolute as instantaneous awareness by mind and things that cannot be harmed by being broken up by a hammer and so forth. Continuity of awareness and coarse things are relative things that are really instantaneous. The instantaneous partless atoms of coarse things are maintained to be absolute. The Abhidharmakosha says:

Whatever is said by the Bhagavan to be other than mind
That does not enter into being the same as mind.
Like water and a vase such things are relative,
Such existence is other than absolute existence.

Some Sautrantikas according with reasoning say according to the Complete compendium of Valid Cognition:

That which has a productive power is absolute
What is otherwise exists as the relative.
So the general definitions are explained.

In the mind-only school the object and perceiver of dualistic appearance are relative truth. Non-dual knowledge is maintained to be absolute truth. The Compendium of the Essence of Wisdom says:

So-called parts of things do not exist,
Therefore it follows that there are no atoms.
Conceived appearance of individual things does not exist in experience like a dream.
Liberated from grasping and fixation,
Consciousness alone is absolute.
This perfection of the ocean of mind
Is famed as the tradition of yogachara.

For svatantrika madhyamaka whatever appears is relative, and is like illusion and so forth.
It is not absolutely established, like space. The Conquest of Illusion says:

The conceptual relative, like the absolute,
Is liberated from conceiver and conceived.

As for the prasangikas, what appears is relative and emptiness is the absolute; but what is called these is without difference, dharmata transcending all sameness and difference, free from all the extremes of complexity. From the time it appears this is rightly maintained to be unborn, unceasing, and without coming and going. The proclaimed relative alone is refuted. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

While you maintain paratantra to be real
I do not proclaim the relative.

This is saying: If you think, "These appearances, are indeed established to arise and so forth," Arising and non-arising, establishment and non-establishment are external labelings of mind, so how will they really exist? However, though your doctrine is refuted, mere appearance is not refuted. Aryadeva says:

Just as appearances are not refuted,
Because they arise in mutual interdependence;
In this repeatedly becoming suffering,
Conceptions of true existence are cleared away.

Appearance in this case is appearing as if non-existent. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

Form, sound, and taste and touch
And smell's arisings are only
Like a castle of the gandharvas
Like dream or like illusion
Like an illusory person
And like a mere reflection
Pleasant and unpleasant
Even if they arise,
Where and what are they?

Here what is grasped is that all-inclusive all-good aspect of natureless appearance. When each of these aspects is joined to its own attachment to true existence, they become very silly bad doctrines.

As for the distinction between these two truths, the nature without speech, thought, or expression is absolute truth. Appearance and what is imputed, being said, thought, and expressed by mind is relative truth.

If it is asked whether this absolute truth is realized or not realized by mind, the essence of the absolute transcends realized and realizer, and is not classified as being realized. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Kashyapa, what is the absolute, emptiness? It is not viewed by anyone.
It is not actualized. It is not accomplished. It is not attained.

Well don't the noble ones realize it? "The mind arisen in accord with the absolute," is a string of emptied words. Candrakirti says:

For the person with a mind in accord with emptiness, "Emptiness is realized," is said, but really there is no such thing as realization of emptiness.

For example, by realizing that the sky is accommodating, the sky itself does not become an inseparable part of the mind. The Diamond Sutra says:

Those who see me as form
Those who know me as words
Are dwelling on wrong paths.
These persons have not seen me.
What is meant by the buddhas
Is the view of dharmata.
The leaders are dharmakaya.
Dharmata is not a knowable,
So consciousness cannot know it.

At the time of enlightenment, since the absolute and buddhahood are not different, realized and realizer are non-dual. The time of seeing the truth of the noble ones, is also the time of seeing the nature of mind and the wisdom of actuality as non-dual. Since realizer and realized are non-dual, becoming exhausted in a struggle between realization and non-realization is meaningless. By saying that the essence of the absolute is without realized and realizer, it follows that it will not be realized by individuals. But since this is not connected with the meaning, there is a gap in the explanation.

"This fire is hot and burns." By saying this, it follows that it was not done by the acts of persons. We should think of the former expression as also like that. Though space is beyond the extremes of thinking and conception, it is still encountered by persons. Just so, the absolute beyond the expressions of complexity is encountered by yogins. What's more, it liberates from suffering and manifests the ultimate luminosity of mind. It is genuine, true, and right.

Moreover, if one does not know the nature of the two truths, one does not the profundity of suchness. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

Whoever does not completely know
These divisions of the two truths,
These also do not completely know,
The profundity of the Buddha's teaching.

As for the good qualities of knowing this:

Those who put their reliance on these two-fold truths,
Glean the accumulations of enlightenment.
These will cross from samsara to the perfection of wisdom.

Moreover, as for all dharmas being the appearance of what does not exist, insofar as they are completely contained within the play of emptiness they are suitable, and otherwise they are not suitable. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

Whenever emptiness is suitable
Then everything will be suitable.
Whenever emptiness is not suitable,
Then everything is unsuitable.

Also:

Though these emptinesses are entirely proper
Non emptiness is not proper in the least.

In brief, impure, confused dharmas, the dream-like relative are not true, deceptive, a childish betwixt and between.³²⁴ Except as mere evanescence, they have no nature or identity. The luminous nature of pure dharmata, the profound peace and simplicity of the natural state of wisdom, is changeless, self-existing, inconceivable dharmata.

In relative truth, the accumulation of merit is hollow like dream and illusion. The accumulation of wisdom of absolute truth is dharmata like the sky. By meditating on that as a fruition, the holy rupakaya and holy dharmakaya are both made to manifest. With that, the first storehouse, the presentation of the two truths, has been taught. Now the nature of all dharmas as dependent arising will be taught. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

There are no dharmas
That do not arise interdependently,
Therefore there are no dharmas,
That are not emptiness.

In explanation of this, the nature arises interdependently. Samsara arises interdependently. Nirvana arises interdependently. From these three, as for the first, the dharmata or nature of samsara and nirvana does not come from anywhere. It does not go anywhere. It does not abide anywhere. Since the dharmin depends on dharmata, the dharmin, from the very time of appearing to arise and cease, is free from all the extremes of complexity of birth, abiding, and destruction. This is the nature of the middle way. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

What arises interdependently is explained as emptiness.
It is classified in dependence on that relationship.
That itself is called the path of the middle way.

The Lankavatara Sutra says:

Abandoning eternalism and nihilism,
Free from partialities of existence and non-existence,
Total realization of the middle way,
This very thing which is known as the path of the middle way,
Has been explained by me and also by all the buddhas.

All impure appearance and the awareness that grasps it is the dimness of hairs floating in the eyes. From the very time of their seeming appearance, they do not exist at all. The same text says:

No nature, no apprehension,
No reality, no support,
This corpse-like foolishness
Is labeled as wrong knowledge.
These errors float like the hairs
That are seen by persons with floaters.
Likewise conceptions of things,
Are wrongly imputed by fools.
The three worlds are mere imputation.

The confused appearances of dream do not exist before sleep and after waking, but in between they seem to appear. These present appearances of the six realms are non-existent within the primordially pure realm of the first nature of mind. Since the nature of mind is completely pure of these present confusions, there is no such thing as a time when it becomes enlightened. In the middle these appearances appear while they are non-existent. Their arising, abiding, and destruction does not exist, and therefore in their essence there is neither birth nor destruction. Earlier, now, and later they have no arising in space. The Subsequent Tantra of the Creator of All says

Since later space is changeless,...

To explain, confused appearance is a mere labeling with names. Its nature does not exist like a sky-flower or the son of a barren woman. If that nature is realized, one is liberated:

There is no worldly birth or destruction
Like a flower in the sky.
By your prajna and your compassion,
Do not conceive of existence
Nor yet of non-existence.
All dharmas are mere illusion.
Abandon mind and consciousness
With eternity and the void.

Moreover, the eight consciousnesses depend on the alaya of the various habitual patterns, and confused habitual patterns of appearance as external objects. All this is false conception. It is temporary, without benefit, apparent though it does not exist, and ignorant. Confused thoughts that grasp at ego and ego-fixation rendered it without benefit. As for suffering within this dreamlike attachment to true existence of sentient beings, the Song of the Inexhaustible Treasury says:

The game which I have made,
Fools grasp and solidify.

At the time of appearance, from the very time when memory and understanding arise, they are primordially empty, beyond all the extremes of complexity. The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

The sons of the conquerors are destroyers of everything.
Samsara is primordially empty of existence.
A partial emptiness is that of the tirthikas.
The wise do not dispute with any fools like these.

Existence and non-existence, having or not having a certain quality, true and false, pure and impure are all mind-created doctrine and therefore false conceptions. They should be cast away. The same text says:

Those with conceptions impute existence and non-existence.
By such examination suffering is not pacified.
Both existence and non-existence are extremes.
In the same way, pure and impure are mere extremes.
Those who are wise do not abide in the middle either.

Also, the Sutra of the Irreversible Wheel says:

Existence is one extreme.
And non-existence a second.
One as such mere extremes
Are ego and non-ego
And eternalism and nihilism.

As for people being bound by their respective conceptual doctrines, the Lankavatara Sutra says:

Words that know things are grasped
Like proliferating insects.
Fools unskilled in relationships

Are bound by inferior doctrines.

All dharmas whatever and whenever arise interdependently. They are unborn, unceasing, without coming and going, not single things and not different things. They are neither nothingness nor eternal. They have a nature in which all complexities have been completely pacified. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

What arises interdependently
Is ceaseless and unborn
Neither nothingness or eternal
Without any coming or going
Not different things nor one thing.
Pacifying complexity
Is the teaching of peace
To the perfect buddhas who said this,
To those holy ones I prostrate.

In brief, the nature of all dharmas is primordially pure. This is the nature or ground of interdependent arising.

Now, the interdependent arising of samsara will be explained. What appears as external objects, the mind's apparent objects, appear in the form of mountains, walls, earth, water, fire, air, and space, conventionally symbolized as forms, a roll of cloth, the combined strands of a rope, single strands of long yak hair³²⁵ woven into cloth,³²⁶ the phenomena of things arising from causes and condition, and that and that being produced of similar and dissimilar kinds. All these are called external interdependent arising. They arise one depending on another, and therefore there is seeming external appearance of material things. Compounded from ignorance up to old age and death, there is inner interdependent arising. The Lankavatara Sutra says:

Mahamati, just as from a lump of clay a pot arises, similarly from threads come cloth, from individual hairs weaving, from seeds a sprout, a stalk and so forth, from people churning diligently curds of butter, so Mahamati, in external interdependent arising, from earlier to later they arise.

Internal interdependent arising is like this. Arising from the dharmas of ignorance and craving and so forth, has been given the name of internal interdependent arising.

Not recognizing primordial individual and personal wisdom is the great ignorance. From that samsara is produced, and from consciousness up to old age and death the nidanas arise in an unbroken interdependent connection from one to the next. The Spiritual Letter says:

From ignorance comes formations, and from that consciousness, Then there is name and form, and from that the six ayatanas, Then contact, taught to enable the source of everything.

From contact there comes feeling, which is the source of all.
From the ground of feeling, craving will arise.
From craving, comes clinging, from that is birth from life to life.
If birth exists, there is suffering, sickness, and old age
Loss of what is desired, death, and destruction and so on.
Suffering and the skandhas thus become very great.

From the twelve extensive treatments of the divisions of this, as for 1) ignorance, first there is the natural state, the primordial purity of dharmata, the essential nature, and the dharmas exhibited by that. By not correctly knowing these, because of formations of samsaric karma, patterns of conditioned 2) formations arise. Here body, speech, and mind, obscured by ignorance, are not in accord with what is wholesome and meritorious. The ten virtues and non-virtues and the three neutral actions³²⁷ are formations.

By these virtues the celestial realms are attained and by the non-virtues the lower realms. The neutral ones associated with these two are like non-virtue. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

From the obscurations of ignorance there is therefore rebirth.
The three formations and manifestation of formations,
These are the karmas go into our being beings.

By the karma of formations, there is that which is produced and one enters into the corresponding phenomena. The awareness so-produced is 3) consciousness. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

Having the condition of formations there is consciousness

By consciousness entering into ones own happiness as a sentient being. The red and white bindus, the aspect consisting of gathering prana and mind, come feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness. These are the four skandhas of name. Form is frozen by being established as the skandha of form. This is called 4) name and form. The same text says:

If one enters into consciousness,
If there is name and form, there will be desire.

In the mother's womb from entering into consciousness, name and form are established. That form goes on from the embryonic stage of an oval and so on to the completed body. At that time by the arising of the eye, ear, nose, tongue body and mind, there are the 5) six ayatanas. The same text says:

As for name and form, if desire arises,
Then the six ayatanas will arise.

Then by gathering together objects, the senses, and mental attention, 6) contact arises. For example, as from bringing together form, the eye organ, and the eye consciousness, the eye-awareness arises, just so, from name, form, and consciousness, in the mother's womb, contact arises. The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

In dependence on these six ayatanas
After that true contact will arise.
In dependence on name and form, and production of memory
There can only be arising or birth.
Thus depending on name and form,
Consciousness will arise.
From name, form and consciousness
That which is gathered together is known as contact. From that contact...

From contact arises 7) feeling. From objects being pleasing, displeasing or in between therefore arise feelings of pleasure, displeasure, or neutrality. The Spiritual Letter says:

Feeling is the source of all.

From feeling, 8) craving proliferates. The child in the mother's womb by feeling pleasure, and liking that, has a craving for happiness and, from feeling pain, and wanting to get rid of that, has a craving to get rid of unhappiness. From the neutral there is craving for equanimity. These three arise. The same text says:

By the condition of feeling there is craving
The object of one's feeling will be craved.

That which is desired from craving will be the object of 9) clinging. The same text says:

Because of craving there is also clinging.
There are four different kinds of clinging.

The Prasannapada says:

Thus there is attachment to feelings, and as for that desire, from having the condition of craving, there is the cause of being impelled, desire, and discipline, and view, and practice, and complete grasping to the four kinds of expressions of ego.

Also at the time of craving there are according, non-accord, what is between the two, and clinging to oneself, those four.

From clinging there is 10 becoming śrid pa As for the five skandhas, form, feeling, perception, formation, and consciousness, since they are becoming, that arises. The same text says:

When close clinging to this object exists
Of the clinger becoming will arise.
If there is no close clinging to the object,
One is liberated with no becoming.
That becoming therefore is the five skandhas.

What is first generated from that, is that future 11) birth arises. The same text says:

From becoming there is birth

Having been born, growing up, 12) aging and dying, with the cessation of life, arise. The same text says:

Old age and death and fearful suffering
And pain together with cries and lamentation
Unhappiness and quarrelsome discord
All of these arise from having been born.

The sutras say:

From that birth old age completely ripens
In death, the decrepit skandhas are destroyed.

As for suffering, while one is a sentient being, while dying, because of delusion there is torment of the heart together with desire. As for lamentation, through suffering such expression of speech is motivated. Suffering is harm within the five senses. Unhappiness happens when unpleasantness occurs. Quarrels arise from so much suffering and unhappiness.

From these interdependent arisings from earlier to later comes what is called causal arising. Since consciousness of inner earth, water, fire, air, space is produced by gathering together the six dhatus, the former said to arise from them as a condition. The Noble Rice Stalk Sutra says:

Similarly the causes for the two inner interdependent arisings arise. What are these two? They are the cause and condition. What is the cause of inner interdependent arising? This is when conditioned by ignorance there are formations. Conditioned by formation, there is consciousness.

What is condition of interdependent arising? It is the gathering together of the six elements. What is that like? It is like this. The gathering of the dhatus of Earth, water, fire, air, space, and consciousness is viewed as the condition of inner dependent arising.

This is from the viewpoint of the mahayana. According to the shravakas, the skandhas are ignorant when there is the karmic action of kleshas from former lives. These five skandhas are formations when there is obscuration from the karma of former lives. The five skandhas are consciousness on the occasion of entering a womb. The five skandhas are name and form in an oval embryo and so forth, before the five senses have developed prominently. The five skandhas are the six ayatanas from the time the gates of sense have developed, and the five skandhas until one is able to perceive objects. The five skandhas become contact after one is able to perceive and grasp objects, but while one does not yet know the particulars of pleasure and pain. The five skandhas are feeling from the time when one grasps the particulars of pleasure and pain, but cannot copulate. The five skandhas are craving from when one grasps the power to copulate but has not accepted an object of desire. The five skandhas are clinging on the occasion of accepting an object of desire. The five skandhas are becoming while subsequently collecting karma. Then in the beginning of the next life, when the five skandhas arise from the mother's womb, that is birth. Then in the name and form of the next life, the four nidanas of the six ayatanas, contact, craving, and feeling age and die. The Rice Stalk says:

What are the ayatanas of name and form?
They are what is subjected to age and death
From feeling up to birth is similar.

The Abhidharmakosha says:

The first ones and the last ones, two and two
Have eight more between completing them.
Ignorance is the occasion of former kleshas.
As for formations it is the five skandhas
Unified with the karma of former consciousness.
Name and form it continues from that time
Until the six ayatanas are developed.
From there until the three collections is contact.
Until feeling knows the causes of pleasure and pain.
From feeling to copulation is called craving.
When one desires the act of copulation
That is the activity of clinging.
Because one has attained it, very quickly
Its fruition, becoming, will arise.
The resulting action also is becoming.
Actually being reborn is the stage of birth.
While one has feeling, there is old age and death.

There are two ways, instantaneous and gradual, of exhausting these twelve links of interdependent origination.

From the instantaneous viewpoint, by the power of self and other, it is impossible that there is a time when life is cut off. Therefore doing evil deeds is ignorance. The aspect of entering into karma from doing evil deeds is formations. The awareness at the time of producing karma is consciousness. Then there are the name and form and the six ayatanas of oneself and others. Then being pierced by the weapon of desiring happiness for oneself and suffering for others is contact. The pleasure and pain of that is formation. From that entering further and further into joy is craving. Remaining into the later arising of that is clinging. Possessing the five skandhas of that is becoming. The present and future aspect of that is birth. The aging and death of that is completed in the instant of completing the action.

Involved in this there are three kinds of instant. First is the smallest instant of vividly entering into knowledge of knowables. Then there is an instant of action, which is a hundred and twenty times that. From the time an action is begun until it is completed is called an instant of completing action. If the continuity is counted, the mind only school maintains that one cycle of cause and effect is completed in two lives. In a former life the six causes are completed. In this the six fruitions are completed. By that one goes to the next life. The six causes are ignorance, formation, consciousness, craving, clinging, and becoming. The six effects are the rest.

According to the shravakas, one round of cause and effect is completed in three lifetimes. Depending on the cause of the ignorance and formations of the former life, the fruition in this life is the five consciousness and so on. In dependence on the cause of the craving, clinging, and becoming of this life, the fruition in the next life is birth, and old age and death. As to the purpose of knowing these the Abhidharmakosha says:

By those between the earlier the and later extremes
Ignorance can completely be eliminated.

With that the explanation of interdependent arising within samsaric existence is completed. Now there are the two kinds of interdependent arising of nirvana. These are those of the path and the fruition.

As for the path, the root of entering into the twelve manners of samsaric interdependent arising is ignorance. That is reversed by the insight of wisdom. By familiarity with the three prajnas, hearing, contemplating, and meditating, the first root, ignorance, is eliminated. By eliminating that, the others depending on that are eliminated one after another. By exhausting the cause of entering into craving, one will cross over from abiding in samsara. The Spiritual Letter says:

By the cessation of birth, all of these will cease.

The Mulamadhyamakakarikas says:

As soon as ignorance ceases
Formations will not arise.
On cessation of ignorance,
By knowledge one meditates.
By the ceasing of that and that
That and that will not manifest.
Suffering and skandhas alone
In that way really cease.

Yogins who aspire to liberation from the cause should not collect the confused karma of samsara. The fruition is that later there will be no samsaric arising, and therefore formations will have been blocked. The same text says:

The root of samsara is conditioned formations.
Therefore the wise do not produce formations.

As for the interdependent arising of the fruition, after buddhahood, the production of benefits for beings is like dream or illusion. This will be extensively explained below. As this knowledge of the inclusion of all dharmas under interdependent arising is itself included within the absolute truth, one passes beyond suffering to nirvana. The same text says:

Whoever has seen interdependent arising
By that has seen the truth of suffering,
The cause of suffering, and its cessation,
And the path to that is seen.

These are called the two storehouses of the great teachings of the Buddha because all dharmas are included within them. Among things that should be known they are of the highest importance.

b) The teaching of appearance as unborn, the explanation of prajna itself,

The meaning resolved by that:

These appearances have been unborn primordially.
Being without an essence, they are like reflections.
Nevertheless, they still appear as variety.

Having seen the interdependence of the pure nature,
We quickly contact the highest level of non-dwelling.

Thus all the appearances of outer and inner dharmas are like the reflection of the moon arising in water. What is without an essence appears as variety. The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

When at night there seem to be moons in water,
Though these appear in clear and untroubled lakes;
The moons in water are empty, hollow, and essenceless.
All dharmas should be known to be like that.

Meditate like that, knowing that the dharmas of samsara and nirvana are natureless. Things appearing as external variety are actually within the insight of non-existent arising. If the mind lets these two rest without emanation and gathering, not perceiving any dharmas other than that, the mind enters into a sky-like state. This absolute space of subsiding is the perfection of prajna. The Bodhicharyavatara says: 9.34

When things and non-things
Do not exist before the mind,
Then without phenomena as other
Without conception, there is perfect peace.

Saraha says:

Liberated from meditation and meditator,
Not moving from that is what is called meditation.
Mind does not exist at such a time.
Mahamudra has no hope of fruition.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Revelation of true and excellent knowables
Depends on the samadhi of meditation.
It is completely free from all the kleshas.
Prajna well explains the livelihood.
They are the highest dharmas of fruition.
The existence of these is said to be three-fold.
Having completely known this kind of prajna,
Capable ones establish reality.

The essence is that knowables are realized. The cause depends on samadhi. As fruition, one is liberated from the kleshas. The Prajnaparamitasamgatha says:

By prajna, when the nature of dharmas has been completely known, one is completely released from the three worlds.

As for the action, with pure livelihood, after the Dharma has been well explained, doubts are cut off. The same text says:

The herd-bull of men, as he turns the precious wheel,
Teaches Dharma to beings so that suffering will be exhausted.

As for the qualities, by prajna one reaches the city of liberation. The divisions are hearing, contemplating, and meditating. The preliminaries, main body, and post-meditation of samadhi are the three prajnas. As for their virtues, the Mahayanasutralankara says:

The buddha sons know all aspects of what phenomena are. Why even mention that they have passed beyond suffering, and that they are the retinue where attachment of mind is completely unborn.

c) Summary of Prajna

By this same prajna all beings are established in the three enlightenments of body, speech, and mind. By the wisdom of prajna being completely grasped, one is inexhaustibly established in the pure worlds. Without prajna one will not have the fortune of liberation:

Having prajna, we will be set free by upaya.
Just as saying a mantra can stop the action of poison,
If there is no prajna, upaya will put us in bondage.
Tormenting us like a medicine that itself becomes a disease.
Therefore, arouse the prajna that sees the natural state.

The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Kashyapa, those who possess prajna are completely liberated by upaya.
Those who do not possess prajna are completely bound by upaya.

The Dohakosha says:

Those who dwell in emptiness, separate from compassion
Never will attain the path to supremacy.
But if one meditates on compassion alone
These too abide in samsara, and do not attain liberation.

Those who are able to join the two of these
Have an abode in neither samsara nor nirvana.

Also:

By that which is a chain for binding fools,
Capable ones are quickly liberated.

Knowing the nature of all dharmas, if one strives to the utmost, one will quickly be liberated. The Noble Sutra Showing the Arrangement says:

Those who with great earnestness and exertion fully practice this dharma; the unborn, unceasing, utterly profound emptiness; will quickly become conversant with the dharmadhatu of the bodhisattvas. They will have perfect retention and confident speech, completely gather the unsurpassable dharmas, be praised by the buddha bhagavats, and abide in completely pure discipline. Having attained completely pure patience, unsurpassable exertion, meditation without conception, and the great prajna, they will quickly become completely enlightened. By being in the heart of enlightenment, with their parasols borne by the four great kings, they will be supplicated to turn the wheel of Dharma. Producing the great light for gods and human beings, they will fully establish them in enlightenment.

7) Summarizing the meaning of these six perfections

Now, for the concluding summary, from generosity to prajna:

When we are in the practice of the six paramitas
We should know that we are beings like illusion.
Not perceiving their three-fold division in samsara,
By the wholesomeness of the two accumulations
We attain the peaceful level of the Victorious One.

Thus by the collective wholesomeness of these six perfections, from the moment of performing them without attachment to the true existence of the ego of a doer, an object of action, and a virtuous act, with the attitude of an emanation or illusion-like action, one will quickly attain buddhahood. The Sutra of the Clouds of the Three Jewels says:

Whoever does not conceptualize virtue or anything that is done, will gather the two accumulations of merit and wisdom with non-conceptual perfect exertion. These should be practiced with the attitude that they are like a mirage, an illusion, or an emanation.

If by prajna there is pure view, and by upaya there is pure action, one will not stray from the path. Flawless buddhahood will be established. The siddhis of flying in the sky and so forth will be accomplished. Atisha says:

Thus if the view is completely unobscured
And the action is completely pure,
One will not go upon the path of straying,
And will go to the place of Akanishta.

c. The dedication of merit for the three general topics

Now the merit is dedicated for the benefit of sentient beings:

Thus by the rain that falls from these clouds of auspiciousness,
The crop of sanity grows within the minds of beings.
Impoverished by the host of evils of samsara,
May the weariness of mind today be brought to rest.

The virtuous roots of intellect and the pure space of the spotless fields, arising as the natural state, pile up as thick clouds. By the cooling rain of Dharma amrita continuously falling, for all beings, when the harvest of exertion in the supreme virtue of Holy Dharma has been established, may the poverty of samsara and all its sufferings of poverty mentality be pacified. May they be satisfied by the virtues of the essence of enlightenment. May their weariness be eased.

In the assembly of tormenting fires of suffering of this world
By the continuous falling of the rain of Dharma amrita
After all beings have realized the absoluteness of mind,
Cooled and refreshed, may they attain the ocean of wisdom.

In this beautiful ocean filled with lotus buddha qualities,
Relying with sincere devotion on the paths and bhumis,
Moved by the shining waves which are the six perfections
May they swim in the sea of vastness of the two accumulations.

Having seen all dharmas to be like dream and illusion
May the mind of attachment to true existence vanish.
May the state like emanation produce the³²⁸ accumulations.
May the entire phenomenal world of samsara/nirvana
Be revealed as total purity in a single instant.

Chapter IX: UNIFYING THE DEVELOPING STAGE AND THE PERFECTING STAGE

After training our being by the paths of the ordinary vehicles, comes the path manifesting the unified kayas within one lifetime. The ninth topic of the main subject is the chapter on the Practice of Unifying the Developing Stage and the Perfecting Stage. The general topic has three sections,

- A. Resolving the view
- B. Practicing the meditation
- C. Dedicating the merit.

A. Resolving the view,

There are nine sections

1. The instruction to train in the vajrayana, the essence of the teachings:

When the excellent mind of bodhicitta has been aroused,
We can enter into the stages of developing and completion,
As they occur in the outer and inner secret mantra.

As just explained, after being taught how to enter according to the vehicles of cause and characteristics, as the fruition, there is the instruction to enter the vehicles of secret mantra. The details of these vehicles are the current topic.

2. Why mantrayana is more noble than the stages of characteristics.

Why?

Here there are many means and also no difficulties.
Though the meaning is one with that of the other yantras,
There is no confusion about the means of entering.
Those of the sharpest powers are empowered in these four,
Kriya, Charya, and yoga, and also anuttara.

Though the buddha taught inconceivably many vehicles in accord with the minds of sentient beings, they are all included within three. The mahayana is taught to have the duality of cause and fruition. The causal vehicles are taught to be the means of first entering. Their fruition is taught to be the vajrayana. The Net of Miracles of Manjushri says:

By the skillful means of the various vehicles,
Having the divisions of the benefit of beings,
As for the definite outcome of the three vehicles,
It exists as fruition, the single vehicle.

These vehicles are also ascertained as two. Since individuals in the mahayana have two families, it is taught that there are two kinds of skillful means or paths. Individuals who have little craving for desirable qualities or who have renounced these desirable qualities, and wish for liberation, are taught the bodhisattva vehicle. For those unable to abandon desirable qualities, there is the skillful means of the stages of secret mantra.

These two families train in their two paths until the path of seeing arises. The time when this arises is called the path of seeing by the bodhisattvas. This same wisdom of complete non-thought is designated "the supreme siddhi of mahamudra" by mantrayana.³²⁹ The time until this arises, using the individual methods³³⁰ of these paths, is respectively long and short.

In the vehicle of characteristics, apparent aggression is abandoned, and by kindness alone without many other means, the attempt is made to gain the one benefit or goal, establishing the fruition. There are great agonies of asceticism. It is not skillful in profound means of practice. Since it is a means of practice for those whose powers are relatively dull, all this is practiced by dualistic abandoning and antidotes. Since the aspect to be abandoned is not brought to the path, half of what there is never becomes part of the path. This is a narrow path and a lesser cause of enlightenment.

The tantras reject those methods. When apparent aggression is produced, there are many means for dealing with it. Here too there may be kindness, or in the developing stage it is seen as illusion-like, or in the completion stage as the wisdom of non-thought, or by working with that very aggression, it becomes the mirror-like wisdom, and so forth. Asceticism of body, speech, and mind plays a minor part. When the single goal is established, since this and that means beyond the scope of thought are possessed, it is established with certainty. Having been produced for those of sharpest powers, kriya, upa, yoga, and the great yoga of anuttara-tantra are taught. The Lamp of the Three Methods says:

Not unintelligent about the single goal,
Having many means and therefore not ascetic,
Having been produced for those with the sharpest powers,
The mantra vehicles are especially noble

3. Why those to be tamed are taught

Why are these four tantras taught?

They are graded by time and caste, and powers of the mind.
The yugas are krita and treta, dvapara and kali.
Bhramins and kshatriyas, vaishyas and shudras³³¹ are the castes;
The powers are dull and average; sharp and very sharp.

Kriya chiefly teaches baths and cleansing rites.
Chary teaches that actions of the body and speech
Are equal in importance with meditations of mind.
Yoga teaches that meditation is most important.
Actions of body and speech are just accompaniments.

Anuttara is free from actions of the three gates.
There is no conception of separate subject and object.
Their ultimate concern is the luminous nature of mind.
Cleansing rites are few, or even are discarded.

In regard to time, kriya is completed in one kalpa. Since there will be no cause of manifesting the kleshas of a sentient being, like the humanoids of Kurava the northern continent, kriya yogins do not depend on vows and discipline, or virtuous antidotes of mind. Purificatory rites of body and speech and actions alone become the focus.

In regard to the four castes, the bhramin or priestly caste is tamed by means of rites of purification and asceticism, without engaging in others. Those of dull powers who do not understand the great undertakings of mind, can see this Dharma of actions of body and speech, and enter into those. Depending on those three purposes they are taught tantras chiefly teaching washing, rites, and purification, Amoghabasha, and Supreme Insight, Well Established, the Appearance of the Three Worlds, etc.

Also, this is most taught in the first krita yuga, because little secret and stealthy desire arises as a cause of manifesting kleshas.

In the times of enjoyment and light karma of the treta yuga, actions of body and speech are constrained, and objects of purification and rites become one of two goals, for those of the warrior-ruler kshatriya caste who are not so entirely devoted to purification rites. Having realized things realizable by middling powers, they are taught upa tantras, the Lotus Peak and others with their three families of deities. Acts of body and speech and meditation of mind are equally taught.

In the dvapara yuga, kleshas are coarser, and meditating according to mental activity and so forth becomes the goal. The merchant vaishya caste is widely devoted, and this is taught for those who are capable and of sharp powers, chiefly with mental meditation, with those of body and speech just as an accompaniment. In yoga tantra they abandon the lower realms and are taught the Vajra Space and so forth.

In the kali yuga, when lives are about a hundred years, the dark age, the time of indolence of impetuous stupidity, the goal will come about only by means of mind. Tribal people or the shudra caste, have no purificatory rites at all, but great ascetic discipline. This is to be realized by those of very sharp powers, from all actions of body, speech, and mind not being conceptualized with grasping and fixation, accepting and rejecting, asserting and denying, hope and fear and so forth, but being realized as non-dual. Since the nature of mind, the greatness of primordial buddhahood is self-existing, there is the great dharma that seeks for no other buddha than that, anuttara yoga tantra. The Net of Miracles with its short explanation of peaceful and wrathful deities, Chakrasamvara, Guhyasamaja and so forth are taught. The Secret Establishment says:

Since students have the time
And the fortune of being tamed
The four great styles of mantra
Are famed throughout the world.

4. The three from kriya to yoga

These individual stages are explained:

The Sage has said that the tantras of kriya, charya, and yoga
Are the tantras of action, total comportment, and mental union.

Kriya is the tantra of action, upa that of comportment, and yoga that of yogic union. These three famous tantras were taught by the Sage. They resemble the vehicles of external marks in having rites of purification and vows of activity. The Sage called them the tantra or continuity vehicles.

5. How these are classified as the external secret mantra

As for these great tantras:

These are the outer mantra. One cannot meditate
On yab yum deities, united in sexual union.
There is no teaching of the five meats and the five amritas.
They remain entirely in rites of purification.

In kriya and upa tantra there are male and female sattvas. These deities of vidya mantra and dharani remain in the manner of master and servant and companion respectively, and there is no union with them. In yoga tantra the great four-fold arrangement of the mandala is taught as sambhogakaya, but there is no union with it. By meditating successively on upaya and prajna, the developing and completion stages are separated. There is no use of the five meats and five amritas as samaya substances. These are grasped as defiled objects to be purified. The Tantra of the Play of the Great Power says:

Clouds of enjoyment of upaya and prajna
Are the principal means of establishing wisdom.
As for the five meats and the five amritas
And the highest play of mahasukha
These wonderful ways of being are absent here.
Those with the lesser fortune of tormenting rites
Of purity do not have such things as these.

6. The divisions of the three inner tantras

As for the divisions of the three inner tantras:

There are three divisions within anuttara tantra,
These are the father and mother and the non-dual tantras.
Respectively each of these has as its emphasis
The developing and perfecting stages and their union.
These three yantras are known as maha, anu, and ati.
The deities may unite, and in holy substances
There is no distinction of what is clean or defiled.

Rather it is taught that all is of one taste,
Regarded as the play of a single mandala.

The Guhyasamaja and the Yamantaka and such yoga tantras are mahayoga, the aspect of the skillful means of the developing stage. the completion stage of mahayoga chiefly teaches prana. These include Yangdak, Vajrakilaya, Chakrasamvara, Hevajra, and so forth.

The prajna mother tantras are called anu yoga. Chiefly the completion stage of prajna is taught. The completion stage also chiefly works with the elements of bodhicitta and bindu, desiring the completely non-conceptual wisdom of bliss and emptiness.

The non-dual tantras, The Great Net of Illusion and so forth, are called ati yoga. This chiefly teaches the essence of prajna and upaya without adding and taking away, the union of the developing and fulfilling stages. In the completion stage from prana, nadi, and bindu are created bliss, luminosity, and non-thought, and the inconceivable luminosity of the great wisdom. Each of these three, as a symbol of the union of upaya and prajna, visualizes the embrace of yab yum. Since the meaning of this is being without accepting and rejecting, denying and asserting, clean and defiled, and such accepting and rejecting of good and bad, there is a play of samaya substances such as meat and liquor and so forth, and it is maintained that all dharmas are one in the enlightened mandala of primordial buddhahood. The king of the tantras that ascertain the suchness of the secret essence The Great Net of Illusion says:

Since it is the characteristic of all dharmas that they have a single essence with primordial buddhahood, they are inseparable from it.

7. How these are individually maintained

As for the way of maintaining these tantras:

In kriya we are inferior and the gods supreme.
We are like servants and the deities are the masters.
By practicing in that style, the siddhis will be received.

In Chary we view ourselves and the gods as being equal.

We are samayasattva, the deity jnanasattva.
The deity occupies the space in front of us.
Siddhi is received in the style of two friends.
In yoga while the two are actually non-dual,
The god is summoned to union and afterward dismissed.
Siddhi is received like water poured into water.

In kriya tantra, the jnanasattva deity is said to be like a king. We as servants hope to receive siddhi. The Tantra of Receiving the Siddhis of all the Families says:

The lord is viewed as a king,
And we see ourselves as servants.
Siddhi, the essence of tantra,
Is excellently received.

As for upa tantra, in front of the samayasattva, our visualization of the deity, we receive siddhi from the jnanasattva deity, visualized as a friend or companion. The Razor of the Three Families says:

With the deity as friend or companion
Ultimate siddhi is to be received.

In yoga tantra, we meditate on ourselves in union with the deity. The jnanasattvas of union are drawn in and dissolve into us. By sealing with the four mudras and so on, even when the offerings, praises, recitation, and so forth have been finished, one still supplicates. When non-duality actually occurs, siddhi is said to arise. The Dorje Jungwa says:

We receive non-dual dharmadhatu and
The highest ultimate siddhi.

We are blessed with the tathagata, padma, and vajra families of the external mantra, sealed with the samaya, dharma, karma, and maha-mudras.

8. The ways in which the highest three are the principal ones

As for mahayoga-tantra:

In maha, the chief means is prana and the developing stage;
In anu the dhatu and prajna in the completion stage;
In ati it is the wisdom where everything is non-dual;
But in all of them all dharmas are eternal equality.
The practice is done in the style of knowing that this is so.

Since all dharmas exist as primordially unborn emptiness, the nature of mind is known to be natureless like the sky. As for the practice, the Secret Assembly says:

Since these things are primordially unborn,
There are neither dharmas nor dharmata.
They are natureless like the space of the sky.
This is the way enlightenment is taught.

This was explained above. The *Miracles of Fierce Lightning*³³² says:

E ma'o! free from all dharmas of things,
Free from skandhas and dhatus, and ayatanas,
We completely abandon grasping and fixation.
Since all dharmas are natureless equality,
One's own mind is also primordially unborn.
This is what is called the nature of emptiness

When this is known, the stage of visualizing the mandalas of the father tantras of upaya becomes upaya. The pranas of the five elements are completely purified. Luminosity/emptiness, the wisdom of complete non-thought, is the main point. By that the supreme and ordinary siddhis are established.

In the mother tantras of prajna, complexities of the developing stage are minimized. The dhatu of the great bliss, the space of speech, is the mandala of the bhaga or womb of the syllables. In the stages leading to supreme enlightenment, another's body is the prajna or mudra, and in one's own body, depending on upaya, mahasukha establishes enlightenment by the wisdom of the four joys.

In the non-dual tantras, as distinguished from both these stages, luminous dharmata, the great wisdom without one and many, is the main point and enlightenment is established. There is the three-fold luminosity of bliss, clarity, and non-thought. First from the workable dhatu self-existing samadhi arises. From that, supreme unchanging bliss pervades the whole of space, filling it with undefiled bliss. In the central channel the great essential clarity of the other two luminosities occurs. By the power of the inner five pranas, the motionless luminous clarity of wisdom arises in the four dhyanas. Externally the five lights of the five wisdoms, appearing as kaya, bindu, and shining light, fill the whole of space. The Net of Miracles of Manjushri says:

This vivid shining of the light of wisdom
Is the lamp of wisdom which is the light of beings.
This, the great brilliance, is luminosity.

Also:

To view possession of the garland of brilliance is sweet.
The blazing light of goodness is the glorious knot of eternity.

As the radiance of the five lights enters into the central channel, when the essence of the earth prana enters, mind rests within it. As external yellow light illuminates Ratnasambhava, pride is transmuted and the wisdom of equality is revealed. We are empowered with the samadhi of the ground of exhaustion, crossing to the southern ratna family pure land, Ratnakuta.³³³

By the essence of the water prana entering the central channel, within it the essence of undisturbed mind is illuminated. Externally, by white light by illuminating Akshobhya, the mirror-like wisdom is revealed. Hatred is purified. We are empowered with the exhaustion-water samadhi, crossing to the eastern vajra family pure land, Abhirati.

By the prana of the fire essence entering into the central channel, within it the blissful heat arises. Externally by red light illuminating Amitabha, discriminating awareness wisdom is revealed. We cross to the western padma family pure land, Sukhavati.

By the prana of the air essence entering into the central channel, within the movement and increase of mind is attained. Externally, by green light illuminating Amoghasiddhi, the all-accomplishing wisdom is realized. Envy is purified. We are empowered with the exhaustion-prana samadhi, crossing to the northern karma family pure land of, Karmaprasiddhi.

By the prana of the supreme non-conceptual space essence, universal dharmata, entering into the central channel, within there is complete non-thought. Externally, by blue light illuminating Vairocana, the dharmadhatu wisdom is revealed. Ignorance is purified. We are empowered with the exhaustion sky-realm, Akanishta Gandavyuha, the pure land of Heavenly Enjoyment. The Great Net of Illusion says:

Thus the fortunate yogin
Has the five lights of the wisdoms.
The five kayas cross to their lands.
The five exhaustions are gained.

9. The way of meditating on all dharmas as the nature of the mandala

Now as for the teaching that all dharmas, as the complete perfection of buddhahood, have the nature of the three mandalas:

Since we and all other beings are primordially enlightened,
The style of meditation involved in the two stages
Sees the dharmas of skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas
As being the luminosity of a single mandala.

All dharmas should be known to be of the nature of the three mandalas of primordial buddhahood. Within the mandala of the nature of the ground as spontaneous presence, there is conviction about the view. Within the mandala of the path as profound samadhi, one practices meditation. Within the mandala of the fruition as supreme enlightenment, the two benefits are perfected.

Within the first there are two divisions. These are the pure ground, the natural state, and the impure ground, the way of confusion. The first is the primordially empty nature of mind, the essence of dharmakaya. Its arising as the luminous nature of sambhogakaya is the source of nirmanakaya. It is open and accommodating like the sky. It is luminous like the sun and moon. As with a wish-fulfilling gem, all that is desired is self-arising. The five kinds of kaya, speech, mind, quality, and action exist primordially as the intrinsic qualities of buddhahood. The Secret Essence says:

Emptiness is the mind of self-awareness.
This is primordial knowledge of egolessness.
There is neither concept nor conceiver.
Therefore the fixated memory is transformed.
Wondrous body and speech and the field of qualities
Are the same and not other. That is how it is.

Also the All-Creating King says:

Kye! listen to me mahasattva:

The nature of me, the doer of all, enlightenment
Is a self-existing nature that does not need to be sought.
This is trikaya, the essence of all the victorious ones.
My uncreated nature exists as dharmakaya.
My uncreated essence is sambhogakaya.
My manifested compassion is nirmanakaya.
No fruition established by seeking has been taught.
Primordial self existence, it does not need to be sought.

Above what is referred to by such passages was called the dhatu or essence. This exists primordially with the spontaneous presence of the buddha qualities.

The impure ground, the way of confusion, is as already described. The Secret Essence says:

E Ma'o, from out of sugatagarbha
Comes the confusion of karma, our discursive thoughts.
Variety, mind, and action, existing, suffering and such;
The "me" and the "mine" are grasped as being individuals.

Also:

It is faulty concepts that are the root of samsara.
These have their arising when there are thoughts of self.
The powers of sense, birth and destruction, body and action,
The infernal machine of existing, suffering, and so on;
Is nothing whatsoever except a misconception.

From the individual rounds of beings within the six lokas, in particular for human beings, at the beginning of their confusion, when they are grasped by existence in a womb, at first the two eyes and the knot of nadis in the navel develop. Then the body is produced from the essences which will become the sense-faculties, existing as the three nadis. Within them are the three syllables OM AH HUM. Externally these produce the three supports of body, speech, and mind. Internally, they produce the three supports of passion, aggression, and ignorance. Secretly they produce the supports of enlightened body, speech, and mind.

The central channel reaches above to the aperture of Bhrama, and below to the secret place. The white Roma nadi and red Kyangma are to right and left of the light blue central channel. In enlightened body, speech, and mind they are the three-fold existence of mahasukha.

Mutually and continuously they have twenty-one knots. These are the chakras of the nadis: The navel emanation chakra has sixty-four nadi petals. The throat enjoyment chakra has sixteen. The heart dharmachakra has eight nadi petals. If they are joined with the four kayas and the different wisdoms, in addition to these, at the crown of the head, there is the chakra of great bliss with thirty-two nadi petals. From the viewpoint of the five self-existing kayas, in addition to these, in the secret place, is the chakra of guarding bliss with seventy-two nadi petals, which has the powers of the essential elements.

If the six chakras are listed in order, the secret center is the chakra of wisdom. The throat center is the chakra of enjoyment-activity. The central channel is the chakra of mahasukha. The crown of the head is the chakra of the realm of space. The heart is the dharmachakra. The navel is the chakra of emanation.

According to The Net of Illusion, they are the seeds of purifying the impure six kinds of sentient beings. The purifiers are the six sages of the six realms. When they are purified by the six perfections, the six wisdoms, the usual five wisdoms plus the inconceivable wisdom, are attained.

Each chakra with the first knot between each one makes twelve. Completing these at the end, pure prana as a thirteenth is maintained to complete the bhumi of the great wisdom.

The Kalachakra has six chakras and six nadis between them. These have twelve kinds of ejection of prana, associated with the twelve nidanas. The power of not ejecting bindu, turning it back above to the secret wisdom chakra, is said to be a sign of the first bhumi. One kind of ejection of prana is stopped. One nidana is purified. Similarly, between that and the space of the sky chakra twelve levels are crossed. Twelve kinds of ejection of prana are stopped. Twelve nidanas are purified. By the bindu reaching the sky realm chakra, it is maintained that one is enlightened.

According to the Root tantra of Miracle there are two chakras. These are the peaceful heart chakra and the wrathful crown chakra. Within these the coarse nadis are equal to the number of deities. These are 42 and 58, 100 altogether. The fine nadis are countless. The Great Illusion says:

Roma, Kyangma, and Kundarma.

Are between the chakras like pillars.

The branching petals are countless.

As for elements and pranas,

The descending wisdom nadis

Are a thousand in number.

As the square of seventy two,

There are twenty thousand

And 600,000 pranas.

These have been maintained

to be the great moving ones.

There are 84,000 others.

The Five Hundred Thousand says:

The associated nadis

Spread and fill the body

These 72,000 nadis.

In the body are goddesses.

Also:

Of the 72000 nadis,

the different kinds are explained.

In one day there are said to be 620,000 actions of prana. They make up a "horse" to carry the 84,000 small moving ones, whose number is equal to that of the false conceptions and kleshas. When kleshas are moving about, it is maintained that an equal number of these pranas are moving about. By nature the male prana, "moving upward," dwells above, and the female prana, "downward voiding," dwells below. As for the mother, if the I prana "equally-abiding" co-exists, the three existences are explained.

As for the pranas in the nadis there are the following:

1 life-holder,

2 equalizer,

3 fire,

4 upward moving,

5 downward voiding.

As said above. The actions are

1 maintaining life,

2 bodily existence,

3 making heat,

4 the exhaling and inhaling of the breath,

5 going, staying and casting off impurities.

These are called ordinary and the five external pranas.

The five internal pranas are the five pranas of the five elements. These are:

the yellow earth prana,
the red fire prana,
the white water prana,
the green air prana,
the blue space prana.

As for their functions, they exist as a support for the inner skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas. When impure they are the ground of proliferation of the five poisons, and when pure of the five wisdoms.

The five secret pranas, the five wisdoms, have no coarse forms.

The great essential elements are two, the white and the red. From roma and kyangma they abide in the petals of the individual nadis. For women, left and right are reversed. In particular, the moon, roma, descends from above at the crown of the head. The sun, kyangma, rises from the A below in the secret place.

In a man's kyangma and woman's roma at the bottom there is a knot, so that the red and white elements do not drip. As the knots in the nadis are released, the virtues of the paths and bhumis are perfected. As the knots in the central channel are released, two by two, each of the ten bhumis are perfected. In attaining the good qualities of those, each of the essential elements and prana elements seem to enter them.

For example, as the first two nadi knots are released, the two essences enter into the central channel. When the four great nadis of the navel emanation chakra are released, the qualities of the first bhumi appear to arise. When the nadis of the four chakras are released, the four kayas are attained and the four wisdoms manifest.

Now in the ordinary nadi knots the red and white essences exist as the embrace of the hero and heroine. The veins are like water pipes, and the elements like the water inside them. Prana is like pressure. Their going and coming when moved by that, constitute the vajra body. This is the support of the great wisdom.

In particular in the Mahamaya Tantra, in the empty center of the heart, the essences go into eight subtle nadis as if they were being licked up. There are three dharmata nadis, one wisdom nadi, three autonomy nadis, and one quality nadi. The Secret Drop of Vimala says:

The way they exist is known to be eight-fold.

The commentary says:

In the empty center of the heart, the essence in the nadis goes into the eight subtle nadis as if they were being licked up.³³⁴ There are three dharmata nadis, one wisdom nadi, three autonomy nadis, and one quality nadi. These eight should be known like that.

The central three are the support of the unchanging dharmata of trikaya. In front the nadi of mirror-like wisdom produces the support of the four wisdoms. Behind and to the right are the nadis of qualities producing the support of the arising of the buddha fields, palaces and so forth. To the left, by the three poisons autonomy nadi, confused appearance of the individuating characteristics of the three realms is produced.

Moreover, in the sheath³³⁵ of the dharmata nadi, in the midst of drops of yellow light, the letters of the ground of purification, SU and TRI, are the seeds of asuras and animals. The purifier OM is the essence of the kayas and wisdoms. The intrinsic light of the syllables is like a brocade tent. In the square sheath of the blue wisdom nadi, is the purifier HUM and the ground of purification the seeds of gods and human beings A and NRI [with backwards kiku] They have white, red, and blue light.

In the red semi-circular sheath of the autonomy syllables the purifier is AH and the ground of purification is the seeds of the pretas and hell beings PRE and DU. Also at the time of impurity, habitual patterns produced by karma and kleshas are collected above the six syllables. The retinue created by anger, resentment, and so on are collected above the DU; by desire above the PRE; by pride above A and NRI; by envy above SU; and those created by ignorance are collected above the TRI. At the time of realization, the virtues of the intrinsically-existing power of wisdom are collected above the three syllables of body, speech, and mind.

Meditations on forms of the deities and so on connected with body are placed above OM. Those involving mantra recitation and so on are above AH. Meditation on non-thought and so on are above HUM. The letters that are the ground of purification and all the habitual patterns above them are purified. The same text says:

In the dharmata-nadi a yellow light dwells. The shape is spherical. It is like flowing mercury. The essence is OM. The seed is SU and TRI. The colors of these three are like a brocade tent.

Within the wisdom nadi is a blue light. Its shape is square. It is like a noose or coiled snake. It is like a lump of violet amethyst crystals. The essence is HUM. The seeds are A and NRI.

In the autonomy nadi is a red light. Its shape is a red semi-circle. The style is of illusory refreshing-cleansing water like the brilliant arising of dawn. The color is the red of molten copper. The essence is AH. The seeds are PRE and DU.

At the time of non-realization, with A NRI and so forth, it is the cause of samsara. At the time of realization, there are TE O and so forth. Mixing these two is called "quasi-mixing, since bodhicitta is as before."

The four nadis are the natural state of consciousnesses. The same text says:

The four aspects, and six particulars, in the middle of eight...

Four refers to the dharmata, wisdom, autonomy, and quality nadis. As for the particulars, there is yellow light existing as alaya consciousness, blue light existing as the mind consciousness, red light existing as klesha-mind, and dark red light existing as the five sense-consciousnesses.

At the side of the yellow light are OM SU, and TRI. Covered by the blue light are HUM A and NRI. Covered by the red light are AH PRE and DU. The dark red light has the faults and virtues.

A and NRI cause corruption of the breath. SU and TRI cause corruption of the nadis. PRE and DU cause corruption of the blood.

As for the arising of gods and human beings, by producing the mind consciousness, the seeds A and NRI are embodied.

As for the arising of animals and asuras, by producing alayavijnana, the seeds SU and TRI are embodied.

As for the arising of the pretas and hell beings, from producing the five consciousnesses and klesha mind, the seeds PRE and DU are embodied.

Thus all the sentient beings of the six lokas individually exist.

In the center of the eight nadis in the heart center, is the essence of the nadis, like white silk cords, very fine, like twisted single hairs of a horse's tail. The mixed essence of blood and breath, is very subtle, consisting of dharmakaya bodhicitta having light of the five colors, the luminosity of dharmata. The Description of the Marks says:

The splendid knot of eternity of excellent blazing light.

In the heart palace of the dharma field of Akanishta, the buddha embodying the tathagatas of the five families, Samantabhadra, remains continuously for all time. The Two Examinations says:

The great wisdom has its dwelling in the body.
Conceptions are abandoned in the truth.
Universal wisdom pervades all things.
Embodied existence does not arise from the body

Also:

This is also known as great sugatagarbha.

The Uttaratantra says:

Because the perfect buddha kaya radiates
Because of being inseparable from suchness,
And because of having the gotra, all embodied beings,
Always have the essence of buddhahood.

The Dohakosha says:

Though there is something somewhere, in a certain place,
That does not entail that it must always be seen.
It is explained by the shastras of the capable ones,
That buddhahood in the body is not realized.

Buddhahood is the wisdom nadi. When all the essences of prana and mind are gathered together, the field of nirvana, spontaneous appearance, the house of light, the wisdom-lamp of the bardo, arises. This is the completely pure field of Akanishta called Gandavyuha. If yogins make an effort, all the essences of prana and mind will be perfected there. The aspect of appearance, the five lights, and the aspect of emptiness, dharmakaya, will be mixed in one taste. The two accumulations of the path will be completed. As the two kayas manifest we become "enlightened in Akanishta."

The light of wisdom in the central channel and the nadis are one with this, in the sense that the nature of mind is the support of luminosity. How is this explained? From the central channel, in the center of the heart, comes very subtle light like ten separately divided single hairs of a horse's tail transparently existing, connecting the pranas.

If it is made into a support, some masters say that this is the true central channel, so that the three nadis need not be combined in the central channel. Though they explain it that way, since as all the pranas enter the central channel, the essence of the prana of the central channel must enter into the wisdom nadi, it is suitable for them to be connected.

At the time of death all the essences and pranas collect in the central channel. The pranas and essences of the central channel are gathered into the ultimate essence, and from that luminosity is maintained to arise. The kayas and fields of the five families are taught to arise by the essence of this during five days of dhyana in the bardo. Therefore this essence is the very secret great ultimate secret. The Commentary of the Secret Drop says:

"In the center of the eight,"

They are therefore one. Thus the essences of the nadis go into the eight subtle nadis as if they were being licked up. Their shape is said to be like eight twisted cords.

The eight main essences, the ultimate nadi essences, are like white silk cords, with a shape is like twisted cords. In size, they are like ten divided hairs of a horse's tail. Within these, which are like white silk cords, goes the blood essence of a vibrant vermilion like the mother's essence. Within that the essence of breath like bright, pure gold in a brocade, curls like steam. Within that the breath essence is light of various colors. The interior of that light is called the center. "Na," in, has the meaning that they abide within it.

In the center of that light abides the great bindu, bodhicitta. It is like precious jewel anthers in a pipe of molten gold or filled full of the white precious stone kekeru. It abides there with a color like the rising sun. Since that is the essence of dharmadhatu, the cause of the absolute and relative, "I prostrate to that."

Since this luminous nature of mind is all-pervading, all beings are primordially enlightened. Even when they are wandering in samsara, that mind does not move and is not harmed or degraded. By their being enlightened it is no better than it was before. The Uttaratantra says:

Later as before,
Changeless dharmata.

The Fierce Lightning says:

Clouds of bodhicitta spread and pervade everywhere, as oil pervades sesame seeds.

Then also this is taught:

E Ma'o, Primordial Dharma completely pure.
Though it appears as variety, conceptually it is secret.
This is because its essence is inexpressible.
It is hard to teach to those who are not vessels.

E Ma'o, In the primordial purity of the three-fold world,
By faulty conceptions conceiving of ego, the root of samsara,
Beings who have aimlessly wandered over a very long time
Grasp at inappropriate objects of joy and sorrow.
By the power of errors of their wrong conception,
They wander among the turning wheels of samsara.
Without things of wrong conception there is bodhicitta.
Even that hellish machine is its inexhaustible ornament.
The five degenerations are places of happiness.
The five skandhas are completely perfected as the kayas.
The root of samsara itself, all our faulty conceptions,
Is explained to be the essence of enlightenment.
The outer and inner vessel and contents of the world
Are thus the father and the mother of the enlightened state

By that it is taught that all dharmas exist as bodhicitta. With that the teaching of the way of confusion of impure sentient beings is completed. Now there is the teaching that all is primordially enlightened.

The five skandhas, though apparently impure, have the enlightened nature of the five fathers. The five elements have the enlightened natures of their five consorts. All concepts are enlightened in the mandala of bodhicitta, and there is not even an atom of dharmas other than that. The Secret Essence says:

E Ma'o,
As for the five-fold limbs of the vajra skandhas,
They are known as the five perfected buddhas.
The many dhatus and ayatanas
Are the various bodhisattvas appearing in person.³³⁶

Earth and water are Lochana and Mamaki.

Fire and air Pandaravasini and Tara.

The space of sky is the consort of the Lord.³³⁷

Everything in the three realms is the Dharma.
Without remainder this is the buddha field.
Dharmas that are other than buddhahood
Never will be found by buddhahood.

In particular, buddhahood is the luminous nature of mind. The Kunje says:

As for there being a buddha who is other than the mind,
This has never been taught by the King, the Doer of All.
It will not be taught later and it is not taught now.
Therefore we should know that mind is buddhahood

The Secret Assembly says:

External to the preciousness of mind,
There are no buddhas and there are no sentient beings.

The Establishment of Wisdom says:

Ultimate luminosity of mind,
Total purity of buddhahood,
Self-arising, unmade by anyone,
Having existed from all eternity.

In brief, all appearances are the mandala of body. All sounds are the mandala of speech. All cognitive apprehension³³⁸ is the mandala of mind. These three should be known. The Kunje says:

Kye! the teacher of teachers! The doer of all, the King,
Makes a display of the essence mandala of body.
Thus all the dharmas of appearance and existence
Have been displayed as the unborn state of dharmadhatu.
For the sake of their inmost meaning, “No accepting, no rejecting,”³³⁹
This too is displayed by me, the doer of all, the King.

Kye! the teacher of teachers! The doer of all, the King,
Makes a display of the essence mandala of speech.
Thus are all dharmas, resounding with the voice of meaning,³⁴⁰
Revealed to be³⁴¹ the spoken word of unborn space.
They embody the inexpressible heart of speech.³⁴²
This too is my display, as the doer of all, the King.

Kye! the teacher of teachers! The doer of all, the King,
Makes a display of the essence mandala of insight.³⁴³
All concepts involved with knowing and remembering
Are seen as myself, the unborn, the doer of everything.
The body, speech, and mind of me, the doer of all,
Are mandalas resting in uncreated naturalness.³⁴⁴

Having realized the meaning of this state
Perfected in a moment, without any need for arrangement,
One enters the essential heart of the self-existing.

Thus the appearance of variety is produced. Since it is natureless, it is exhaustion/perfection.³⁴⁵ The mandala of the fundamental meaning should be known to be without producer or produced. Regarding the nature of that mandala, the same text says:

Kye, as for the mandala of me the Doer of All,
It is taught as a perfect self-arising mandala.
By perfecting the essence of all without remainder,
There is no birth and there is no proliferation
The uncreated mandala is perfect all at once.

Kye, in the center without error, essence of the meaning,
Samsara is perfected as the bliss of samsara/nirvana.

That is the mandala that is the root of all essences.
Realize that all mandalas are included in that.

Kye, the mandala of me the King, the Doer of All,
Is the perfect mandala of all without remainder.
By whoever perfects it, that will be realized
Learn the meaning of the uncreated mandala.

Kye by me the teacher of teachers, the Doer of All,
By the unborn mandala of bodhicitta,
All-pervading, without any coming and any going,
By realizing that one enters the meaning of the unborn.

Therefore, vajra beings, you as well as I,
Should realize the meaning that does not exist in the world.
Anyone who has the realization of that
Will be empowered as the King, the Doer of All.

All the skandhas, dhatus, ayatanas and so forth, the viewpoint of everything that appears, are enlightened as the nature of the deities. There are no good and evil, or accepting and rejecting. From the viewpoint of empty dharmata, complexities of existence and non-existence are completely pacified. This is the fundamental mandala of the spontaneously present nature. By realizing that, all the dharmas of the phenomenal world of samsara and nirvana are known as the mandala. Whatever appears is cherished as wisdom. The Secret Essence says:

By the yogin who realizes the great perfection,
The origin of suffering is realized as the mandala.

By these the teaching of first resolving the view is completed.

B. the explanation of meditation practice, together with its action of ripening and freeing.

1. The brief teaching of how to do the meditation of the developing stage

There are five sections

a. Meditation in the style of being born from an egg

Second, within the practice of meditation, there are the stages of the power of ripening the ground, and the stages of developing and completion that liberate the path. From the three sections of extensive explanation of the actions associated with these and with the associated samayas, now there is the brief explanation of the way of meditating in the developing stage:

There are four styles of practice that match with the four births.
To cleanse habitual patterns of being born from an egg,
By going to refuge and arousing bodhicitta,
And briefly doing the practice of the developing stage,
Complete the offerings that invite the field of merit.
And also by meditation on the absence of self-nature,
Previously completing the two accumulations,
Extensive meditation, through their being primordial,
On both the stage of development and the stage completion,
Is like an egg from which a bird will then be hatched.
Perform the short and elaborate development and completion.

In this first stage of secret mantra, in however many samadhis of visualized deities as we meditate, habitual patterns of the four modes of birth are trained and harmonized. These are taught as four. The Net of Miracle says:

There are four modes of birth that are to be purified.
Therefore, visualization has four different stages.
These are the greatly complex and the complex,
And those without and completely without complexity.

This is explained as it was clearly presented by the great master Vimalamitra. Those who are born from an egg are as if twice-born. When one meditates on the samadhi of great complexity, first one goes for refuge and arouses bodhicitta. One instantly visualizes oneself as the chief deity and consort. In the space in front, one invites the mandala of the deities. One makes offerings and praises to that mandala, confesses evil deeds, rejoices, invites the turning of the wheel of dharma, supplicates for desirable qualities, and dedicates the merit. Then after one says "VAJRA MUH go to your own places," or meditates for a while in objectless meditation, one gathers the two accumulations of merit and wisdom. This is the brief meditation.

Then, arising from emptiness and meditating on the mandala of the individual deities is the extensive meditation.

b. Meditating in the Manner of being born from a womb

From that, there is a brief treatment of meditation with few complexities:

In purifying vasanas of being born in a womb,
There is refuge, bodhicitta, and the seed from emptiness;
The symbol, then the body with its rays of light and such.
Then the extensive stages, as they were done before,
Development and completion do not have the brief version first;
As from prana and mind, and both the red and white bindus
Come oval, oblong, lumpy, becoming solid and so on,
Until at last the completed body has been born.

Just as for those who are born from the womb the body is born after being gradually completed, in this kind of development meditation first one goes to refuge and arouses bodhicitta. Then with the svabhava mantra from emptiness, just as the red and white bindus gather together to constitute consciousness, there is the seed syllable of the deity, for example HUM. Like the development of the embryo as an oval and oblong, from HUM comes a vajra. Like the oblong and solidification, from the vajra as a cause of the body comes a mass of the five lights, and as the embryo, like Vishnu's body manifesting as a fish and a tortoise, from the light comes the body, and the meditation of the developing stage is completed.

Sometimes, from the seed comes a mass of light and syllables, from which the body is maintained to appear. As the brief developing stage and offerings to the field of merit are omitted, there are fewer complexities.

c. Meditating in a way like birth from heat and moisture:

To purify patterns of birth arising from heat and moisture,
After refuge and bodhicitta, just from speaking the name
The luminous deities will arise from emptiness.
Then one meditates on development and completion.
As life can be born from a combination of heat and moisture,
And thus its birth will be accomplished with great ease,
There is no need for complexities of seeds and symbols.

Just as birth from heat and moisture is easily established, having gone to refuge, and aroused bodhicitta, just from saying and remembering the name of the deity it is visualized from emptiness. Here the complex stages from the seed syllable up to the body are omitted.

d. Meditation in the manner of spontaneous birth:

To purify the vasanas that lead to spontaneous birth,
Development and completion are clear instantaneously.
As what has spontaneous birth will be born in a moment,
Meditation in the stages of development and completion
Need not come gradually from the name [of the deity.]

As what is spontaneously born is instantly established, on remembering the deity the meditation is instantly clear and complete. The deity is visualized from the name alone and complexities are unnecessary.

e. Which style should be chiefly used:

Thus when we deal with these four styles of meditation,
Chiefly in meditating in these ways which are summarized,
In order to cleanse the vasanas, meditate on them all.
In particular the beginners should use the birth from an egg.
When there is some steadiness, use the birth from a womb.
When steadiness is great, use birth from heat and moisture.
When we are truly familiar, becoming perfectly steady,
Then we should use the instant style of spontaneous birth.

Persons should train in all the styles of meditation. Chiefly we should use the style of womb-birth. Beginners should meditate from stage to stage, training in these ways of meditation as summarized. Moreover, having meditated many times on the developing stage, one should then chiefly train in the completion stage. These four stages respectively should precede the first, second, third, and fourth of the four ways of meditating in the completion stage.

2. the ways of entering into the completion stage,

From the four sections

a. The ways with and without appearance.

Now we shall enter into the completion stage:

From the time they appear, their nature is simplicity.
As for the stages of unwavering form-meditation,
Beginners should stop attachment to the developing stage.
Mere appearance will remedy attachment to true existence.
Stabilized ones should break attachment to completion.
Emptiness will remedy fixating characteristics.

Thus, having gathered in gradually there are nada and bindu, and very fine life letters like a hundred divided³⁴⁶ hairs of a horse's tail. That dissolves into dharmadhatu and rests there. Beginners meditate in the formless completion stage. By that conceptual attachment to the individualizing marks of things of the developing stage is overcome. In the developing stage, rest in motionless mind without emanation or gathering. The arising of the wisdom of bliss, clarity, and non-thought is the completion stage with appearance. As the object of meditation for those with little familiarity or stabilization, it produces the antidote to one-sided attachment to emptiness.

b. The way of arising of developing and completion without gathering or separation.

Of this meditation:

Later whatever appears is the means of development.
Awareness without a grasper is the prajna of completion.
There is never anything added or anything taken away.

Here as before, by becoming very familiar and stable, all activities become appearance/emptiness, sound/emptiness, insight/emptiness. This is prajna in which natures are not truly existent. This arising of naturally non-conceptual shamatha is the completion stage of the pure nature. The completion stage of many individual tantras is taught in accord with this. This is from the general viewpoint. Some mahayoga texts have five stages:

- 1). a self-blessing stage
- 2). a vajra variety stage
- 3). a jewel fulfilling stage,
- 4). a jalandhara (net-holder)³⁴⁷ stage,
- 5). an inconceivable stage.

In the first, to produce shamatha, meditate in the developing stage, within the heart center visualizing bindus as globes of light.

Externally the motion of prana arises. After the time of the colors of the five elements has passed, by meditating in that way, all external sickness, dons, evil deeds, and obscurations are purified.

At the time of entering internally, similar to attainment of the buddha qualities and so on, in the light of the heart center, mental grasping is quickly uplifted³⁴⁸ by establishing the wisdom of non-thought.

As for attaining the ordinary and supreme siddhas, the Five Stages says:

Always there within the heart,
The single bindu has no arising.
For the person who becomes familiar with that
Wisdom will certainly arise.

Bindu has already been explained.

Second, in the vajra variety stage, the pranas are united. In the center of the five chakras meditate on the five symbols of the five families. In the head is a wheel, in the throat a jewel, in the heart a vajra, in the navel a lotus, and in the secret space a sword. During the meditation, the buddhas of the ten directions and so forth dissolve into the respective symbols. By meditating that the mind grasps them, shamatha arises.

Third, in the jewel fulfilling stage, by the play of coemergence or great bliss, from within the four chakras the wisdom of the four joys is produced and wisdom is recognized.

Fourth, in the jalandhara stage the symbols of the five families become the bodies of the deities. By the descent of amrita from the place of union of the deities and their consorts, the body is filled. By the bliss of the fire of tummo burning the HAM syllable, the mind is focused on bliss. By the firelight of wisdom of tummo all the realm of the tathagata is burned and consumed. The Dakini Ocean says:

As tummo burns at the navel
All the joints will be consumed.
As the eyes and such are burned
By that the bindu drips.

As it goes to the ends of the nadis
Of which there are 72,000
Like threads woven into in a net
By its passing the taste is experienced

By that there is realization of union and the focus of samadhi increases.

As for the inconceivable stage, In the center of the globes of light in the heart, from visualizing HUM and the individual seed syllables of the deities, light is emanated. It touches all of samsara and nirvana. Buddhas and beings, all the realms of the animate and the inanimate, melt into light and dissolve in the light in the heart center. The body dissolves into light. The light dissolves into the HUM, and that into the shabkyu. That dissolves into the body of the syllable, then into the head and the crescent, the crescent into the bindu, and the bindu into nada, the non-conceptual space which is the source of bindu.

In emanation, from emptiness, expand that these proliferate from one to another and are as before. As for meditating that they dissolve again, the meaning is inconceivable dharmata, as the union of vipashyana and shamatha. Having attained that is enlightenment.

Beginners meditate stage by stage. Having done that training, they train as the stages arise in their being, not necessarily in the order they were taught.

c. The process of meditation in the developing stage and completion stage.

What is accomplished in these ways of meditating in the developing and completion stages?

Development stops attachment to appearance as truly existing.

Completion abandons the thought that it is just illusion.

When there is no attachment to appearance or emptiness,

Then there is the pure nature that is without duality,

Between the stages of development and completion.

The developing stage meditates on the external environment as the palace. Grasping the ordinary appearance of objects as individuating characteristics of earth and rocks and so on is abandoned. By meditating on the inhabitants, sentient beings, as gods and goddesses, attachment to the individuating characteristics of sentient beings and desire and hatred toward them is abandoned. A clear view of one's own skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas, clearly perceives that this is primordially so. By that obscurations of rupakaya are abandoned. The collection of merit is completed. The arising of the samadhi of shamatha and so forth has many purposes.

In the three tantras of external mantra, yoga tantra and so forth, the developing stage is sealed by the four mudras. There is meditation on the four objects of mindfulness body, feeling, mind, and dharmas, as illusion-like, and the gathering together of meditation and post-meditation. Though these occur, the profoundest great stages are absent in these vehicles.

In anuttara tantra, prajna and upaya beyond the scope of thought are taught. By meditating on the completion stage, there is little attachment to the previous developing stage. All dharmas, like illusion, are abandoned. Free from all conceptual thoughts of "this and that," having purified the obscurations of dharmakaya, one is joined to the natural state. This is realization of mahamudra.

Here the nature is the primordial existence of the ground, the nature of the vajra body. Having come to know the nature of mind and the essence of reality, one becomes familiar with them. Here one depends on one's own body as the upaya and the body of another as the prajna or wisdom-consort. One's own body is used in tummo, illusory body, dream, luminosity, bardo, transference and so forth. These completion stage practices establish enlightenment through effort in one's own mind without dependence on another.

When using the body of another, the yogin goes to the pith of prana, nadi, and bindu, and makes bliss into the path. As for the purpose, by abandoning attachment to the developing stage, the divine nature is realized, and by the particular means employed, bliss, emptiness, and non-thought arise. By everything being brought to the path, whatever appears arises as dharmata. By realizing the wisdom of co-emergence, doubts are washed away, and so forth beyond measure.

As for the teaching of the nyams, the experiences, of buddhahood:

Here the vajrayana reaches its ultimate end.

Those persons who are sharp in the powers of their minds

Will attain to perfect buddhahood within this very life.

Then in every world where there are beings to be tamed,

Their various buddha activities will be spontaneous.

This secret path of directness is utterly profound.

It is the path that is taken by countless vajradharas.

It is the path that should be used by fortunate ones

Who want to be liberated within this very life.

This path liberates those of sharp powers of mind within this very life, so that before long the great deeds of a buddha spontaneously arise for whatever beings there are in the world to be tamed. The Tantra of the Vajra Secret says:

As for the siddhi of unsurpassable mantrayana,
When someone practices totally using the highest effort,
There is enlightenment within this very life.
Then the teacher acts within the field of beings.
This is the ultimate path directly to enlightenment,
As it was formerly traveled by countless vajradharas.

Those of good fortune who desire liberation should depend on this path, and strive appropriately with great effort.

d. The power of ripening the ground,

There are three sections teaching the stages

1) As for its being received in general and in terms of our own tradition

Now as for the teaching of the stages of the power of ripening the ground, mantrayana:

Using whichever of these tantras arouses devotion
Let us establish the state of perfect enlightenment.
First consider the precepts taught in each tradition
Of initiation, permission blessings, and empowerment.
By doing so our minds will be completely ripened.

"Abhishiṇṇa" occurs when defilements are washed away, and by powers being established "empowerment" arises. Because defilements in the being of students are purified, powers are produced of later attaining the enlightenment of buddhahood and meditating on particular incidental paths. After the details of the initiatory liturgies of permission blessings, empowerments, and so forth of the various individual tantras have been explained, one starts to practice.

In the initiatory rites and permission blessings of kriya tantra, depending only on the mandala, disciples are empowered by the water of the vase and merely by the mantra permission blessings being bestowed, they become suitable vessels for meditating on the view.

In upa tantra, by the empowerments of the five abhishekas of insight, six with the discipline abhisheka, disciples become suitable vessels.

In yoga tantra, preceded by the five abhishekas of insight, when the vajra master abhisheka has been completely bestowed, students become suitable vessels. Here the empowerment uses a sand-painting mandala, one painted on cloth, one of flower clusters, or the body mandala. By the lesser empowerment there is a mandala of images, in the middle one uses only heaps of flowers or symbols of the deities and so forth. The highest, the body mandala, is bestowed depending on the body, speech, and mind of the guru. The Ghanta says:

Though from two created essences
These students desire empowerment,
These beings are non-dual
With the self-existing mandala.

2) How the four unsurpassable empowerments are completely received

In these ways:

Within the excellent, secret path of the mahayoga,
There are the four empowerments producing ripening,
and development and completion, that bring us liberation.

The vase empowerment is that which purifies the body.
The secret one the speech, and prajnajnana the mind.
The word empowerment is that which cleanses habitual patterns.
Also by this empowerment the siddhis are conferred.
The first three of these complete the accumulation of merits.
The fourth empowerment completes the accumulation of wisdom.
The obscurations of kleshas and knowables are removed.
So through the ripening of gaining the four empowerments,
Cultivate liberation through development and completion.

In the tradition of mahayoga there are the well-known four empowerments:

- 1) The vase empowerment purifies defilements of body. One is empowered to meditate in the developing stage.
- 2) The secret empowerment purifies obscurations of speech. One is empowered to meditate on tummo or chandali.
- 3) The prajnajnana empowerment purifies obscurations of mind. One is empowered to meditate on bliss emptiness, the wisdom of complete non-thought.
- 4) The precious word empowerment purifies all defilement. One is empowered to meditate on mahamudra, the natural state.

By the first three the accumulation of merit is completed. Obscurations of the kleshas are purified. By the fourth the accumulation of wisdom is perfected. Obscurations of knowables are purified. If they are related to the paths and bhumis, the vase empowerment is the path of accumulation, the secret empowerment is the path of preparation. Prajnajnana is the path of seeing. By the empowerment in mahamudra the path of meditation is completed. By completing these four empowerments one is ripened. By meditating in the developing and completion stages, one is freed.

3) The peak of all the yantras

Now from the teaching of the stages of secret mantra in general, in particular the peak of all tantras is entered according to the Non-dual Tantra of the Great Illusion:

Whoever wants to enter the vision of ati yoga,
Receiving full empowerment, possessing the samayas,...

First, in the stages of empowerment, Lesser ones use a sand mandala, and supreme ones enter using the mandala of the body of the vajra master. The great bliss mandala uses the mandala of the two bodies of the father and mother, and the details of the five families as depicted in the sand mandala. The Secret Tree says:

As for the mandala of mahasukha,
There are two ways of dividing and also five.
If those who have faith have also completely entered,
Desire and pleasure become equanimity.

Here the ten empowerments of benefit and the five empowerments of power are completed. As for the first ten, according to the same text they are those of the:

- 1). head ornament
- 2). crown
- 3). garland,
- 4). armor
- 5). victory banner
- 6). mudra,
- 7). parasol
- 8). vase,
- 9) eating the five meats

10) drinking the five amritas.

The second five are:

- 1). The empowerment of the listener, the student
- 2). The empowerment of the explainer, the teacher
- 3). The empowerment of buddha activity for the benefit of others
- 4). The empowerment of the universal word of a vajra king
- 5). The empowerment of the supreme secret

These fifteen are divisions of the four empowerments. The ten including the vase empowerment are preliminary to the action of the vase and are collectively called the vase empowerment. From the secret empowerment the supreme secret and prajñajñana empowerments arise.

As for the word empowerment, after the empowerment of the universal word of a vajra king has been taught, the explainer and buddha activity empowerments are the action of this.

As for the listener, since upāya is increased, it is included within these. If the way of inclusion is done differently, the benefits will not arise, so do not proceed in that way.

If these empowerments are completed or also if other unsurpassable empowerments like these are obtained, then one has the good fortune of practicing the path of these.

e. The details of the associated practice and samaya are explained as additional points.

Now from the two sections on the practice of mantra and samaya,

- 1) the samayas connected with the empowerments will be explained.
 - a) The essence of samaya is the particular excellent thought of guarding without faults the good discipline of entering into mantra.
 - b. The divisions are the root and branch samayas.

a) The essence of samaya

Within the first are the three samayas of body, speech, and mind.

- 1) The body samaya

In the body samaya one meditates on the bodies of the deities, and refrains from unwholesome actions of body such as cutting off life, taking what is not given, dirty deeds, and all their aspects.

- 2) The samaya of speech

In the samaya of speech one recites mantra and eliminates the four unwholesome kinds of speech and all their aspects.

- 3) The mind samaya

In the mind samaya, one meditates in profound samādhi and refrains from the three unwholesome actions of mind and all their aspects.

In brief, in bodily practice of ordinary aspect of body, speech, and mind, does not contradict the samaya of true body, speech, and mind. If one divides these rather briefly, the Wheel of Entering into the Discipline of the Array of Samaya says:

From beings' thirty-three ripenings,
There are three samayas of mantra.
To fix the particulars,

Of body, speech, and mind,
Each of these has nine.
They are known from the aspects
Of entering and action.

Samayas of body, speech, and mind exist because beings exist primordially as buddhas. Since siddhi is attained from not transgressing these, they ought to be kept. The threefold samayas of body that ought to be kept are outer, inner and secret. Each of these is again divided into outer, inner, and secret

- 1). In the outer of outer one abandons taking what is not given
- 2). The inner of outer is abandoning dirty deeds
- 3). The secret of outer is abandoning the cutting off of life.

The Mansions of the Vajra Essence Tantra says:

The outer samaya of body
Is divided into three.
By taking what is not given
The external is transgressed.
The limbs of the sign of transgression
Are outbreaks of disease.
An unbearable variety
Arises in the body.

Dirty deeds are the inner
As a sign of transgressing this
There will be diseases
Arising in the senses.

Cutting off life is the secret.
As a sign of transgressing this
Disease of the vessel of meaning³⁴⁹
Will be experienced by yogins.

Regarding the means of keeping these, the Tantra of Unbroken Samaya says:

By a yogin who has the signs,
For outer of outer activities
Seven clay sculptures and drawings,
will liberate evil deeds.

Samaya is guarded by making colored statues and paintings of the gods seven times. Also the same text says:

The way for the inner of outer
Is sculpting seven statues
By consecrated efforts
And offering them to the guru.

One should make seven statues of the deities of mantra and offer them to the guru. Also the same text says:

If the sign has arisen
Of secret of outer transgression,
Nine or eleven vajras
Or bells should be offered the guru.

As for the outer, inner, and secret of inner, the Golden Mansion Tantra says:

As for outer of inner, relatives
And their fathers and mothers,
As well as one's own body
Should never be degraded.

The inner of inner, in general,
For the greater and lesser vehicles,
Is desiring to enter, and entering
and as for entering,

Degrading or trying to harm
The grasped reflection of body,
If the ornament is degraded,
The body of buddhahood
Redeems it a hundred times.

For the secret of inner,
Because one's personal body
Is the mandala of deities,
Eat medicine and food
That have been mixed with poison.
Even if stabbed by weapons,
Be without the path of defilement,
Or receiving a hundred bodies,
Later they will experience
the torments of the hot hells.

In amending these violations, confess with remorse. As for the three of the secret of body, the Glorious Edifice of the Sun and Moon Tantra says:

If with vajra brothers and sisters
One defiles the body ornament,
Offending with striking hand
If another enters into it
This will increase the cause
Of the unremitting Hell.

Within it greatly mixes
And widely proliferates.
Even just as a joke
Striking or trying to strike

If even in a dream,
One so endangers one's consort,
Until one has confessed it,
This equals the actual deed.

The secret of secret, the guru
Do not defile even his shadow
In Guru's pure presence also
One should never grasp a weapon.

Do not extend hands and feet
Or lie down in his presence.
Sit properly cross legged
And do not turn the back.

Shoes, and seats, and mounts
And elegant ornaments
Such things as parasols
Ought to be left behind.

In the guru's pure house also
One should never hold
Or keep within the hand
A weapon or a stone.

100,000 times worse
Is disrupting the teacher's house,
And doing any evil deed
That makes a mock of his body.

Such limitless evil deeds
As carelessness with the guru
If one does not scrutinize them,
Will have limitless consequence.

Even if one had attained
The supreme kayas of fruition
The ripening of this
Would be indescribable.

Evil deeds involving the guru involve karma a hundred thousand times heavier than others. If they are done, confess them continuously for a whole day. Even if they were not actually done, anything involving his body, should be confessed before him.

The samayas of speech are three times three in a similar way.

1). In the outer of outer, abandon speaking falsely.

The Edifice of the Wheel Tantra says:

By devoted practice of mantra,
Beings are purified.
By having spoken false words
Because of selfish desire

And having taken delight
In the speaking of such words,
We will lose the ability
To recite mantra genuinely.

With others our speech will be impotent.
By harming our own speech
The tongues of other beings
Will descend on us like vultures.

With a body covered with moles.
We will live in the north.
We will experience suffering
In various lower realms.

2). The inner of outer is not speaking slander.

The same text says:

Those beings who dwell in mantra
But tear at others with slander,
When they teach the dharma
Will never gather a retinue.

Whatever they do goes wrong
If this is not analyzed,
They will make many enemies.
Who stab their bodies with weapons.

Having died and been reborn,
They will have bodies with claws.
Then they will experience
A succession of lower realms.

3) The secret of outer is not speaking harshly of others.

The same text says:

Speaking harshly builds up karma
Both earlier and later
Beings without kindness are angry
Even with their friends.

They overturn even the Dharma.
When they die and transmigrate
These very arrogant people.
Will go to the lower realms.

As for the inner:

4). If one reviles those who speak the Dharma, that is the outer. 5). If those who practice, that is the inner.

6). If those who meditate, that is the secret.

The Array of Samaya Tantra says:

Those who glorify and denigrate
And speak reviling words
Of those who are abiding
In the discipline of mantra,

And of those who teach the Dharma
And of practitioners,
And those who meditate,
Diminishing others' discipline,

Diminish their own possessions
Certainly forgetting
And totally overthrowing
The Dharma for themselves.

Against their expectations
They will then experience
Sufferings without limit
Within the lower realms.

7. The outer of secret is reviling and denigrating one's vajra brothers and sisters.
8. The inner is to speak disparagingly of the guru's consort and close retinue.
9. The secret is denigrating the guru. The Chagya Nyijor Tantra says.³⁵⁰

With Vajra brothers,
the consort and retinue,
If they violate in speech
Within the three lower realms

For a hundred million kalpas
They will suffer especially
Harshly and unendurably.

Beings who experience this
As a later sign
Of what they formerly did,

In their successively experience.
By former deeds, during this life,
Their station will be low,
Even if formerly high.
As soon as they are reborn
They will experience this.

As for the karmic destiny
They have produced by that,
In this life as servants
The karma of speech they hear

Will come from the tongues of the retinue
and other lesser beings
The stream of speech which is pure
Of the incidental will cease.

With the guru's wife and children,
And whomever is close to him,
If one violates the command
and transgresses in one's speech
The karma is twice the former.

Of the guru in particular
If root and branch violations
Are spoken in one's speech,
If one has speaks exaggerations
Or denigrating words,
It is a thousand times worse.

The ripening is unbearable.
By gradations one becomes separate,
Torn away from the holy guru,
This occurs at once.

The samayas of mind are also three times three.

- 1). As for the outer of outer, ill-will is abandoned.

The Tantra of Receiving the Essence says:

Those who to vajra holders
Either others or themselves
Harbor malicious ill-will
Their bodies will have lesions.
For every time they have done this,
Receiving 5000 bodies,
They will certain be born in hell.

- 2). The inner of outer is abandoning craving and malice.

The Meteoric Iron Blazing Like Fire says:

If for an ordinary being,
The mind of ill-will arises
Their evil deed will be equal
To an ordinary person
Who has cut off 300 lives.

If possessing signs of a teacher
Embodied ones go wrong,
with one who abides in mantra
It is a hundred times that;

With vajra brothers and sisters
It is seven times more;
With a guru of tantra
Still a hundred times more;
And with one's own root guru
A hundred thousand times.

- 3). The secret of outer is perverting the doctrine of oneself and others.

As for a person who does this, the Great Array says:

Of either the doctrines of oneself or others
If one makes a wrong path which degrades the Dharma,
One violates this root samaya of mind.
In the earthly realm the sufferings of fire
Will be experienced for a very long time.
By one's own wrong views of doctrine arising,
There will be no way to be free from hell.

From the three of inner mind,

- 4). The external is wrong action,
5). The internal is wrong meditation
6). The secret is wrong view.

What is wrong is to be abandoned. The Tantra of the Crystal Palace says:

Wrong view, meditation, and action
These are the great wrong path.
All the sufferings of beings
Will ripen within the mind.

As for the three secret ones,

- 7). The external is not paying attention to the meditation and action.

- 8). The inner is not paying attention to the yidam deity.
- 9). The secret is not paying attention to the guru and one's vajra brothers and sisters.

The Cast Lotus Expanse says:

One whose action of mind is frivolous
Transgressing in the dharmas of attention
Who has not properly turned the mind to them,
With destroyed and violated intention
Will experience suffering in the Avici Hell.

Remedy violations of every aspect of these and try to confess them. That completes the teaching of the root samayas.

2) The five times five branch samayas,

a) The samayas of the five things to be known.

Since all dharmas are primordially enlightened, it should be known that:

- 1). the five skandhas are the five fathers,
- 2). the five elements are the five consorts,
- 3). the five consciousnesses are the five bodhisattvas,
- 4). their five objects are the five female bodhisattvas,
- 5). the five collections of thoughts are the five mandalas.

The Array of the Three Samayas says:

First as for the samayas of things that should be known:
The five skandhas, elements, and consciousnesses
The five organs, and their objects, and such things
Are in nature the deities and the mandala.

It is also explained like that in the Kunje.

b) The five samayas that are to be performed

These are the great samaya. By those who are capable, when they are performing benefits for others, there may be cutting off life, taking what is not given, impure conduct, and false speaking. The same text says:

As for the samayas to be performed
Tana, gana,³⁵¹ taking what is not given
Dirty deeds, and false speaking,
As for its five aspects those wise in skillful means
if they see that harm will come from not performing them
They will do them.

Also the Bodhisattva pitaka says:

For those who have great skillful means,
The kleshas are the limbs of enlightenment.

In accord with that explanation, without being bound up with one's own benefit, acting when there is an opportunity to benefit others is as taught previously.

c. the samayas of the five things to be accepted,

Excrement, urine, rakta, white bodhicitta, and human flesh are the five essences.³⁵² The former text says:

As for the five samayas,
Of the five to be accepted
They are excrement, and so on,
the five samaya substances.

Regarding their qualities the Vajra Tent of the Dakinis says:

Yogins who are relying
On immovability
Will abandon all diseases.
And always have great brilliance.
As for the vajra sun
It never will grow old.
Relying on vajra Dharma,
One has all one needs.³⁵³
Creatures' bodily vajras
Are the king who possesses the meaning.
All splendid goals are accomplished
That yogin will go to peace.

By drinking the immovable
Sustained 5000 fold.³⁵⁴
One's throne will then express
Ten million vajra suns.
Times beyond all measure
In countless numbers of lives.
As limitless as space,
Being drawn by seven horses,
With two limitless vajra suns,
Are the roots of gathering a retinue.
If yogins depend on these,
They are equal to those of good fortune.

d. The samayas of the five things that are not to be abandoned

The five poisons or kleshas should not be viewed as enemies, as they are by the shravakas. Being of the nature of wisdom, they should be brought to the path. The former text says:

As for the five samayas
Of not abandoning,
The five poisons of the kleshas,
Passion, aggression, and so forth,
As the great secret vajra samaya,
The five kleshas are transformed,
Becoming the five wisdoms.
These five poisons are not abandoned
But accepted as the five wisdoms.

If the five poisons are exhausted by skillful means they are not abandoned because:

- 1). They become associated with the path,
- 2). They are of the nature of wisdom,
- 3). They are primordially unborn space,
- 5). All dharmas are of the nature of equality without accepting and rejecting.

These are called the samayas of not abandoning. The ordinary forms of the five poisons are not made into the path even in vajrayana. In reality, when they are exhausted by skillful means, and bodhisattvas make them into the path, the purified kleshas are gathered into one.

e. The five samayas to be established

One makes an effort to establish the previous five topics within one's being. The same text says:

As for the five samayas
Which are to be established,
The five skandhas and five elements,
The consciousnesses and objects,
Are established as the mandala.

Perfecting the three samadhis
And the five aspects of ritual.
The mandala of the five families
Of victorious ones is established.

Our minds should therefore strive
In these samadhis and rites.

The three samadhis are:

- 1 the suchness samadhi
- 2 the all-illuminating samadhi
- 3 the cause samadhi

The five rites are:

- 1 visualizing the deities
- 2 reciting mantra
- 3 meditating in samadhi
- 4 abiding in samaya
- 5 offerings and tormas

In general according to the Miracles of Secret Mantra the Secret Essence has five root samayas, ten branch samayas, and four great samayas, nineteen altogether. The root five are

- 1 not abandoning the three jewels
- 2 reverence for the guru
- 3 not cutting short mantras and mudras
- 4 being kind to those who genuinely abide on the mahayana
- 5 not speaking the secret to others

The same text says:

Not abandoning the matchless,
Reverencing the guru,
Not cutting off mantra and mudra,
Being kind to those
Who abide on the genuine path,
Never telling the secret
To those who are outsiders.
These five are the root.

Within the ten branches are the five samayas of not abandoning. The same text says:

Ignorance and passion,
Aggression, pride, and envy
These are the five samayas
That are not to be abandoned.

As for the samayas of the things to be accepted it says:

The red and white essences,
Human flesh, and excrement
Are the pure vessel and essence
And should not be rejected.

The four great samayas are the fundamental four, regarding cutting off life and so forth.

In new translation mantra, samayas to be guarded and samayas to be performed are distinguished. As for the first, fourteen root downfalls and so forth are explained in their particular traditions. As for the second, knowing the nature of the five meats and five amritas, one should enjoy them.

The five meats are those of the cow, elephant, dog, human, and horse. The five amritas are excrement, urine, semen, blood, and brains. and so on. As for the benefits of eating these, the Shri Guhyasamaja says:

As for the high samaya
Of eating human flesh,
The excellent three vajras
Will be established by that.

As for the high samaya
Of eating human shit,
One will be the leader
Of all the vidyadharas.

By the high samaya
of eating the flesh of cows,
One has the five attainments
Of the higher perceptions.

By the pure samaya
Of eating the flesh of horses,
One becomes a master
Of invisibility.

By the high samaya
Of eating the flesh of dogs,
All the host of siddhis
Are perfected and established.

By the high samaya
of eating the flesh of elephants,
One becomes supreme
A solid vajra sender.

Also:

The flesh of cows and horses
Should be eaten as food
If we eat no other food
great minded bodhisattvas

And buddhas will be pleased.

also:

Excrement and semen,
Blood and all the others,
Should be offered to deities.
When this is done the buddhas
And bodhisattvas are pleased.

If one does not have them, make food in their form or visualize eating them. The same text says:

As for pure human flesh
If it is fully visualized,
One will gain all the siddhis
That are part of the secret body,
The secret speech, and mind.

also:

If none of the meats are there,
One can visualize them.
Performing this vajra union,
One will be blessed by the buddhas.

By practice of these actions like those of worldly degraded people, liberated from all attachment, one will have the virtues of being without good and evil, pleasing the dakinis and mahasiddhas, and so forth.

4) How to guard these samayas

They are guarded by means of mindfulness, attention and conscientiousness, by being upright, and having fear and reverence.

As for mindfulness, not forgetting the details of samaya, and what is permitted and prohibited, one keeps them in mind. Day and night one makes vows of bodhicitta and confessing and vowing to refrain.

As for conscientious attention, having examined to see whether the three gates abide in samaya or not, if anything that one does goes against samaya, one abandons it. What does not go against it, one practices.

As for being careful, as one is careful about great enemies and friends, when samaya is harmed and there is danger of going to the lower realms, hold it very tightly.

As for shame, if one's samayas proclaimed before the guru are transgressed, thinking that no one is lower than oneself, one should exhaust or avoid the slightest fault of the root and branch violations depending on oneself.

As for decency the guru, yidam, dakinis, and great beings are decent individuals. If one thinks they have been agents of degradation, depending on others, one should guard against that.

As for guarding fear, having thought of one's faults of transgression against samaya, we should not let go of it even if we die.

As for guarding devotion, inspired by the great benefit, devotedly guard samaya.

5) The meaning of the word, "samaya," dam tshig in Tibetan, has two meanings. If what is true and holy "dam" is guarded, non virtue is burned away, "tshig." Also, if one transgresses what is holy in body, speech and mind, one will be damned and burned in the fires of hell. The Tantra of the Array of Samaya says:

SA, in producing that level
If, MA, it is not transgressed,
All the siddhis will be bestowed.

YA, if this is weakened
DAM, it must be restrained
If this should be let go
That is called transgression,
TSHIG, if that is transcended,
We experience fires of suffering.

As for the benefits of guarding samaya, within this life all our wishes will be established, everyone will be pleasant to us, all the dakinis will bless us, all the accumulations will be gathered, and no obstacles will arise. Even if our effort and powers don't go the distance, as long as samaya is not transgressed, in seven lives or sixteen we will certainly be liberated, attaining ultimate buddhahood. The Secret Essence says:

By abiding within the samaya of equality
The equality of the great perfection will be gained.

The two bad consequences of transgression within this life are that everyone will be unpleasant and there will be many diseases and obstacles. What we want will not be established. Even if it rains, little will grow and so forth--everything we do will go wrong, and various kinds of unpleasantness will arise. Not to mention that in the next life, we will go to hell. The same text says:

Those without root defilements
Need not struggle to cure them.
An instant of denying them
And faults will not arise.
But if there is transgression
Of the major root samayas
All practice will go wrong.
Various unpleasant fruitions
Are gathered in spite of ourselves.
If there is transgression
Of the branch samayas,
Without attaining fruition,
We fall to the lower realms.

The Two Examinations says:

Snakes who tell the secret
And thieves who steal the dharma,
Set fires all over the earth.

Also:

Plagues and calamities
And various obstacles,
Kings and fires and serpents
Floods, dakinis, and bandits
Vicious attacks of Döns
And agents of perversion.
Destroyed by such assassins
Beings will go to hell.

6) Means of confession

Now the means of confession are explained.

a) Divisions

Divided by time all transgressions are of four kinds:

- 1). Going against samaya is not longer than a day.
- 2). Less than a month is a fault.
- 3). A breach is more than that up to a year.
- 4). Up to two and three years is severance of samaya.

Transgressions up to these, if they are confessed with great exertion, are purified. It is taught that confessions of those which cannot not be purified will not be received by one who is like the guru. The Tantra of the Array of Samaya says:

Generally for the different samaya transgressions
The division is distinguished by the time.
Going against samaya is violation
Which has lasted not longer than a day.
If one makes confession of the object
It is fully remedied by that.

A fault of samaya lasts up to a month.
It is remedied by strong remorse.
If one breaches samaya for a year
Uninterrupted confession will remedy that.
A longer time of up to two or three years,
Is said to be a severance of samaya.
It is repaired with immensely strong confession.

More than three years, is simply incurable.
If it is received, both master and student burn.
Certainly in the subterranean realm
They will only suffer continuously.

Transgressions are classified either depending on the essence or on time. Those known by the essence are transgressions of the root and branch samayas described before. For those depending on time, the degree of transgression depends on how soon it was confessed. By teaching these, the divisions are fully explained. As for how to amend, the same text says:

Going against samaya is confessed
With the performance of a ganachakra.
Transgression is remedied by one's possessions.
Breaches are repaired with spouse and children,
With possessions and acts of body, speech, and mind.
Severance is remedied with one's life.

Faults up to a day are remedied by a ganachakra. Having joined one's palms before the guru and so forth, say:

Guru, great vajra holder please consider us. For us by the power of confusion such and such errors have arisen. These, which we purify by confessing, we supplicate you to purify.

Say this three times, with lamentation and remorse. Later commit yourself to keep trying not to do these things again. By the gate from which the transgression arose, as an antidote do homage and so forth.

For violations up to a month, offer your cherished possessions to the person who was the object. Then remedy with a ganachakra as before.

For those up to a year, in addition to that, impoverish yourself, and offer your cherished spouse and children.

Up to three years, also with strong effort accomplish heavy deeds of sacrifice for the sake of others, gurus, and so forth.

Moreover, transgressions done in dreams, and bad lapses of slandering others should be told. Examining to see what was said of others in speech or mind, even in fun, all these should be confessed. The Great Array says:

To the guru and close retinue
To vajra brothers and sisters,
Not the smallest evil
Of spoken words should be said,
In nuance or reality.
Or just in dream or mind,
They all should be confessed.

If actual and mental faults,
Remain ungrasped by memory,
Passed by and not confessed,
Pulled down by that halter
One goes to the lower realms.

When one has done these, one will be liberated from the transgression by: Performing feasts, fire offerings, and service to the guru in body and speech, requesting empowerment, in the four periods doing the hundred syllable mantra, offering mandalas, trying to establish the ten virtues such as furthering life, reciting sutras and dharanis and so forth, expressing the virtues of others, telling one's hypocritical transgressions to all tantrikas in the ten directions, wishing for virtue, and pleasing those who rejoice in it, and meditating in samadhi and on kindness and so forth, the four immeasurables, etc.

To confess and remedy offenses worthy of hell, if this is done on the eighth day of the lunar month, all transgressions up to that time will be remedied:

b) The Liturgy

In the space in front visualizing the guru, yidam, and assembly of deities of the mandala, prostrate, make offerings, and confess the evil deeds.

Then, from their body, speech, and mind, there arise red, white, and blue light rays. By their dissolving into one's own body, speech, and mind, all transgressions and defilements are purified. After the evil deeds and obscurations of all sentient beings are also purified, they become light and dissolve into the heart center of the guru.

Here, while the mind rests in equality like the sky, as one does the dedication, it is excellently taught that all transgressions will be purified.

As for the measure, if the obscurations have been purified, in dreams one will be dressed in white, one will reach the peaks of mountains, the sun and moon will rise together and so forth. That completes the presentation of samaya.

7) the conduct accompanying that

a) General

the benefits of the view and meditation, and the special qualities are established. As for the essence, after one meditates in samadhi, guarding the experience in post-meditation brings the benefit of mixing meditation and post meditation. Moreover in terms of the lesser conduct of shravakas and the supreme conduct of bodhisattvas, as the benefit for oneself, by pacification and taming one binds non-virtue of body and speech. As the benefit for others there is the conduct of the six perfections.

the four teachings of the vast and extensive secret mantra for:

i). Beginners

- ii). Those for whom a little experience has arisen
- iii). Those with a little stability
- iv). Those who have attained great stability.

i). As for the first, chiefly activities between sessions are done. There are the yogas of food, torma, making tsha tshas, water offering to the pretas, mandalas, prostrations, and reciting sutras; seven fold service, offerings of writing and such, the 10 dharma activities.

As for the practice, the preliminary part is arousing bodhicitta. The main part is the unborn. Afterwards complete by dedicating the merit. As for the ten dharma activities, The Tantra of Realizing all the Actions of the Oral Instructions says:

Transcribing, doing pujas, giving, and listening;
Reading and comprehending, explaining, and reciting,
Contemplating and meditating on these things.
These ten acts of dharma have limitless merit.

ii). When a little experience has arisen through these, it is called the practice of Samantabhadra. As for the second topic, the practice of those for who this has arisen somewhat, the experience arising in meditation becomes of equal taste with post-meditation, joined with all the self-appearances of the senses. As within the meditation of the developing stage, when one is meditating on the mandala of the yidam deity; in post-meditation too all appearances are viewed as the illusion-like divine mandala. Become familiar with that. Within the meditation of the completion stage, whatever experiences of the nyam arise are joined in equal taste to all the self-appearances³⁵⁵ of post-meditation. In brief, when the practitioner rises from meditation, and when various objects are experienced, at the time of enjoying form, sound, smell, taste, and touchables, all these are known to have the nature of the deities. These are also known as one's own mind. The mind is known as emptiness by the deities' divine realization and activity. By that there is the divine offering of the play of wisdom. Practice this as dharmata dissolving into dharmata. All the sense appearances of post-meditation become associated with the path. One's own five skandhas are OM, the five fathers. Form and so forth, their five objects are SUM, the five consorts. Obscurements and so forth are HUM, the offering deities. One practices by visualizing these. The Secret Essence says:

The senses, and the limbs and consciousness,
Become the completely ripened syllable OM.
Meditate on the perfect mandala
And on the mandala of the wrathful ones.

Form and sound, smell and taste and touch
Become the completely ripened syllable SUM.
Meditate on the mandala of the consorts.
And on the mandala of the wrathful consorts.

Clothes and ornaments, eating, drinking, and songs,
Verses and dances, heaped-up clouds of feasting
Are known as HUM, when they are fully practiced.
The wondrously risen mandala is attained.

These are known as secret or insight activities. Whoever does them between sessions will have these beneficial experiences, and by relying on non-harming, harm will be abandoned.

iii). In the practice when experience is slightly stabilized, since these same experiences are beneficial, the discipline of insight should be practiced. This is with, without, and completely without complexity.

1))) The practice with complexity is undertaken by those who are young in age with much vigor and little prajna. In a retreat house, doing sadhana, they do a ganachakra and confession. Have collected yogins and yoginis, complete in their ornaments, equal to the number of deities, and having meditated on the developing and completion stages, at the end while doing songs and dances, manifest desire without clinging. In six months, or whatever it takes, siddhi will be attained.

2))) The practice without complexity, is to be done by those of middle age, prajna, and vigor. Like the other before, practice alone with an authentic consort or perhaps two or three together.

3))) The practice supremely without complexity is done by those who are old with little vigor but much prajna. In solitary places like charnel grounds, abandoning physical consorts, they unite directly with the vidya of co-emergent wisdom herself, and do kusulu practice.

Except for eating, sleeping and voiding waste, they abandon all other activities, and practice in emptiness.

Moreover since these are practices of taming the kleshas by wisdom, these words are said. In these cases if there are many emanations and gatherings of insight, finally the various activities of "cutting the continuity of the city" of samsara will be completed, and the primordial activity of doing nothing at all will be established. That is the benefit off these practices. The Song of the Oral Instructions of the Inexhaustible Treasury says:

Sometimes abiding in charnel grounds the "lamps" are practiced.
With fearless mind one sleeps in places haunted by pretas.
Associating with outcasts, the wheel of taste is straightforward.
There is no "who does what" and no grasping the proper rules.

There is an assembly of sacred celebration
Yogins come together with many songs and dances,
With flutes and other instruments, they make delightful music.
The assembly sing and dance with the six dances of heruka
Their minds are so uplifted that there is no sadness at all.

Wearing robes on their backs and ornamented with copper,
With wheels in the topknots clinging to their heads.
All their limbs adorned with ornaments of bone,
With elephant and tiger skins tied above and below,
Carrying khatvangas and sounding the bells in their hands.

They excellently perform the actions of the great secret,
The delightful celebration of intoxicated insanity.
Forbidden activities that are shameful to perform,
Like drunken elephants plunging hugely into a lake,
Performing degraded acts, they are freed like a flying arrow.

This is the called the "activity of all the protectors." The Guhyasamaja says:

All the acts of desire,
If one manages to do them,
Just as one would like,
By such a wealth of union,
One quickly gets enlightened.

Also:

Unbearable self-denial
Is not to be relied on.
Rely on desirable qualities
To quickly be accomplished.

What's more, by this path without accepting and rejecting, the buddhas are very pleased. The same text says:

Buddhas and bodhisattvas

And those who know the practice
Of the highest action of mantra,

Attain immovability,
Supreme in the highest Dharma,
By relying on all enjoyables.

That these practices are connected with the proper kinds of beings and times is important. If beginners do this feast practice or try to perform the "activity of all the protectors," they will just go to the lower realms.

8) Fruition: the two siddhis

a) relative

Having attained the benefits of the path by these activities, one will quickly attain the two siddhis. There will be the eight karmas, eight ordinary siddhis, and so forth. As for the eight karmas, the Two Examinations says:

The powers, higher perceptions, destroying hosts of enemies, driving away, killing, magnetizing, pacifying, and enriching will really be performed.

As for the eight ordinary siddhis, the Vajra Tent says:

With these there is no problem.
The eye potion and swift running,
The wondrous enchanted sword,
Finding treasures under the earth,
Magic pills and flying,
Becoming invisible,
The elixir for making gold.
By pleasing the vajra-holders.
One quickly becomes accomplished.

The Secret Essence says:

The mudra of songs and dances
Goes in a rush to the sky.

The mudra of songs and verses,
Attains the siddhis of Dharma.

The mudra of dress and ornament,
Gains the blazing, invincible king.

The mudra of eating and drinking,
Grants wish-fulfilling amrita.³⁵⁶

The mudra of vowels and consonants,
Makes anything into anything.

b) absolute

Supreme siddhi is the establishment of buddhahood. The Two Examinations says:

As for trikaya being within the body,
That should be expressed by the form of samsara.
As for trikaya being completely known,

That is expressed by the wheel of great bliss.

By that the explanation together with the subsidiary points is completed.

3. The path that produces liberation, the extensive explanation of the developing and completion stages.

a. The developing stage

There are five sections.

1) Meditation on the protection circles:

Now we will enter into the details of meditation on the mandalas of samadhi. In a solitary and compatible place

Sitting in cross-legged posture upon a comfortable seat,
Having taken refuge and aroused the bodhicitta,
Then from within the nature of simplicity,
Where dharmas all are empty and ego does not exist,
The syllable HUM arises, then in turn from that,
Extending above and below, as well as in all the directions,
The deployment of the protective circle is huge and vast.
Its ten spokes have the marks³⁵⁷ of the ten wrathful deities.
The circle is splendid with blazing fire within and without.

First, as for the preliminaries, sit cross-legged on a comfortable seat. Visualizing the guru and the assembly of deities of the yidam mandala in space, take the three refuges and as it is explained in the Sparkling Precious Net:

Myself as well as limitless sentient beings,
Are in reality primordial buddhas,
By I who know that this is really so,
May supreme bodhicitta be aroused.

Having said that three times, with the SVABHAVA mantra all dharmas are established as the great emptiness. This is the suchness samadhi. The Great Development and Completion says:

HUM
The nature of bodhicitta, which is completely pure
Is primordially unborn, and eternally all-encompassing,
Limitless, topless and bottomless, boundless in every direction,
A non-existing, unperceivable state of simplicity,
Inexpressible beyond thought, a perfect space of equality.

The Principal Heruka says:

This inconceivable space of dharmadhatu
Is free from all concepts and discursive thoughts.
This inconceivable space of dharmadhatu
Is not perceived, as space is not perceived.

Meditate like that. From the state of dharmakaya is manifested the auspicious coincidence of the arising of rupakaya. As all lesser productions are exhausted in the empty nature of the great perfection, one necessarily unties the knot of attachment to things and characteristics. The Stages of the Path says:

By emptiness all paths are marklessness.

Attachment to ego-grasping is liberated.

Then, in order to untie the knot of one-sided attachment to emptiness, there is meditation in the all-illuminating samadhi. The appearance of all dharmas is natureless. With illusion-like compassion, meditate for a little while the natural luminous wisdom of self-awareness without a grasper. The same text says:

Get accustomed to the king of self-awareness,
And so supreme enlightenment will be gained.
Therefore after the suchness of seeing this
Rest in the ground of arising of compassion.
Their rising in sequence like this is a certainty.

Then from the two sections on the cause samadhi, play is the circle of what is to be guarded. Here from HUM, in the limitless universal brilliance of the space of the sky, comes a ten spoked wheel. Between rim and center, in the empty space inside, which is equal to dharmadhatu, the ten spokes are transformed into ten lotus, sun, and moon seats marked with HUM.

Above is Humkara. To the east is Vijaya. To the southwest Blue Danda. To the south Yamantaka. To the southwest Achala. To the west Hayagriva. To the northwest, Not Attained by Others To the north Amritakundalin. To the northeast All-Victorious in the Three Realms, below Mahabala.

Each of them has one face and two arms ornamented with all the supreme³⁵⁸ and nirmanakaya ornaments. The right leg is bent and the left extended. They hold scepters symbolizing their respective families or a bell and vajra. The two wrathful ones above and below are of the tathagata family. They hold wheels. Those to the east and southeast, of the vajra family, hold black and white vajras. Those to the south and southwest, of the ratna family, hold dark yellow gems. Those to the west and northwest, of the padma family, hold dark red eight petalled lotuses. Those to the north and northeast, of the karma family, hold dark green crossed vajras and swords.

In the extensive version, in their three centers and six hands are the lady tramens. Their six feet are on the seats of the protectors of the ten directions. Each has the five symbols signifying increase and so forth of the five families. These should be learned elsewhere.

As for the main topic, the cause samadhi: Having meditated on oneself briefly as the chief deity, see the palace, whether visualized or not, as empty. It is joined with the meditation of the seed syllable of visualizing the deity.

2) Meditating on the mandala

In the center is the great mandala of Samantabhadra.
There are four sides, and four gateways, topped by aches.
The five-colored walls have ledges where there are the five sense-pleasures.
The cornices have garlands with jeweled pendent strings.
The eaves are decorated with balustrades and railings.
Ornamenting the dome is a precious-jewel vajra.
There are eight charnel grounds that surround the mandala.
In the center there is a seat of a lotus, sun and moon,
Supported by lions, elephants, horses, peacocks, and *shang shang

This is the visualization of the support, the palace. The display of the field and palace is within the luminous nature of mind is. This is the dwelling place of Samantabhadra. Moreover within each of the visualizations is the mandala of Samantabhadra. Meditate on this as being as limitless as the sky.

To the right and left of each of the four gates, are the two pillars of the gateways. The three gates of liberation are in every direction.

The body of the palace is cubic. The five layered wall is blue, green, red, yellow, and last white. These five are transparent like a rainbow. The four raised areas are the four wisdoms, the mirror-like wisdom and so forth. As a symbol of the dharmadhatu wisdom, in the middle is a circular vase pervading the whole of space. At the top of these walls are the precious cornices. On top of those are the precious eaves³⁵⁹ in the form of little dome-like shapes,³⁶⁰ outside of which are variegated chains of garlands and pendants of jewels and pearls. Moving with the sun and moon pranas, supporting the chains, is a precious railing,³⁶¹ built in the shape of chörtens.

In the middle is the vase like a circular raincoat. the shrine hall's stratified roof above the eaves, covering the internal space, has a roof in two stages, above, in the center, center and on the four sides spreading like a five pointed vajra fence. It is marked at the top with a vajra and precious jewel finial.

At each side of the gates in the four directions two pillars support the archways. Each archway has four layers, adorned with various ornaments. On top of them is a wheel turned by two deer, at whose center is a life tree of precious substances.

At the four corners are victory banners and on long poles are hanging pennants. From the edges of the stories tipped with precious bells, are lifted garlands stretched from the center of the vajra finial to the sides of the archways, from their jingling giving a pleasant sound.

There are Jeweled yak tails and silk tassels³⁶², with precious staffs and sun and moon finials. There are many kinds of deities and divine ornaments, and heaps of offering clouds from all the ten directions.

Outside the outer walls are ledges of desirable qualities, red where many transparent-appearing offering goddesses on sun and moon seats pour offerings of the five desirable qualities with a flourish.

Then there is a courtyard or field, green appearing around which, in the eight charnel grounds, are the eight self-arising stupas, Deje Tsegpa³⁶³ and so forth, and Garab Dorje (Prahevajra), Manjushrimitra, Padmasambhava, Vimalamitra, and so forth, the eight teachers. The charnel grounds are adorned with eight fires, eight lakes, eight clouds, eight trees, eight lokapalas, eight deities, eight nagas, and so forth.

In the center of the palace is a throne whose center is adorned with a lion, the east with an elephant, the south with a horse, the west with a peacock, the north with a shang shang. On that is a sun, moon and jewel seat. In the other places of the deities, meditate that there are self-arising lotus, sun, and moon seats equal to the number of the deities. The Secret Essence says:

Wisdom is visualized in the four directions and center.
With the spontaneous presence of the limitless mandalas,
By yogins with realization of the great perfection,
The mandala of the source of arising is realized.
A wheel with four spokes and a rim, a courtyard adorned by a cube.
Having square gateways, with music like heaps of various clouds.
This is adorned by forty-two different mandalas.
Great lion, elephant, horse, and garuda thrones float in space
With sun and moon and lotus or jewel seats.

Here as the garuda and peacock both are alike in overcoming poison, there is no distinction between union and purification in overcoming the poison of desire.

The four great layers of the archways are divided into halves by sub-layers making eight. The Fierce Lightning of Illusion says:

In the space which is the space of the human mind
The edifice of the four elements is spontaneously present.
On top of that arising from the four kinds of jewels
Spontaneously present and completely immeasurable,
As for the beautiful ground which is supported by that,
It is carpeted with various kinds of jewels.

Giving way when pressed down, raising back on lifting,
On that there is the edifice of the palace itself.
With its cubic shape it is very beautiful.
It is made of four different kinds of precious jewels.

In the center of the structure is a four spoked wheel,
Also made of four different kinds of precious jewels.
At the peak of the vase³⁶⁴ is the crest ornament of dharma,
Variegated like the feather of a peacock.

Each of the four gates is adorned with an arch.
At the sides are eight pillars holding up the archways.
At the center of each is a vertical four spoked wheel.
The navel supports a tree made of precious substances.
The squares of the courtyards are beautifully brilliant.
The precious light rays collect together like a staff.

The deities have seats of a lotus, sun, and moon.
They sit on blazingly brilliant excellent jewel seats.
The foot supports of the precious thrones are beautiful.
The excellent ornaments that adorn this wondrous palace
Blaze with suns, and moons, and various precious jewels.

Canopies, victory banners, food, and parasols,
Flowing silken streamers and long garlands strung with pearls,
Covered with ringing bells and the finest yak tail whisks,
Adorned with various kinds of musical instruments.

The assembly of worldly deities is beautiful.
These and other ornaments are inconceivably excellent.
The four gates of the palace are adorned with elephants.
The silk tassels³⁶⁵ hanging from the archways
Are brilliant with a cascade of golden bells,
And chains with the symbols of the three excellent jewels.

The front of each gate is adorned with matching potted palms.
They have fine form and fragrance, and shine with radiance.
In these potted palms are cuckoos and so forth
Auspicious birds whose melodious voices resound with song.

In front of each gate is a washing pond of excellent shape,
Whose water fully possesses the eight limbs of excellent taste³⁶⁶
In each are inconceivable countless gods and goddesses.

Outside the surrounding walls of this palace of deities
Are peaks and places for walking of indescribable beauty.
These and so forth are inconceivably excellent.
Primordially self-established without needing to be sought.

If this mandala is associated with the three purities of ground, path, and fruition, the ground is that all sentient beings exist like that primordially. Therefore the four gates are the four immeasurables. The four archways are the four foundations of mindfulness. The five-fold wall is the five wisdoms. The eight pillars are the limbs of the eight-fold noble path. The bells, collections of za ra or bakuli, garlands of suns and moons, yak tails and jewels are the five senses and powers. The parasols are dharmadhatu. The wheels are the four truths. The cornices are the changeless nature of mind. The garlands and pendants are the seven limbs of enlightenment. The eaves are the great compassion. The stupas of the railing are inconceivable dharmata. The circular vase is the wisdom of dharmadhatu. The four rises are the four excellent wisdoms. The five seats are the essential purity of the five poisons. The vajra and jewel finial is the primordial luminous nature of mind. The eight charnel grounds are the eight consciousnesses. The eight teachers are the eight self-arising wisdoms. The eight fires are the completely torment of false conceptions. The eight trees are the eight natures of the kleshas. The eight ponds are the eight-fold purifying path. The eight deities are the eight gates of siddhi. The eight nagas are the assembly of eight qualities. The eight lokapalas are the eight collections of merit and wisdom. That faults at the time of impurity and enlightened virtues correspond two by two is kindness. For example, as the five kleshas are counted as an aspect of the five wisdoms.

If they are connected to the path, they are associated with the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment. The four archways are the four foundations of mindfulness. The four tassels or ribbons are the four genuine abandonments. The four ornaments of wheels and so forth are the four legs of miracle. The five-fold wall is the five faculties. The cornices, garlands and pendants, eaves, railings, and overflowing containers are the five powers. The five animals, the lion and so forth, plus the sun and moon are the seven limbs of enlightenment. The eight pillars are the eight limbs of the noble path. The stairs by which the gates are entered are the six perfections. The four pillars are the four immeasurables. These three together at each gate are the three gates of liberation. These are the virtues from the path of accumulation through the path of meditation.

If it is connected with the fruition, the connection is with the qualities of the level of buddhahood. As for the 37 factors of completing the path, from this way of connecting, in particular the four fearlessnesses are the lion-thrones. The ten powers are the elephant thrones. The ten faculties are the peacock thrones. The four legs of miracle are the horse thrones. That all knowables are unobstructed is the shang shang thrones. The five wisdoms are the walls. The inexhaustible wheel of ornament of body, speech, and mind is the swirling light rays. The protectors of beings are the parasols. The matchless finial and so forth are adornment by the ultimate buddha qualities. These are arranged as in the Net of Illusion. The details are as extensively explained there.

Though some tantrikas say that these things that are connected are not really in the mandala, this tradition of mantra is a wrong conception. Here the beautiful symbols appear like reflections in a mirror. From the power of display of these qualities, the palace and deities naturally-arising like a rainbow should be known to exist spontaneously. When the ground is free from all obscurations, the power of self-appearances of Akanishta actually will manifest. The Net of Illusion says:

The inconceivable self-existing mandala
By which all sentient beings are consecrated,
Possesses the perfection of all mandalas
Along with their environments and inhabitants.

c. Meditating on the deities

Now we shall discuss the mandala of the inhabitants, the deities. Within this palace, on thrones of lions and so forth, from the transformation of the seed syllables of the individual deities:

There are the deities of the five families with their consorts There are also eight male and eight female sattvas.

There are also four male and four female door-keepers.

The buddhas of the six lokas are in their proper places.

Their bodies, perfect in color, scepters, and ornaments,

Emanate limitless light rays to the limits of the directions.

In the center is Vairocana together with Akashadhatvishvari, dark blue. In the east is Akshobhya together with Mamaki, white. In the south is Ratnasambhava together with Buddhacoca, yellow. In the west is Amitabha together with Pandaravasini. In the north is Amoghasiddhi together with Tara.

On the ground below them is a four-spoked wheel. There the five families abide. Outside of the wheel is a square and four square patterns. At each of the bordering corners inside and out there are two deities making eight altogether.

At the southeast corner is Kshitigarbha and Lasya, the goddess of grace green-blue. In the southwest is Akashagarbha and Mala, dark blue³⁶⁷ and blue. In the northwest are Avalokiteshvara and Gita. In the northeast are Samantabhadra and Gandhe green-yellow.

On the edges of the courtyards are the six buddhas. At the east gate are Yamantaka and his consort. At the south gate are Vijaya and consort. At the west gate are Hayagriva and his consort.

At the north gate is Amritakundalin and his consort. They stir up the continuum a little so that it will unite.

d. How to meditate on the great mandala of the environment and inhabitants.

In particular as for its being taught that action and doer are displayed in the courtyard, this is the courtyard of Vairochana's heart:

Within the heart-center of the principal deity,
Ground-Samantabhadra is being embraced by his consort.
His body is adorned with the major and minor marks.
In color he is like a spotless sapphire sky.
He is seated in cross-legged posture in a blazing globe of colors?³⁶⁸
Meditate that from this light rays are emanated.
They purify the vessel and essence of the world.
All is completely pure as the gods and goddesses.

In the heart center of Vairochana on a sun and moon disk is Samantabhadra, in meditation with his consort, dark blue. By the emanation of light rays of all colors,³⁶⁹ all the environment and inhabitants of the phenomenal world become one with the palace of deities. Meditate that all dharmas become of the nature of the buddha field of Akanishta Gandavyuha. As this is joined with the texts, the Fierce Lightning says:

In the numerous host of wisdom deities
Who are the inhabitants of this palace
The deities are united with their consorts.

At the center in the heart of the glorious palace
Is Vairochana along with his mudra consort.
They are of the color of Indranila.³⁷⁰
As their emblem they hold wheels in their hands.

In front of that hero is Vajrasattva with consort,
Having the colors of conch shell and of crystal.
As their sign they hold vajras in their hands.

To the right is the Bhagavan Ratnasambhava.
He is of yellow color like Jambunada.
As his sign he holds an eight sided jewel.

Behind is lord Amitabha, colored like ruby.
As his emblem he grasps a crimson lotus.

To the left is the lord Amogasiddhi.
With a body color like Indranila.
As his emblem he is bearing a sword.

They are all adorned with peaceful ornaments,
And are wearing the crown of the five families.
They are sitting in full lotus posture
With long necklaces and customary armlets.
Their bracelets and their earrings are exquisite.
The major and minor marks are all complete.

The consorts who are embraced with the left arm
Are Samantabhadri and Lochana
Mamaki, Pandaravasini, and Tara.
They embrace the lords of upaya with the right hand.

With the left they grasp their signs and bells,
With customary ornaments like the fathers'.

The spokes of the wrathful wheel are self-existing.
In front of it there is a beautiful rise.
In the deities' hands are vajras of light blue.
Their sign is the three pointed vajra that they hold.

To the right of these is Kshitigarbha.
Green-blue in color grasping a precious sprout.
Behind this mandala is Akashagarbha.
He is blue and holding his symbol, a sword.

To the left embraced by beautiful Gita.
Lord Avalokiteshvara is light red.
He grasps a lotus, his customary sign.
His topknot is adorned with jñanasattvas.
He sits in the cross-legged position of the sattvas
Adorned with the customary ornaments.

Embracing these above four deities
Are the consorts Nritya, Lasya, Mala, and Gita.
Their right hands by upaya grasp the principals.
The left are in dance mudra, with mirror, and mala
They have a vina;³⁷¹ and their ornaments
Are like those of the principal deities.

As for the beautiful squares that are at the borders
They are white to signify kindness or maitri.
They are adorned with beautiful snake-wood gandis.

In the square that is on the southern border
Is Nirviranavishkambin who is blue,
Holding in his hand a dharmachakra.
Beautiful on the border to the south-west
Is light red Manjushrikumara.
He holds as his symbols a lotus and sword.
Beautiful on the border to the north-west,
Is Samantabhadra yellow-green in color.
His emblems are a jewel and ear of grain.
At the corner of the northeast intermediate direction
To the left of these who were just described above
Embracing these above four deities
Are the consorts gandha, pushpa, Gita, and Dhupa
With their right hands they embrace their consorts.
With the left they are holding their own signs.
With customary ornaments as before.

At the four gates are the four conquerors.
Blazing Yamantaka is dark blue
With a goat's head holding the scepters of confidence

Dwelling as the guardian of the east
Is blazing Vijaya, who is dark yellow,
Holding a vajra at the southern gate.
Blazing dark red is horse-headed Hayagriva,
Holding a skull and snake at the western gate.

Blazing Amritakundalin, dark green,
Holds a crossed-vajra at the northern gate.
He is standing in a dancing posture,
Adorned with the various charnel ornaments.

All these show their teeth in a frightening way
They are all enveloped in blazing fires
The sounds of HUM and Phat are loudly resounding.

Embracing these above four deities
Are Shemo, Gyaljema, Tamdrinmo, and Khyilma.
Awesome, holding iron chains and bells.
Their scepters are iron hooks and iron nooses.
Their accoutrements are like those of the conquerors.
Those at each of these gates are self-existing.

Within the beautiful courtyards of the palace,
Are the great sages, the six nirmanakayas.
They show whatever bodies³⁷² are needed for taming.
And so the accoutrements they show are uncertain.

In these beautiful courtyards, in the front and back
Are Jepapo and -mo, of sky-like color.
They are resting in the state of samadhi.
These and so forth are inconceivably excellent,
Unexpressed and inexpressible.

The palace is filled by a host of deities.
The limitless mandala is self existing.
In the heart centers of these excellent deities
Are jnanasattvas whose light is full of colors
On their tongues are the syllables of their signs.
Their own signs clearly appear over all the mudras.
They are of every color, with all the styles,
Soft, supple, caressing, yielding, and young,
Clear, brilliant, and abundantly bountiful
They are consecrated with brilliant blazing.
That divine nature illumines the mandala.

Pure of the five skandhas, these are the pure deities of the five families. The deities with their consorts are explained as the union of appearance and emptiness. The eye, ear, nose, and tongue are the four inner bodhisattvas. Form, sound, taste, and touch are their four consorts, the four inner female bodhisattvas. The pure eye, ear, nose, and tongue powers are the four external sattvas.

The four times, the past, future, present, and inconceivable dharmata, are the outer female bodhisattvas. Touch, the toucher, the touched, and awareness of touch having symbolized sense consciousness, sense, sense-object, and the four gates are the pure forms of the four ayatanas arising from sense consciousness. All dharmas are neither eternal nor nothingness. They have no self-natures and no characteristics. These are the four gates of dharmata.

The pure existence of the six kleshas, six perfections, six kinds of beings, and six purifying sages, and alaya and alayavijnana is Samantabhadra and his consort. All these deities presently divided from alaya are joined to the collections of consciousness with their faculties and objects. This is the situation of impurity. If they are purified, they are joined to the wisdoms and buddha fields. Knowing them in that way is knowing them as the pure deities.

e. How to recite the mantra

After the nature of the mandala thus elucidated has been known as one's own mind, from the seed syllables in the heart centers of the deities filling the space of the sky, the mantra garland goes from the mouth of the deity into that of the consort, and from the secret space, on the tips of whirling light rays, come a host of syllables and bodies of deities and countless scepters. In the world they do benefit for sentient beings. Think that the self-sound of mantra resounds like a thousand thunders OM AH HUM SVAHA or OM HUM HRAM HRIH AH.

Recite the three syllables and the seeds of the five buddha families.
They become unborn sound-emptiness, like an echo.
Let yourself come to rest in this unfabricated state.

Recite the three syllables and the seed syllables of the five families. It is like the unborn roar of a thousand thunders. Within that rest in meditation without artificiality. Also abandoning the faults of additions and omissions and reciting too fast, slow, weakly or, strongly, do the recitation. This very sound emptiness of reciting the mantra is the completion stage of sound. From that state, undisturbed mind and yoga without attachment should be produced.

b. The completion stage,

There are three sections

1. The main explanation of how to meditate

At this time:

Our minds are eternally of the nature of the deities.
Our bodies are the mandala; the words of our speech are mantra.
Within the great wisdom everything is self-perfected,
Wisdom and samaya are a non-duality.
Nothing needs to be summoned and there is nothing that comes.
Therefore, there is nothing that we could ask to depart.
There is no good and evil, no accepting and no rejecting.

This primordial mandala has always been within us.
By supplicating when we know that this is so,
This, which is unestablished, will never be made to be.

Having supplicated simply by knowing that all dharmas are the single mandala of buddhahood, we do the recitation, offerings, and praises, within the state of everything being the great spontaneous presence of the nature of one's own mind. Nevertheless in the yanas below yoga tantra there is attachment to the duality of good and evil, and therefore the jñanasattva enters into one from outside, and also the departure of the deities after the session is not explained in the same way. The Wondrously Arisen King says:

Within the primordial mandala of self-existing equality,
Having attained the knowledge that one was always there,
By different stages of mind involved with meditation,
Inviting and supplicating is not necessary.

Since body is established as the deity, speech as mantra, and mind as samadhi, practice does not differentiate samayasattva and jñanasattva. There is no contradiction between this and saying that beginners and those who delight in complexity should invite jñanasattvas and make offerings and praises to them. The Secret Essence says:

We enter the three thousand worlds as a few tiny syllables,
From space we invite the mandala make our offerings.

2. How afterwards one gathers everything into the conceptionless.

Afterwards, there is a gradual gathering in of attachment.
Rest in simplicity without conceptions of anything.
When not there in illusion like the moon in water,
Dedicate the merit to help all sentient beings.

Here beginners gradually gathering in, meditate on emptiness and then by having trained in that very visualization of exhaustion, meditating within the illusory state of appearance/emptiness, dedicate the merit.

3. The stages during the sessions

Act as if all is illusion, emptiness/luminosity.
All appearances and sounds are deities and mantra.
All memories and thoughts are self-arising wisdom.
From moment to moment this should be known unwaveringly.

During meditation on the mandala of the deities, and also in post-meditation, the environment, the apparent phenomena of the world, are the palace, and the beings who inhabit the world are the gods and goddesses. All sounds are mantra. All cognitions are self-arising wisdom. They rest shimmering in the great non-grasping where whatever arises and is encountered is liberated. So that they do not become ordinary appearances and thoughts of the five poisons, try to remain there undistracted day and night.

c. The accompanying samaya and action/practice,

1) The instruction to keep pure samaya,

Now as accompaniments to the practice of secret mantra:

Let us purely keep our root and branch samayas.
Know and accept them purely. Do not give up, but act.
Five times five samayas are meant to be accomplished.
These twenty-five can be summarized under body, speech, and mind.
Let us try to keep our minds completely pure.

As explained before, guard the three root samayas and the five times five branch samayas. In brief, train in mind being pure and faultless as the chief samaya. The Tantra of the Array of Samaya says:

What is often talked about
As "samaya blah blah blah"
Is guarding one's own mind
In a state of purity.
Samaya is a great wonder.
So all the buddhas have taught.

The Individual Enlightenment says:

Performing no evil deeds,
Acting in perfect virtue,
One's mind is completely tamed.
Thus it is taught by the buddhas.

That is enough for a brief summary, but for the extended version, there should be as many samayas as the assembly of thoughts of sentient beings. The Secret Essence says:

As for this samaya
It is most wonderful.

In the ten directions
In all of the six lokas,

As many as thoughts of beings
Inhabiting the three realms,
There are that many samayas
For the purpose of taming them.

Accountable samayas exist in relation to relative truth. In relation to absolute truth all dharmas are inexpressible, beyond any limits that could be guarded, the great suddenness, the unestablished samaya of Samantabhadra. The same text says:

As the unestablished ultimate,
The mudra of supremacy,
The King Samantabhadra,
Everything is established.

The All-Creating King says:

Kye! As for the samaya of me the doer of all,
It is unborn like the sky, beyond all partiality,
Without the duality of guarding and non-guarding,
Realize the samaya of the King, the doer of all.

2) Delineating the particular times of practice and accomplishing

Moreover to complete the two accumulations and pacify all hindrances accomplish siddhi and therefore remedy all violations:

On the fifteenth day of the month and the time of the new moon,
And also on the feast days of the eighth and twenty-ninth,
And the tenth day and night of the waxing and waning moon,
Perform the proper approaching and accomplishing
With feasts and offerings, confession and amending.

There are six times for accomplishing siddhi and the remedy of confessing. These are the fifteenth day of the month, the time of the empty sky of the new moon, and the eighth, twenty-fifth, tenth, and twenty-ninth days of the month. On these externally dakinis are abroad, and internally the pranās are especially well-gathered in the nadis. These are called "the times of close gathering." In particular, the night of the tenth day of the waxing moon and the night of the twenty-fifth, the tenth day of the waning moon, in the places of practice, those who have the dakini practices gather to accomplish whatever karmas they want to attain. They should exert themselves in the four, approaching and so on, and make feast offerings and confessions. By that, on these days of the month all transgressions will be remedied. The supreme and ordinary siddhis are quickly accomplished. Moreover in single trees, rock mountains, islands in lakes and, so forth there are gatherings of the dakinis at the auspicious times, which are therefore called places of "gathering near."

The four inner chakras are always included in the dhatu and wisdom. This is called "gathering at the auspicious time at the place of drawing near."

The external places are the twenty four places and so on. The "near" place, is any place where the dakinis are. Internally they are the twenty four places of the petals of the nadis, the crown of the head and so on. The secret great bliss is the ground of offering. This is the "place of drawing near."

3. How from the virtues the fruition manifests,

Since on all these days the supreme level is chiefly established, arising from the secret individual tantras and oral instructions:

Let us earnestly try to reach the profoundest piths
Of the yoga of prana and mind, of nada and bindu.
By meditating on the path that unifies,
The experiences of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought.
Let us be vajra-holders within this very life.
Let us attain the state of perfect enlightenment.

As for the supported, the samadhi mandala, yogins familiar with the upaya of the developing and completion stages always train in the completion stage of the great wisdom, knowing how to meditate on the above-taught nature of prana, nadi, and bindu as it is and in its ultimate arising. When one dwells in non-dual wisdom, by the tummo of the navel, the drops of the melting element at the crown of the head, the great essence, fall from the throat into the heart center. They activate the secret center and the downward going prana is reversed. By its essence going into the heart, the support of the above-mentioned bodhicitta, mixed with light, is touched by that, so that the luminous nature of mind is pervaded by mahasukha even more than before.

When the nature of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought arises, rest in the subtle light of the heart center. By the arising of inconceivable wisdom whose body is space, this is called treading on the level of the great dhyana. At that time, body, speech, and mind become one and inseparable, and it is said that the three realms are not separate.

Also as for the nadi petals of the heart center and their essences, the Commentary of the Secret Drop says:

"Whoever has that absorption" and so forth, means whoever has that absorption has the essential nature. If it so exists, as for the white silk essences of the nadis which are like twined cords, their producing the essence of the skandhas from non-obstruction is the essence of arising. It appears as earth. This is the consort who illuminates the buddhas' eyes, Buddhacharya. That is the wisdom of the great emptiness. It produces the support of everything not being other than the state of complete purity.

These white silk cords, are vibrated by the vermilion sound essence. As for its existing like the essence of the mother, since it has made the skandhas primordially pure, that arising essence appears as water. This is the consort Mamaki. The wisdom of equality is the nature that combines all these in a single space without separation.

The breath-essence, gold, existing under the earth as mere vapor, producing the primordial support of the rising and motion of the skandhas, appearing as the air element is Tara and all-accomplishing wisdom. This nature produces the essence of great bliss.

Moreover, the primordial heat-essence, like the sun resting in a mirror, existing as a mere fragrance, ripens as the apparent element fire. This is Pandaravasini and discriminating awareness wisdom. It is the wisdom lamp of realizing everything as the space of mahasukha.

In the center of that light, consisting of the great bindu, bodhicitta is the great essence. It produces the support of the primordial luminosity of the skandhas. It is the essence of arising, appearing as space and the nadis. That is the wisdom of the great pervasiveness, the consort Samantabhadri revealing the luminous state of everything as the space of authenticity, appearance/emptiness. The essence like a flower of molten gold is prajna, the nature of all the consorts. What is like precious saffron anthers is the essence of the king of Upaya, Samantabhadra, and so forth, the father deities. Moreover, the precious white stone ke ke ru, seemingly filling all gaps, is the mirror-like wisdom. By that the essence of bodhicitta is seen as if unseen, without a seer, and nothing to see. That which is the father is the mother. That which is the mother is the father. They are seen as radiance without difference. That should be viewed as that having that itself. That is called bindu. What exists in that way is the union of upaya and prajna. Not only that, but it exists as all the three realms. That nature of bodhicitta is viewed. It should be continuously viewed and magnetized.

In the center of the eight nadis of the heart, are the essence nadis, divided like ten hairs of a horse's tail and no bigger, and within that the blood essence is the breath. The essence of breath is luminous like light. For example, like the oily wick of a blazing lamp, self-arising wisdom is luminous with the brilliance of the five lights. The essence of the elements goes up and down, since they dwell there like many oils, and like the blazing up of a luminous lamp, self-arising wisdom also produces great luminosity within the body, and in all the nadi petals. Since bliss increases, it arises as the wisdom of self-awareness. Here appearance is the five fathers. All the solid earth of the nadis and so forth is Buddhacana. Moisture and water are the great essence Mamaki. Bliss and heat are Pandaravasi. Lightness and movement are Tara. Since simple space is inseparably united with these ladies, this is called the great union. At that time, the body, speech, and mind syllables of the nadis blaze with light. When the syllables of the basis of purification have been burned, no karma and habitual patterns are conceptualized. Liberation of samsara into dharmata is produced. This is supported by the nadis. By breath bliss is moved. By heat bliss is ripened. By space, the space of equality/equanimity of the great perfection is produced. Realization of the complete liberation of the three worlds as Samantabhadra is produced. The same text says:

If it is asked, "If one meditates like that, what happens, and from what does it arise?" What is being talked about is the wisdom of buddhahood. It is the arising of space as form. The great yoga is not different from the three realms. From what does it arise? From the great essence, profound and unbroken, from that it arises. If it is asked what comes from that, From that that arises. That itself arises, so it is said.

When bindu-bodhicitta has just become workable and radiant, above and below OM are SU and TRI and above and below HUM are AH and NRI. Above and below AH are PRE and DU blazing with light. The bindu drops of the essence become natureless. Since bindu is natureless, in the nadis like white silk cords no bigger than ten hairs of a horse's tail only the vibrating vermilion essence of the mother exists producing desire within the great bliss. By that blazing with light, the breath essence like gold in a brocade, abiding as a mere vapor produces movement within the great bliss. That blazes with light. Within it the essence of heat, like the sun in a mirror, existing as a mere fragrance, ripens the great bliss. Blazing with light, it becomes the natureless great essence.

Arising only in the form of space, all the three worlds spontaneously rise as non-individualized wisdom, so it is said. This bindu-bodhicitta arising as the form of space is dharmakaya. That is called "just so."

Then within the navel the nadi petals blaze, and regarding how the heart bodhicitta is illumined by that and made to blaze with light, the same text says:

The secret prajna bindu is called space and so forth. This secret prajna is called the bindu having the nature of Samantabhadri. This is dharmadhatu. Where does it dwell? In the navel. In the center of sixty-four nadis dwells the sun. What is its nature like? It is like prajna and upaya. Arising from that bindu, all marks being grasped is the fathers. It is upaya. As for this natureless bindu being dharmadhatu, this is prajna, the mothers. Thus bindu consists of inseparable prajna and upaya. From that bindu form and the three realms arise. All these elements in a mandala of forty-two do not become many. Becoming a mandala, since all these are the bindu of dharmadhatu, they are said to develop or be sealed as everything. Here the five wisdoms are spontaneously present. They exist and are seen as five and so-called. As the above essences become radiant from the power of heat, their heat descends. This is the bindu of the nature of Samantabhadri. Its dissolving downward is called "descending." The bindu of the nature of Samantabhadri blazes with light. This is called the blaze of dissolving into the essence of the heart center. By this the great essence brilliant gold, until then existing under a covering, having existed as a mere vapor, blazes with light, having become the radiant drops of the essence. Without the ground of breath, it becomes ever weaker until it is motionless. If that motion is absent, its causeless fruition existing as the great bliss is called the great-bliss offering. That heat of great bliss dissolving into the above bindus is called urging the bindus to blaze with light. Moreover, by the heat of the heart center the bindus descend. By their touching the bliss heat in the center of the nadi petals, again that heat becomes the essence. When it dissolves into the heart-center essence, by the ceasing of the cause of coarse prana, bindu rests without coming and going in the heart. Existing motionlessly, it is dharmata, absolute truth.

Then by the heat of the heart center, touching the essence in the center of the nadis of the throat, the essence proliferates in the heart. Also, by the ceasing of prana it rests in dharmata, about which the same text says:

This light of the great essence dissolving into the bindu of the throat, is called union. Where does it dwell? In the center of sixteen nadis, as a lotus blossom, it is said to be in a nadi mandala of two fives and six. Energized by the heat below, it blazes with light. Existing as the great bliss, this is called the great bliss. The great bliss is spontaneously present. After this it does not move back. The great rejoicing should be offered. By what is called the merit of the arising place of knowables and so forth, knowables are objects, and arisings³⁷³ are thoughts. Exhaustion is radiant bindu. This is called the wisdom of exhausting thoughts through light and luminous bindu. Bindu itself without nature appears as the great bliss. This is called the music of the play of bliss. That is called bindu entering into and dwelling in the place of great bliss.

Moreover, when the heat of the heart center dissolves into the throat-bindu, prana and thoughts do not wander. This is the virtue of breath dissolving into bindu. As for heat, at the time of non-identification, or non-grasping at essences,³⁷⁴ when passion has been exhausted, there is the wisdom of great bliss. As for breath, at the time of non-identification, when aggression is exhausted, it is the wisdom of luminosity/emptiness. When the empty hollows of the nadis are not identified, that is the time of exhausting ignorance, the wisdom of the simplicity of dharmadhatu.

Now the heat of the throat enters the essence at the crown of the head. Regarding how the wisdom of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought is produced, the same text says:

"In a mandala of three tens and two" and so forth having come into the center of thirty-two, having come into the center of space, it exists as moon-bindu-bodhicitta.

That same bindu is the substance of buddhahood, dharmakaya, the main point. The perfection of the mandala of the ten directions and four times is this itself. Body, speech, mind, quality, and action are this same bindu.

But after the bindu of the great bliss has been touched by the light of that throat bindu, dissolving into light, it becomes a coronation vase of the nature of the great bliss. The three realms become non-different. After wisdom has arisen in the form of space, it becomes dharmakaya pure of all things. In this sense, the yogin who becomes dharmakaya will see the faces of all the buddhas at once.

Moreover, that great essence in the center of the space chakra at the crown of the head, blazing with light because of that heat, is the mahasukhakaya. Having reached that, by enlightenment one treads on the level of the great ushnisha. If the four stages of this are briefly summarized, first in the center of the navel, the aspect of heat, the bindu having the essence of the sun, in the center of sixty-four nadis, is made into a condition by touching the heat in the essence of the heart center. Then the wisdom of nirmanakaya is realized.

When the heat blazes upward touching the great essence of the heart center, the prana and breath essence subsides. False conceptions are pacified. This is the wisdom of sambhogakaya.

Since the essence of this mode of dharmas is free from producing movement, prana and mind dissolve back into luminosity as the great wisdom. However, as for the essences increasing in the nadi petals being the wisdom of bliss-emptiness, it is not so. These essences are collected back into the essences in the center of the four essence chakras. A non-supreme luminosity arises. The bliss-heat-desire aspect is the wisdom of bliss. The moving breath prana-dissolving aspect is the wisdom of luminosity. Mixed with the space element aspect within the nadis, these arise as the three wisdoms of non-thought. This is called the circle³⁷⁵ of the three wisdoms. As for the fruition of all these, incidentally one has mastery over life and is established as a rigdzin of mahamudra. By attaining the virtues of the paths of seeing and meditation, as signs of that level one sees many buddha fields, accomplishes great samadhis and miracles, and benefits beings with inconceivable emanations and Dharmas. Finally, by buddhahood, the spontaneous presence of wisdom manifests. The same text says:

"This is the ultimate empowerment." As for this and so forth, the yogin who is capable of this is empowered with mastery of life and so forth, whatever is desired. There is no other empowerment than this. By oneself existing as the mandala, as above in the supreme samadhi, one becomes the mandala. Here by this self-existing buddhahood in which the two accumulations are perfected, since one becomes all mandalas, their many enjoyments and ornaments do not fail to occur, this is called the ornament.

"By the dual perfection, the union of bindu...", Since bindu is workable, there is dharmakaya. This arises from perfecting the two accumulations. Such a yogin by the great compassion for sentient beings of the ten directions and four times, does benefits like dream or illusion and liberates them from samsara.

By these passages the teaching of extraordinary completion stage is completed. Now as for the summary of the developing and completion stage:

By having the single yoga,
All mandalas are accomplished.
Therefore this itself
Develops as well as perfects
The realm of Samantabhadra.
Moreover as above,
In regard to elaboration,
There are complex and very complex,
and also supremely complex.
Inconceivable to thought,
the limitless mandalas
Become spontaneous presence.

These are the incidental verses.

Here first is the presentation from the viewpoint of those who are not able to enter into the extensive developing stage or only devote themselves to the completion stage with little elaboration. As for the explanation that all will be meditated upon by meditating on the single deity, after going to refuge and arousing bodhicitta, as it says in the Secret Essence:

This rootless nature of mind
Is the root of all the dharmas.
The nature of the mind
Is the nature of the syllables,
The precious wishing clouds.

Also:

A is the middle way
Of having no conceptions
In between emptiness
and a non-empty reality,

All is just a name,
A whirling syllable garland

Abiding as all the buddhas.

By reciting A A A, all dharmas in a state without one and many are unobscured in the center of a sky free from clouds. In the center of the sun and moon shining brilliantly with rays of light, glorious Samantabhadra and Samantabhadri are non-dual. Having the mudra of meditation, as the nature of dharmakaya they are without the customary ornaments. Meditate on them in the midst of encircling light rays of the five colors, and that by the light of the palaces of Akanishta all the space of the sky is filled, so that the phenomenal world blazes with light.

OM AH HUM A A. Saying this as many times as you can, rest in the ultimate space of the sky. By this meditate on all the mandalas of the buddhas, since this is their source. The Secret Essence says:

In the limpid center of space on a sun and moon,
Meditating on the king of wisdom,
Seated cross-legged, in meditation pasture,
We are meditating on all the mandalas
Of the victorious ones without remainder.

Then as for how meditating in a single completion stage is meditating on them all, visualize that in the heart of the one meditating like that, brilliantly blazing globes of light, having the radiance of the five wisdoms of non-thought, take hold of the mind and render it immovable. When prana becomes immovable, whatever is perceived will not exist. One can rest for a day and night within the wisdom without one and many. Lights and rainbows appear. Buddha fields are visibly seen. By mixing day and night the mind rests in self-awareness wisdom with no rising or setting. Except for making clear that one's mind has been like that primordially, in attaining buddhahood no other nature is attained. The Secret Essence says:

In the four times and in the ten directions
No other perfect buddha will be found.
Mind itself is perfect buddhahood.
Do not search for any other buddha.

This kind of developing and completion stage unites all the mandalas of developing and completion. All the siddhis are accomplished. Little omissions and additions to rituals are no hindrance to siddhi. There are measureless benefits. The same text says:

By completely uniting all mandalas,
All mandalas are accomplished.
Now there will be no transgressions
Of additions or omissions.

Now, as explained above, in the brief teaching and the details of the extensive meditation on the mandala, these details should also be trained in. First, train successively in the three samadhis, the suchness samadhi and so forth until the signs are attained. Then from a white A by emanating and gathering fine A's, emanate and gather the vowels and consonants. Do the same from the seed syllable of the deity. The same text says:

A
From white A which has become completely stable,
Other very fine A syllables emanate.
Having filled and illumined the directions,
Even when they are gathered back again,
They are stable without increase and decrease.
From these the brightly blazing assembly of names
Is similarly emanated and gathered back.

Meditate on the seed syllables of the deities until they are clear. The virtues of this are long life, freedom from disease, not being harmed by obstacles of obstructing spirits and dōns, accomplishing the four karmas, and uniting with the supreme level. The same text says:

This dependent arising
of the vajra siddhi
Becomes the cause of wisdom.

Then meditate successively on the body of the deity, the ornaments, the syllable at the heart center, and the consort. Then while meditating on the retinue, Akshobhya and so forth, one after another, meditate on development and completion as one. At this time the signs of perfecting the path of accumulation arise.

Then on a rise in front visualize the retinue with Akshobhya as the principal one. Perfectly visualize behind the mandala the retinue with Amitabha as the principal one. This is the mandala of three groups. Train in these as body, speech, and mind.

Then on a rise to the south and north visualize the mandalas of Ratnasambhava and Amoghasiddhi. These are quality and action. This is the mandala of five groups.

Then with the gate-keepers in union with their consorts, this is the root of all mandalas. There is no need to meditate on any other, since this is the mandala in which all others are included. These gatekeepers of the four directions are the gatekeepers of the four directions of all mandalas. For example, below the rise in the east are Ankusha and consort as gatekeepers. To the right below Ratnasambhava are Pasha³⁷⁶ and consort. The west and north are similar. The faces of all these deities are seen from whatever direction they are viewed. The same text says:

From every direction their faces are clear and vivid.

Meditate on them facing in the direction of the principal deity. At that time, the virtues of the four stages of the path of preparation are perfected.

Then in the four directions above and below meditate on the mandalas of the five families.

In the east is the mandala of Vajrasattva, like that there are 5 x 5. In the south, west and north too, are three more, with 5 x 5. In the center is the mandala of Vairochana with 5 x 5. Within the 25 mandalas, the number of deities of the root mandala is 42 2.[422?]. The rises 38 8 [388?] these 170 x 5 = 850, [810?] by meditating on those the virtues of the path of seeing are perfected.

Then the 1000 and 20,000 appearance-producing buddhas of the lower seven bhūmis are perfected.

Then meditating on those as limitless as space, there are limitless self-existing mandalas. The virtues of the three pure levels are perfected. These very numerous teachings are established. This style is explained in the Great Net of Illusion. Some deities are deities of blessing body, speech, and mind. Some are crown-ornament deities. Some are heart syllable jñanasattvas. These divisions should be understood from the Secret Essence and so forth. By that the explanation together with the subsidiary points is completed.

C. The dedication of merit

Now there is the dedication of merit:

Thus by this utterly secret, unsurpassable heart,
Beset by karma and kleshas of beings here in samsara,
Yet living so close to the palace of Sri Heruka himself,
May the weariness of mind come to rest this very day.

By the power of wondrously risen unsurpassable virtue, may all beings preoccupied by the games of the kleshas be liberated from the city of samsara. May they effortlessly reach the primordial city of Heruka whose primordial ultimate nature is self-existing. May they be confirmed by joy. May their weariness be relieved by the goodness of the Dharma of complete liberation.

Fully illumined by massive accumulations of virtue,
By the limitless radiant wisdom of the sun and moon,

May beings truly vanquish the darkness of the four continents.
May appearance of the good path of freedom be produced.

From the principal essence amid a measureless ocean,
By the crown jewels of the nagas, the two accumulations,
May degenerations of many births be cleared away.
By the wealth of the Dharma wishing-rain, may they be fulfilled.

By the power of riding the horse of the excellent vehicle,
Completely carried away from the three worlds that burden beings,
When all has been transformed to the path of enlightenment,
May they cross to the city of the great liberation.

Chapter IX: UNIFYING THE DEVELOPING STAGE AND THE PERFECTING STAGE

After training our being by the paths of the ordinary vehicles, comes the path manifesting the unified kayas within one lifetime. The ninth topic of the main subject is the chapter on the Practice of Unifying the Developing Stage and the Perfecting Stage. The general topic has three sections,

- A. Resolving the view
- B. Practicing the meditation
- C. Dedicating the merit.

- A. Resolving the view,

There are nine sections

1. The instruction to train in the vajrayana, the essence of the teachings:

When the excellent mind of bodhicitta has been aroused,
We can enter into the stages of developing and completion,
As they occur in the outer and inner secret mantra.

As just explained, after being taught how to enter according to the vehicles of cause and characteristics, as the fruition, there is the instruction to enter the vehicles of secret mantra. The details of these vehicles are the current topic.

2. Why mantrayana is more noble than the stages of characteristics.

Why?

Here there are many means and also no difficulties.
Though the meaning is one with that of the other yantras,
There is no confusion about the means of entering.
Those of the sharpest powers are empowered in these four,
Kriya, Charya, and yoga, and also anuttara.

Though the buddha taught inconceivably many vehicles in accord with the minds of sentient beings, they are all included within three. The mahayana is taught to have the duality of cause and fruition. The causal vehicles are taught to be the means of first entering. Their fruition is taught to be the vajrayana. The Net of Miracles of Manjushri says:

By the skillful means of the various vehicles,
Having the divisions of the benefit of beings,
As for the definite outcome of the three vehicles,

It exists as fruition, the single vehicle.

These vehicles are also ascertained as two. Since individuals in the mahayana have two families, it is taught that there are two kinds of skillful means or paths. Individuals who have little craving for desirable qualities or who have renounced these desirable qualities, and wish for liberation, are taught the bodhisattva vehicle. For those unable to abandon desirable qualities, there is the skillful means of the stages of secret mantra.

These two families train in their two paths until the path of seeing arises. The time when this arises is called the path of seeing by the bodhisattvas. This same wisdom of complete non-thought is designated "the supreme siddhi of mahamudra" by mantrayana.³⁷⁷ The time until this arises, using the individual methods³⁷⁸ of these paths, is respectively long and short.

In the vehicle of characteristics, apparent aggression is abandoned, and by kindness alone without many other means, the attempt is made to gain the one benefit or goal, establishing the fruition. There are great agonies of asceticism. It is not skillful in profound means of practice. Since it is a means of practice for those whose powers are relatively dull, all this is practiced by dualistic abandoning and antidotes. Since the aspect to be abandoned is not brought to the path, half of what there is never becomes part of the path. This is a narrow path and a lesser cause of enlightenment.

The tantras reject those methods. When apparent aggression is produced, there are many means for dealing with it. Here too there may be kindness, or in the developing stage it is seen as illusion-like, or in the completion stage as the wisdom of non-thought, or by working with that very aggression, it becomes the mirror-like wisdom, and so forth. Asceticism of body, speech, and mind plays a minor part. When the single goal is established, since this and that means beyond the scope of thought are possessed, it is established with certainty. Having been produced for those of sharpest powers, kriya, upa, yoga, and the great yoga of anuttara-tantra are taught. The Lamp of the Three Methods says:

Not unintelligent about the single goal,
Having many means and therefore not ascetic,
Having been produced for those with the sharpest powers,
The mantra vehicles are especially noble

3. Why those to be tamed are taught

Why are these four tantras taught?

They are graded by time and caste, and powers of the mind.
The yugas are krita and treta, dvapara and kali.
Brahmins and kshatriyas, vaishyas and shudras³⁷⁹ are the castes;
The powers are dull and average; sharp and very sharp.

Kriya chiefly teaches baths and cleansing rites.
Charya teaches that actions of the body and speech
Are equal in importance with meditations of mind.
Yoga teaches that meditation is most important.
Actions of body and speech are just accompaniments.

Anuttara is free from actions of the three gates.
There is no conception of separate subject and object.
Their ultimate concern is the luminous nature of mind.
Cleansing rites are few, or even are discarded.

In regard to time, kriya is completed in one kalpa. Since there will be no cause of manifesting the kleshas of a sentient being, like the humanoids of Kurava the northern continent, kriya yogins do not depend on vows and discipline, or virtuous antidotes of mind. Purificatory rites of body and speech and actions alone become the focus.

In regard to the four castes, the brahmin or priestly caste is tamed by means of rites of purification and asceticism, without engaging in others. Those of dull powers who do not understand the great undertakings of mind, can see this Dharma of actions of body and speech, and enter into those. Depending on those three purposes they are taught tantras chiefly teaching washing, rites, and purification, Amoghabasha, and Supreme Insight, Well Established, the Appearance of the Three Worlds, etc.

Also, this is most taught in the first krita yuga, because little secret and stealthy desire arises as a cause of manifesting kleshas.

In the times of enjoyment and light karma of the treta yuga, actions of body and speech are constrained, and objects of purification and rites become one of two goals, for those of the warrior-ruler kshatriya caste who are not so entirely devoted to purification rites. Having realized things realizable by middling powers, they are taught upa tantras, the Lotus Peak and others with their three families of deities. Acts of body and speech and meditation of mind are equally taught.

In the dvapara yuga, kleshas are coarser, and meditating according to mental activity and so forth becomes the goal. The merchant vaishya caste is widely devoted, and this is taught for those who are capable and of sharp powers, chiefly with mental meditation, with those of body and speech just as an accompaniment. In yoga tantra they abandon the lower realms and are taught the Vajra Space and so forth.

In the kali yuga, when lives are about a hundred years, the dark age, the time of indolence of impetuous stupidity, the goal will come about only by means of mind. Tribal people or the shudra caste, have no purificatory rites at all, but great ascetic discipline. This is to be realized by those of very sharp powers, from all actions of body, speech, and mind not being conceptualized with grasping and fixation, accepting and rejecting, asserting and denying, hope and fear and so forth, but being realized as non-dual. Since the nature of mind, the greatness of primordial buddhahood is self-existing, there is the great dharma that seeks for no other buddha than that, anuttara yoga tantra. The Net of Miracles with its short explanation of peaceful and wrathful deities, Chakrasamvara, Guhyasamaja and so forth are taught. The Secret Establishment says:

Since students have the time
And the fortune of being tamed
The four great styles of mantra
Are famed throughout the world.

4. The three from kriya to yoga

These individual stages are explained:

The Sage has said that the tantras of kriya, chary, and yoga
Are the tantras of action, total comportment, and mental union.

Kriya is the tantra of action, upa that of comportment, and yoga that of yogic union. These three famous tantras were taught by the Sage. They resemble the vehicles of external marks in having rites of purification and vows of activity. The Sage called them the tantra or continuity vehicles.

5. How these are classified as the external secret mantra

As for these great tantras:

These are the outer mantra. One cannot meditate
On yab yum deities, united in sexual union.
There is no teaching of the five meats and the five amritas.
They remain entirely in rites of purification.

In kriya and upa tantra there are male and female sattvas. These deities of vidya mantra and dharani remain in the manner of master and servant and companion respectively, and there is no union with them. In yoga tantra the great four-fold arrangement of the mandala is taught as sambhogakaya, but there is no union with it. By meditating successively on upaya and prajna, the developing and completion stages are separated. There is no use of the five meats and five amritas as samaya substances. These are grasped as defiled objects to be purified. The Tantra of the Play of the Great Power says:

Clouds of enjoyment of upaya and prajna
Are the principal means of establishing wisdom.
As for the five meats and the five amritas
And the highest play of mahasukha
These wonderful ways of being are absent here.
Those with the lesser fortune of tormenting rites
Of purity do not have such things as these.

6. The divisions of the three inner tantras

As for the divisions of the three inner tantras:

There are three divisions within anuttara tantra,
These are the father and mother and the non-dual tantras.
Respectively each of these has as its emphasis
The developing and perfecting stages and their union.
These three yantras are known as maha, anu, and ati.
The deities may unite, and in holy substances
There is no distinction of what is clean or defiled.
Rather it is taught that all is of one taste,
Regarded as the play of a single mandala.

The Guhyasamaja and the Yamantaka and such yoga tantras are mahayoga, the aspect of the skillful means of the developing stage. the completion stage of mahayoga chiefly teaches prana. These include Yangdak, Vajrakilaya, Chakrasamvara, Hevajra, and so forth.

The prajna mother tantras are called anu yoga. Chiefly the completion stage of prajna is taught. The completion stage also chiefly works with the elements of bodhicitta and bindu, desiring the completely non-conceptual wisdom of bliss and emptiness.

The non-dual tantras, The Great Net of Illusion and so forth, are called ati yoga. This chiefly teaches the essence of prajna and upaya without adding and taking away, the union of the developing and fulfilling stages. In the completion stage from prana, nadi, and bindu are created bliss, luminosity, and non-thought, and the inconceivable luminosity of the great wisdom. Each of these three, as a symbol of the union of upaya and prajna, visualizes the embrace of yab yum. Since the meaning of this is being without accepting and rejecting, denying and asserting, clean and defiled, and such accepting and rejecting of good and bad, there is a play of samaya substances such as meat and liquor and so forth, and it is maintained that all dharmas are one in the enlightened mandala of primordial buddhahood. The king of the tantras that ascertain the suchness of the secret essence The Great Net of Illusion says:

Since it is the characteristic of all dharmas that they have a single essence with primordial buddhahood, they are inseparable from it.

7. How these are individually maintained

As for the way of maintaining these tantras:

In kriya we are inferior and the gods supreme.
We are like servants and the deities are the masters.
By practicing in that style, the siddhis will be received.
In Charya we view ourselves and the gods as being equal.
We are samayasattva, the deity jnanasattva.
The deity occupies the space in front of us.
Siddhi is received in the style of two friends.
In yoga while the two are actually non-dual,
The god is summoned to union and afterward dismissed.

Siddhi is received like water poured into water.

In kriya tantra, the jnanasattva deity is said to be like a king. We as servants hope to receive siddhi. The Tantra of Receiving the Siddhis of all the Families says:

The lord is viewed as a king,
And we see ourselves as servants.
Siddhi, the essence of tantra,
Is excellently received.

As for upa tantra, in front of the samayasattva, our visualization of the deity, we receive siddhi from the jnanasattva deity, visualized as a friend or companion. The Razor of the Three Families says:

With the deity as friend or companion
Ultimate siddhi is to be received.

In yoga tantra, we meditate on ourselves in union with the deity. The jnanasattvas of union are drawn in and dissolve into us. By sealing with the four mudras and so on, even when the offerings, praises, recitation, and so forth have been finished, one still supplicates. When non-duality actually occurs, siddhi is said to arise. The Dorje Jungwa says:

We receive non-dual dharmadhatu and
The highest ultimate siddhi.

We are blessed with the tathagata, padma, and vajra families of the external mantra, sealed with the samaya, dharma, karma, and maha-mudras.

8. The ways in which the highest three are the principal ones

As for mahayoga-tantra:

In maha, the chief means is prana and the developing stage;
In anu the dhatu and prajna in the completion stage;
In ati it is the wisdom where everything is non-dual;
But in all of them all dharmas are eternal equality.
The practice is done in the style of knowing that this is so.

Since all dharmas exist as primordially unborn emptiness, the nature of mind is known to be natureless like the sky. As for the practice, the Secret Assembly says:

Since these things are primordially unborn,
There are neither dharmas nor dharmata.
They are natureless like the space of the sky.
This is the way enlightenment is taught.

This was explained above. The *Miracles of Fierce Lightning*³⁸⁰ says:

E ma'o! free from all dharmas of things,
Free from skandhas and dhatus, and ayatanas,
We completely abandon grasping and fixation.
Since all dharmas are natureless equality,
One's own mind is also primordially unborn.
This is what is called the nature of emptiness

When this is known, the stage of visualizing the mandalas of the father tantras of upaya becomes upaya. The pranas of the five elements are completely purified. Luminosity/emptiness, the wisdom of complete non-thought, is the main point. By that the supreme and ordinary siddhis are established.

In the mother tantras of prajna, complexities of the developing stage are minimized. The dhatu of the great bliss, the space of speech, is the mandala of the bhaga or womb of the syllables. In the stages leading to supreme enlightenment, another's body is the prajna or mudra, and in one's own body, depending on upaya, mahasukha establishes enlightenment by the wisdom of the four joys.

In the non-dual tantras, as distinguished from both these stages, luminous dharmata, the great wisdom without one and many, is the main point and enlightenment is established. There is the three-fold luminosity of bliss, clarity, and non-thought. First from the workable dhatu self-existing samadhi arises. From that, supreme unchanging bliss pervades the whole of space, filling it with undefiled bliss. In the central channel the great essential clarity of the other two luminosities occurs. By the power of the inner five pranas, the motionless luminous clarity of wisdom arises in the four dhyanas. Externally the five lights of the five wisdoms, appearing as kaya, bindu, and shining light, fill the whole of space. The Net of Miracles of Manjushri says:

This vivid shining of the light of wisdom
Is the lamp of wisdom which is the light of beings.
This, the great brilliance, is luminosity.

Also:

To view possession of the garland of brilliance is sweet.
The blazing light of goodness is the glorious knot of eternity.

As the radiance of the five lights enters into the central channel, when the essence of the earth prana enters, mind rests within it. As external yellow light illuminates Ratnasambhava, pride is transmuted and the wisdom of equality is revealed. We are empowered with the samadhi of the ground of exhaustion, crossing to the southern ratna family pure land, Ratnakuta.³⁸¹

By the essence of the water prana entering the central channel, within it the essence of undisturbed mind is illuminated. Externally, by white light by illuminating Akshobhya, the mirror-like wisdom is revealed. Hatred is purified. We are empowered with the exhaustion-water samadhi, crossing to the eastern vajra family pure land, Abhirati.

By the prana of the fire essence entering into the central channel, within it the blissful heat arises. Externally by red light illuminating Amitabha, discriminating awareness wisdom is revealed. We cross to the western padma family pure land, Sukhavati.

By the prana of the air essence entering into the central channel, within the movement and increase of mind is attained. Externally, by green light illuminating Amoghasiddhi, the all-accomplishing wisdom is realized. Envy is purified. We are empowered with the exhaustion-prana samadhi, crossing to the northern karma family pure land of, Karmaprasiddhi.

By the prana of the supreme non-conceptual space essence, universal dharmata, entering into the central channel, within there is complete non-thought. Externally, by blue light illuminating Vairocana, the dharmadhatu wisdom is revealed. Ignorance is purified. We are empowered with the exhaustion sky-realm, Akanishta Gandavyuha, the pure land of Heavenly Joyment. The Great Net of Illusion says:

Thus the fortunate yogin
Has the five lights of the wisdoms.
The five kayas cross to their lands.
The five exhaustions are gained.

9. The way of meditating on all dharmas as the nature of the mandala

Now as for the teaching that all dharmas, as the complete perfection of buddhahood, have the nature of the three mandalas:

Since we and all other beings are primordially enlightened,
The style of meditation involved in the two stages
Sees the dharmas of skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas

As being the luminosity of a single mandala.

All dharmas should be known to be of the nature of the three mandalas of primordial buddhahood. Within the mandala of the nature of the ground as spontaneous presence, there is conviction about the view. Within the mandala of the path as profound samadhi, one practices meditation. Within the mandala of the fruition as supreme enlightenment, the two benefits are perfected.

Within the first there are two divisions. These are the pure ground, the natural state, and the impure ground, the way of confusion. The first is the primordially empty nature of mind, the essence of dharmakaya. Its arising as the luminous nature of sambhogakaya is the source of nirmanakaya. It is open and accommodating like the sky. It is luminous like the sun and moon. As with a wish-fulfilling gem, all that is desired is self-arising. The five kinds of kaya, speech, mind, quality, and action exist primordially as the intrinsic qualities of buddhahood. The Secret Essence says:

Emptiness is the mind of self-awareness.
This is primordial knowledge of egolessness.
There is neither concept nor conceiver.
Therefore the fixated memory is transformed.
Wondrous body and speech and the field of qualities
Are the same and not other. That is how it is.

Also the All-Creating King says:

Kye! listen to me mahasattva:

The nature of me, the doer of all, enlightenment
Is a self-existing nature that does not need to be sought.
This is trikaya, the essence of all the victorious ones.
My uncreated nature exists as dharmakaya.
My uncreated essence is sambhogakaya.
My manifested compassion is nirmanakaya.
No fruition established by seeking has been taught.
Primordial self existence, it does not need to be sought.

Above what is referred to by such passages was called the dhatu or essence. This exists primordially with the spontaneous presence of the buddha qualities.

The impure ground, the way of confusion, is as already described. The Secret Essence says:

E Ma'o, from out of sugatagarbha
Comes the confusion of karma, our discursive thoughts.
Variety, mind, and action, existing, suffering and such;
The "me" and the "mine" are grasped as being individuals.

Also:

It is faulty concepts that are the root of samsara.
These have their arising when there are thoughts of self.
The powers of sense, birth and destruction, body and action,
The infernal machine of existing, suffering, and so on;
Is nothing whatsoever except a misconception.

From the individual rounds of beings within the six lokas, in particular for human beings, at the beginning of their confusion, when they are grasped by existence in a womb, at first the two eyes and the knot of nadis in the navel develop. Then the body is produced from the essences which will become the sense-faculties, existing as the three nadis. Within them are the three syllables OM

AH HUM. Externally these produce the three supports of body, speech, and mind. Internally, they produce the three supports of passion, aggression, and ignorance. Secretly they produce the supports of enlightened body, speech, and mind.

Mutually and continuously they have twenty-one knots. These are the chakras of the nadis: The navel emanation chakra has sixty-four nadi petals. The throat enjoyment chakra has sixteen. The heart dharmachakra has eight nadi petals. If they are joined with the four kayas and the different wisdoms, in addition to these, at the crown of the head, there is the chakra of great bliss with thirty-two nadi petals. From the viewpoint of the five self-existing kayas, in addition to these, in the secret place, is the chakra of guarding bliss with seventy-two nadi petals, which has the powers of the essential elements.

If the six chakras are listed in order, the secret center is the chakra of wisdom. The throat center is the chakra of enjoyment-activity. The central channel is the chakra of mahasukha. The crown of the head is the chakra of the realm of space. The heart is the dharmachakra. The navel is the chakra of emanation.

According to The Net of Illusion, they are the seeds of purifying the impure six kinds of sentient beings. The purifiers are the six sages of the six realms. When they are purified by the six perfections, the six wisdoms, the usual five wisdoms plus the inconceivable wisdom, are attained.

Each chakra with the first knot between each one makes twelve. Completing these at the end, pure prana as a thirteenth is maintained to complete the bhumi of the great wisdom.

The Kalachakra has six chakras and six nadis between them. These have twelve kinds of ejection of prana, associated with the twelve nidanas. The power of not ejecting bindu, turning it back above to the secret wisdom chakra, is said to be a sign of the first bhumi. One kind of ejection of prana is stopped. One nidana is purified. Similarly, between that and the space of the sky chakra twelve levels are crossed. Twelve kinds of ejection of prana are stopped. Twelve nidanas are purified. By the bindu reaching the sky realm chakra, it is maintained that one is enlightened.

According to the Root tantra of Miracle there are two chakras. These are the peaceful heart chakra and the wrathful crown chakra. Within these the coarse nadis are equal to the number of deities. These are 42 and 58, 100 altogether. The fine nadis are countless. The Great Illusion says:

Roma, Kyangma, and Kundarma.

Are between the chakras like pillars.

The branching petals are countless.

As for elements and pranas,

The descending wisdom nadis

Are a thousand in number.

As the square of seventy two,

There are twenty thousand

And 600,000 pranas.

These have been maintained

to be the great moving ones.

There are 84,000 others.

The Five Hundred Thousand says:

The associated nadis

Spread and fill the body

These 72,000 nadis.

In the body are goddesses.

Also:

Of the 72000 nadis,

the different kinds are explained.

In one day there are said to be 620,000 actions of prana. They make up a "horse" to carry the 84,000 small moving ones, whose number is equal to that of the false conceptions and kleshas. When kleshas are moving about, it is maintained that an equal number of these pranas are moving about. By nature the male prana, "moving upward," dwells above, and the female prana, "downward voiding," dwells below. As for the mother, if the I prana "equally-abiding" co-exists, the three existences are explained.

As for the pranas in the nadis there are the following:

- 1 life-holder,
- 2 equalizer,
- 3 fire,
- 4 upward moving,
- 5 downward voiding.

As said above. The actions are

- 1 maintaining life,
- 2 bodily existence,
- 3 making heat,
- 4 the exhaling and inhaling of the breath,
- 5 going, staying and casting off impurities.

These are called ordinary and the five external pranas.

The five internal pranas are the five pranas of the five elements. These are:

the yellow earth prana,
the red fire prana,
the white water prana,
the green air prana,
the blue space prana.

As for their functions, they exist as a support for the inner skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas. When impure they are the ground of proliferation of the five poisons, and when pure of the five wisdoms.

The five secret pranas, the five wisdoms, have no coarse forms.

The great essential elements are two, the white and the red. From roma and kyangma they abide in the petals of the individual nadis. For women, left and right are reversed. In particular, the moon, roma, descends from above at the crown of the head. The sun, kyangma, rises from the A below in the secret place.

In a man's kyangma and woman's roma at the bottom there is a knot, so that the red and white elements do not drip. As the knots in the nadis are released, the virtues of the paths and bhumis are perfected. As the knots in the central channel are released, two by two, each of the ten bhumis are perfected. In attaining the good qualities of those, each of the essential elements and prana elements seem to enter them.

For example, as the first two nadi knots are released, the two essences enter into the central channel. When the four great nadis of the navel emanation chakra are released, the qualities of the first bhumi appear to arise. When the nadis of the four chakras are released, the four kayas are attained and the four wisdoms manifest.

Now in the ordinary nadi knots the red and white essences exist as the embrace of the hero and heroine. The veins are like water pipes, and the elements like the water inside them. Prana is like pressure. Their going and coming when moved by that, constitute the vajra body. This is the support of the great wisdom.

In particular in the Mahamaya Tantra, in the empty center of the heart, the essences go into eight subtle nadis as if they were being licked up. There are three dharmata nadis, one wisdom nadi, three autonomy nadis, and one quality nadi. The Secret Drop of Vimala says:

The way they exist is known to be eight-fold.

The commentary says:

In the empty center of the heart, the essence in the nadis goes into the eight subtle nadis as if they were being licked up.³⁸² There are three dharmata nadis, one wisdom nadi, three autonomy nadis, and one quality nadi. These eight should be known like that.

The central three are the support of the unchanging dharmata of trikaya. In front the nadi of mirror-like wisdom produces the support of the four wisdoms. Behind and to the right are the nadis of qualities producing the support of the arising of the buddha fields, palaces and so forth. To the left, by the three poisons autonomy nadi, confused appearance of the individuating characteristics of the three realms is produced.

Moreover, in the sheath³⁸³ of the dharmata nadi, in the midst of drops of yellow light, the letters of the ground of purification, SU and TRI, are the seeds of asuras and animals. The purifier OM is the essence of the kayas and wisdoms. The intrinsic light of the syllables is like a brocade tent. In the square sheath of the blue wisdom nadi, is the purifier HUM and the ground of purification the seeds of gods and human beings A and NRI [with backwards kiku] They have white, red, and blue light.

In the red semi-circular sheath of the autonomy syllables the purifier is AH and the ground of purification is the seeds of the pretas and hell beings PRE and DU. Also at the time of impurity, habitual patterns produced by karma and kleshas are collected above the six syllables. The retinue created by anger, resentment, and so on are collected above the DU; by desire above the PRE; by pride above A and NRI; by envy above SU; and those created by ignorance are collected above the TRI. At the time of realization, the virtues of the intrinsically-existing power of wisdom are collected above the three syllables of body, speech, and mind.

Meditations on forms of the deities and so on connected with body are placed above OM. Those involving mantra recitation and so on are above AH. Meditation on non-thought and so on are above HUM. The letters that are the ground of purification and all the habitual patterns above them are purified. The same text says:

In the dharmata-nadi a yellow light dwells. The shape is spherical. It is like flowing mercury. The essence is OM. The seed is SU and TRI. The colors of these three are like a brocade tent.

Within the wisdom nadi is a blue light. Its shape is square. It is like a noose or coiled snake. It is like a lump of violet amethyst crystals. The essence is HUM. The seeds are A and NRI.

In the autonomy nadi is a red light. Its shape is a red semi-circle. The style is of illusory refreshing-cleansing water like the brilliant arising of dawn. The color is the red of molten copper. The essence is AH. The seeds are PRE and DU.

At the time of non-realization, with A NRI and so forth, it is the cause of samsara. At the time of realization, there are TE O and so forth. Mixing these two is called "quasi-mixing, since bodhicitta is as before."

The four nadis are the natural state of consciousnesses. The same text says:

The four aspects, and six particulars, in the middle of eight...

Four refers to the dharmata, wisdom, autonomy, and quality nadis. As for the particulars, there is yellow light existing as alaya consciousness, blue light existing as the mind consciousness, red light existing as klesha-mind, and dark red light existing as the five sense-consciousnesses.

At the side of the yellow light are OM SU, and TRI. Covered by the blue light are HUM A and NRI. Covered by the red light are AH PRE and DU. The dark red light has the faults and virtues.

A and NRI cause corruption of the breath. SU and TRI cause corruption of the nadis. PRE and DU cause corruption of the blood.

As for the arising of gods and human beings, by producing the mind consciousness, the seeds A and NRI are embodied.

As for the arising of animals and asuras, by producing alayavijnana, the seeds SU and TRI are embodied.

As for the arising of the pretas and hell beings, from producing the five consciousnesses and klesha mind, the seeds PRE and DU are embodied.

Thus all the sentient beings of the six lokas individually exist.

In the center of the eight nadis in the heart center, is the essence of the nadis, like white silk cords, very fine, like twisted single hairs of a horse's tail. The mixed essence of blood and breath, is very subtle, consisting of dharmakaya bodhicitta having light of the five colors, the luminosity of dharmata. The Description of the Marks says:

The splendid knot of eternity of excellent blazing light.

In the heart palace of the dharma field of Akanishta, the buddha embodying the tathagatas of the five families, Samantabhadra, remains continuously for all time. The Two Examinations says:

The great wisdom has its dwelling in the body.
Conceptions are abandoned in the truth.
Universal wisdom pervades all things.
Embodied existence does not arise from the body

Also:

This is also known as great sugatagarbha.

The Uttaratantra says:

Because the perfect buddha kaya radiates
Because of being inseparable from suchness,
And because of having the gotra, all embodied beings,
Always have the essence of buddhahood.

The Dohakosha says:

Though there is something somewhere, in a certain place,
That does not entail that it must always be seen.
It is explained by the shastras of the capable ones,
That buddhahood in the body is not realized.

Buddhahood is the wisdom nadi. When all the essences of prana and mind are gathered together, the field of nirvana, spontaneous appearance, the house of light, the wisdom-lamp of the bardo, arises. This is the completely pure field of Akanishta called Gandavyuha. If yogins make an effort, all the essences of prana and mind will be perfected there. The aspect of appearance, the five lights, and the aspect of emptiness, dharmakaya, will be mixed in one taste. The two accumulations of the path will be completed. As the two kayas manifest we become "enlightened in Akanishta."

The light of wisdom in the central channel and the nadis are one with this, in the sense that the nature of mind is the support of luminosity. How is this explained? From the central channel, in the center of the heart, comes very subtle light like ten separately divided single hairs of a horse's tail transparently existing, connecting the pranas.

If it is made into a support, some masters say that this is the true central channel, so that the three nadis need not be combined in the central channel. Though they explain it that way, since as all the pranas enter the central channel, the essence of the prana of the central channel must enter into the wisdom nadi, it is suitable for them to be connected.

At the time of death all the essences and pranas collect in the central channel. The pranas and essences of the central channel are gathered into the ultimate essence, and from that luminosity is maintained to arise. The kayas and fields of the five families are taught to arise by the essence of this during five days of dhyana in the bardo. Therefore this essence is the very secret great ultimate secret. The Commentary of the Secret Drop says:

"In the center of the eight,"

They are therefore one. Thus the essences of the nadis go into the eight subtle nadis as if they were being licked up. Their shape is said to be like eight twisted cords.

The eight main essences, the ultimate nadi essences, are like white silk cords, with a shape is like twisted cords. In size, they are like ten divided hairs of a horse's tail. Within these, which are like white silk cords, goes the blood essence of a vibrant vermilion like the mother's essence. Within that the essence of breath like bright, pure gold in a brocade, curls like steam. Within that the breath essence is light of various colors. The interior of that light is called the center. "Na," in, has the meaning that they abide within it.

In the center of that light abides the great bindu, bodhicitta. It is like precious jewel anthers in a pipe of molten gold or filled full of the white precious stone kekeru. It abides there with a color like the rising sun. Since that is the essence of dharmadhatu, the cause of the absolute and relative, "I prostrate to that."

Since this luminous nature of mind is all-pervading, all beings are primordially enlightened. Even when they are wandering in samsara, that mind does not move and is not harmed or degraded. By their being enlightened it is no better than it was before. The Uttaratantra says:

Later as before,
Changeless dharmata.

The Fierce Lightning says:

Clouds of bodhicitta spread and pervade everywhere, as oil pervades sesame seeds.

Then also this is taught:

E Ma'o, Primordial Dharma completely pure.
Though it appears as variety, conceptually it is secret.
This is because its essence is inexpressible.
It is hard to teach to those who are not vessels.

E Ma'o, In the primordial purity of the three-fold world,
By faulty conceptions conceiving of ego, the root of samsara,
Beings who have aimlessly wandered over a very long time
Grasp at inappropriate objects of joy and sorrow.
By the power of errors of their wrong conception,
They wander among the turning wheels of samsara.
Without things of wrong conception there is bodhicitta.
Even that hellish machine is its inexhaustible ornament.
The five degenerations are places of happiness.
The five skandhas are completely perfected as the kayas.
The root of samsara itself, all our faulty conceptions,
Is explained to be the essence of enlightenment.
The outer and inner vessel and contents of the world
Are thus the father and the mother of the enlightened state

By that it is taught that all dharmas exist as bodhicitta. With that the teaching of the way of confusion of impure sentient beings is completed. Now there is the teaching that all is primordially enlightened.

The five skandhas, though apparently impure, have the enlightened nature of the five fathers. The five elements have the enlightened natures of their five consorts. All concepts are enlightened in the mandala of bodhicitta, and there is not even an atom of dharmas other than that. The Secret Essence says:

E Ma'o,
As for the five-fold limbs of the vajra skandhas,
They are known as the five perfected buddhas.
The many dhatus and ayatanas
Are the various bodhisattvas appearing in person.³⁸⁴
Earth and water are Lochana and Mamaki.
Fire and air Pandaravasini and Tara.
The space of sky is the consort of the Lord.³⁸⁵

Everything in the three realms is the Dharma.
Without remainder this is the buddha field.
Dharmas that are other than buddhahood
Never will be found by buddhahood.

In particular, buddhahood is the luminous nature of mind. The Kunje says:

As for there being a buddha who is other than the mind,
This has never been taught by the King, the Doer of All.
It will not be taught later and it is not taught now.
Therefore we should know that mind is buddhahood

The Secret Assembly says:

External to the preciousness of mind,
There are no buddhas and there are no sentient beings.

The Establishment of Wisdom says:

Ultimate luminosity of mind,
Total purity of buddhahood,
Self-arising, unmade by anyone,
Having existed from all eternity.

In brief, all appearances are the mandala of body. All sounds are the mandala of speech. All cognitive apprehension³⁸⁶ is the mandala of mind. These three should be known. The Kunje says:

Kye! the teacher of teachers! The doer of all, the King,
Makes a display of the essence mandala of body.
Thus all the dharmas of appearance and existence
Have been displayed as the unborn state of dharmadhatu.
For the sake of their inmost meaning, "No accepting, no rejecting,"³⁸⁷
This too is displayed by me, the doer of all, the King.

Kye! the teacher of teachers! The doer of all, the King,
Makes a display of the essence mandala of speech.
Thus are all dharmas, resounding with the voice of meaning,³⁸⁸
Revealed to be³⁸⁹ the spoken word of unborn space.
They embody the inexpressible heart of speech.³⁹⁰
This too is my display, as the doer of all, the King.

Kye! the teacher of teachers! The doer of all, the King,
Makes a display of the essence mandala of insight.³⁹¹

All concepts involved with knowing and remembering
Are seen as myself, the unborn, the doer of everything.
The body, speech, and mind of me, the doer of all,
Are mandalas resting in uncreated naturalness.³⁹²

Having realized the meaning of this state
Perfected in a moment, without any need for arrangement,
One enters the essential heart of the self-existing.

Thus the appearance of variety is produced. Since it is natureless, it is exhaustion/perfection.³⁹³ The mandala of the fundamental meaning should be known to be without producer or produced. Regarding the nature of that mandala, the same text says:

Kye, as for the mandala of me the Doer of All,
It is taught as a perfect self-arising mandala.
By perfecting the essence of all without remainder,
There is no birth and there is no proliferation
The uncreated mandala is perfect all at once.

Kye, in the center without error, essence of the meaning,
Samsara is perfected as the bliss of samsara/nirvana.
That is the mandala that is the root of all essences.
Realize that all mandalas are included in that.

Kye, the mandala of me the King, the Doer of All,
Is the perfect mandala of all without remainder.
By whoever perfects it, that will be realized
Learn the meaning of the uncreated mandala.

Kye by me the teacher of teachers, the Doer of All,
By the unborn mandala of bodhicitta,
All-pervading, without any coming and any going,
By realizing that one enters the meaning of the unborn.

Therefore, vajra beings, you as well as I,
Should realize the meaning that does not exist in the world.
Anyone who has the realization of that
Will be empowered as the King, the Doer of All.

All the skandhas, dhatus, ayatanas and so forth, the viewpoint of everything that appears, are enlightened as the nature of the deities. There are no good and evil, or accepting and rejecting. From the viewpoint of empty dharmata, complexities of existence and non-existence are completely pacified. This is the fundamental mandala of the spontaneously present nature. By realizing that, all the dharmas of the phenomenal world of samsara and nirvana are known as the mandala. Whatever appears is cherished as wisdom. The Secret Essence says:

By the yogin who realizes the great perfection,
The origin of suffering is realized as the mandala.

By these the teaching of first resolving the view is completed.

B. the explanation of meditation practice, together with its action of ripening and freeing.

1. The brief teaching of how to do the meditation of the developing stage

There are five sections

a. Meditation in the style of being born from an egg

Second, within the practice of meditation, there are the stages of the power of ripening the ground, and the stages of developing and completion that liberate the path. From the three sections of extensive explanation of the actions associated with these and with the associated samayas, now there is the brief explanation of the way of meditating in the developing stage:

There are four styles of practice that match with the four births.
To cleanse habitual patterns of being born from an egg,
By going to refuge and arousing bodhicitta,
And briefly doing the practice of the developing stage,
Complete the offerings that invite the field of merit.
And also by meditation on the absence of self-nature,
Previously completing the two accumulations,
Extensive meditation, through their being primordial,
On both the stage of development and the stage completion,
Is like an egg from which a bird will then be hatched.
Perform the short and elaborate development and completion.

In this first stage of secret mantra, in however many samadhis of visualized deities as we meditate, habitual patterns of the four modes of birth are trained and harmonized. These are taught as four. The Net of Miracle says:

There are four modes of birth that are to be purified.
Therefore, visualization has four different stages.
These are the greatly complex and the complex,
And those without and completely without complexity.

This is explained as it was clearly presented by the great master Vimalamitra. Those who are born from an egg are as if twice-born. When one meditates on the samadhi of great complexity, first one goes for refuge and arouses bodhicitta. One instantly visualizes oneself as the chief deity and consort. In the space in front, one invites the mandala of the deities. One makes offerings and praises to that mandala, confesses evil deeds, rejoices, invites the turning of the wheel of dharma, supplicates for desirable qualities, and dedicates the merit. Then after one says "VAJRA MUH go to your own places," or meditates for a while in objectless meditation, one gathers the two accumulations of merit and wisdom. This is the brief meditation.

Then, arising from emptiness and meditating on the mandala of the individual deities is the extensive meditation.

b. Meditating in the Manner of being born from a womb

From that, there is a brief treatment of meditation with few complexities:

In purifying vasanas of being born in a womb,
There is refuge, bodhicitta, and the seed from emptiness;
The symbol, then the body with its rays of light and such.
Then the extensive stages, as they were done before,
Development and completion do not have the brief version first;
As from prana and mind, and both the red and white bindus
Come oval, oblong, lumpy, becoming solid and so on,
Until at last the completed body has been born.

Just as for those who are born from the womb the body is born after being gradually completed, in this kind of development meditation first one goes to refuge and arouses bodhicitta. Then with the svabhava mantra from emptiness, just as the red and white bindus gather together to constitute consciousness, there is the seed syllable of the deity, for example HUM. Like the development of the embryo as an oval and oblong, from HUM comes a vajra. Like the oblong and solidification, from the vajra as a cause of the body comes a mass of the five lights, and as the embryo, like Vishnu's body manifesting as a fish and a tortoise, from the light comes the body, and the meditation of the developing stage is completed.

Sometimes, from the seed comes a mass of light and syllables, from which the body is maintained to appear. As the brief developing stage and offerings to the field of merit are omitted, there are fewer complexities.

c. Meditating in a way like birth from heat and moisture:

To purify patterns of birth arising from heat and moisture,
After refuge and bodhicitta, just from speaking the name
The luminous deities will arise from emptiness.
Then one meditates on development and completion.
As life can be born from a combination of heat and moisture,
And thus its birth will be accomplished with great ease,
There is no need for complexities of seeds and symbols.

Just as birth from heat and moisture is easily established, having gone to refuge, and aroused bodhicitta, just from saying and remembering the name of the deity it is visualized from emptiness. Here the complex stages from the seed syllable up to the body are omitted.

d. Meditation in the manner of spontaneous birth:

To purify the vasanas that lead to spontaneous birth,
Development and completion are clear instantaneously.
As what has spontaneous birth will be born in a moment,
Meditation in the stages of development and completion
Need not come gradually from the name [of the deity.]

As what is spontaneously born is instantly established, on remembering the deity the meditation is instantly clear and complete. The deity is visualized from the name alone and complexities are unnecessary.

e. Which style should be chiefly used:

Thus when we deal with these four styles of meditation,
Chiefly in meditating in these ways which are summarized,
In order to cleanse the vasanas, meditate on them all.
In particular the beginners should use the birth from an egg.
When there is some steadiness, use the birth from a womb.
When steadiness is great, use birth from heat and moisture.
When we are truly familiar, becoming perfectly steady,
Then we should use the instant style of spontaneous birth.

Persons should train in all the styles of meditation. Chiefly we should use the style of womb-birth. Beginners should meditate from stage to stage, training in these ways of meditation as summarized. Moreover, having meditated many times on the developing stage, one should then chiefly train in the completion stage. These four stages respectively should precede the first, second, third, and fourth of the four ways of meditating in the completion stage.

2. the ways of entering into the completion stage,

From the four sections

a. The ways with and without appearance.

Now we shall enter into the completion stage:

From the time they appear, their nature is simplicity.

As for the stages of unwavering form-meditation,
Beginners should stop attachment to the developing stage.
Mere appearance will remedy attachment to true existence.
Stabilized ones should break attachment to completion.
Emptiness will remedy fixating characteristics.

Thus, having gathered in gradually there are nada and bindu, and very fine life letters like a hundred divided³⁹⁴ hairs of a horse's tail. That dissolves into dharmadhatu and rests there. Beginners meditate in the formless completion stage. By that conceptual attachment to the individualizing marks of things of the developing stage is overcome. In the developing stage, rest in motionless mind without emanation or gathering. The arising of the wisdom of bliss, clarity, and non-thought is the completion stage with appearance. As the object of meditation for those with little familiarity or stabilization, it produces the antidote to one-sided attachment to emptiness.

b. The way of arising of developing and completion without gathering or separation.

Of this meditation:

Later whatever appears is the means of development.
Awareness without a grasper is the prajna of completion.
There is never anything added or anything taken away.

Here as before, by becoming very familiar and stable, all activities become appearance/emptiness, sound/emptiness, insight/emptiness. This is prajna in which natures are not truly existent. This arising of naturally non-conceptual shamatha is the completion stage of the pure nature. The completion stage of many individual tantras is taught in accord with this. This is from the general viewpoint. Some mahayoga texts have five stages:

- 1). a self-blessing stage
- 2). a vajra variety stage
- 3). a jewel fulfilling stage,
- 4). a jalandhara (net-holder)³⁹⁵ stage,
- 5). an inconceivable stage.

In the first, to produce shamatha, meditate in the developing stage, within the heart center visualizing bindus as globes of light.

Externally the motion of prana arises. After the time of the colors of the five elements has passed, by meditating in that way, all external sickness, dons, evil deeds, and obscurations are purified.

At the time of entering internally, similar to attainment of the buddha qualities and so on, in the light of the heart center, mental grasping is quickly uplifted³⁹⁶ by establishing the wisdom of non-thought.

As for attaining the ordinary and supreme siddhas, the Five Stages says:

Always there within the heart,
The single bindu has no arising.
For the person who becomes familiar with that
Wisdom will certainly arise.

Bindu has already been explained.

Second, in the vajra variety stage, the pranas are united. In the center of the five chakras meditate on the five symbols of the five families. In the head is a wheel, in the throat a jewel, in the heart a vajra, in the navel a lotus, and in the secret space a sword. During the meditation, the buddhas of the ten directions and so forth dissolve into the respective symbols. By meditating that the mind grasps them, shamatha arises.

Third, in the jewel fulfilling stage, by the play of coemergence or great bliss, from within the four chakras the wisdom of the four joys is produced and wisdom is recognized.

Fourth, in the jalandhara stage the symbols of the five families become the bodies of the deities. By the descent of amrita from the place of union of the deities and their consorts, the body is filled. By the bliss of the fire of tummo burning the HAM syllable, the mind is focused on bliss. By the firelight of wisdom of tummo all the realm of the tathagata is burned and consumed. The Dakini Ocean says:

As tummo burns at the navel
All the joints will be consumed.
As the eyes and such are burned
By that the bindu drips.

As it goes to the ends of the nadis
Of which there are 72,000
Like threads woven into in a net
By its passing the taste is experienced

By that there is realization of union and the focus of samadhi increases.

As for the inconceivable stage, In the center of the globes of light in the heart, from visualizing HUM and the individual seed syllables of the deities, light is emanated. It touches all of samsara and nirvana. Buddhas and beings, all the realms of the animate and the inanimate, melt into light and dissolve in the light in the heart center. The body dissolves into light. The light dissolves into the HUM, and that into the shabkyu. That dissolves into the body of the syllable, then into the head and the crescent, the crescent into the bindu, and the bindu into nada, the non-conceptual space which is the source of bindu.

In emanation, from emptiness, expand that these proliferate from one to another and are as before. As for meditating that they dissolve again, the meaning is inconceivable dharmata, as the union of vipashyana and shamatha. Having attained that is enlightenment.

Beginners meditate stage by stage. Having done that training, they train as the stages arise in their being, not necessarily in the order they were taught.

c. The process of meditation in the developing stage and completion stage.

What is accomplished in these ways of meditating in the developing and completion stages?

Development stops attachment to appearance as truly existing.
Completion abandons the thought that it is just illusion.
When there is no attachment to appearance or emptiness,
Then there is the pure nature that is without duality,
Between the stages of development and completion.

The developing stage meditates on the external environment as the palace. Grasping the ordinary appearance of objects as individuating characteristics of earth and rocks and so on is abandoned. By meditating on the inhabitants, sentient beings, as gods and goddesses, attachment to the individuating characteristics of sentient beings and desire and hatred toward them is abandoned. A clear view of one's own skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas, clearly perceives that this is primordially so. By that obscurations of rupakaya are abandoned. The collection of merit is completed. The arising of the samadhi of shamatha and so forth has many purposes.

In the three tantras of external mantra, yoga tantra and so forth, the developing stage is sealed by the four mudras. There is meditation on the four objects of mindfulness body, feeling, mind, and dharmas, as illusion-like, and the gathering together of meditation and post-meditation. Though these occur, the profoundest great stages are absent in these vehicles.

In anuttara tantra, prajna and upaya beyond the scope of thought are taught. By meditating on the completion stage, there is little attachment to the previous developing stage. All dharmas, like illusion, are abandoned. Free from all conceptual thoughts of "this and that," having purified the obscurations of dharmakaya, one is joined to the natural state. This is realization of mahamudra.

Here the nature is the primordial existence of the ground, the nature of the vajra body. Having come to know the nature of mind and the essence of reality, one becomes familiar with them. Here one depends on one's own body as the upaya and the body of another as the prajna or wisdom-consort. One's own body is used in tummo, illusory body, dream, luminosity, bardo, transference and so forth. These completion stage practices establish enlightenment through effort in one's own mind without dependence on another.

When using the body of another, the yogin goes to the pith of prana, nadi, and bindu, and makes bliss into the path. As for the purpose, by abandoning attachment to the developing stage, the divine nature is realized, and by the particular means employed, bliss, emptiness, and non-thought arise. By everything being brought to the path, whatever appears arises as dharmata. By realizing the wisdom of co-emergence, doubts are washed away, and so forth beyond measure.

As for the teaching of the nyams, the experiences, of buddhahood:

Here the vajrayana reaches its ultimate end.
Those persons who are sharp in the powers of their minds
Will attain to perfect buddhahood within this very life.
Then in every world where there are beings to be tamed,
Their various buddha activities will be spontaneous.
This secret path of directness is utterly profound.
It is the path that is taken by countless vajradharas.
It is the path that should be used by fortunate ones
Who want to be liberated within this very life.

This path liberates those of sharp powers of mind within this very life, so that before long the great deeds of a buddha spontaneously arise for whatever beings there are in the world to be tamed. The Tantra of the Vajra Secret says:

As for the siddhi of unsurpassable mantrayana,
When someone practices totally using the highest effort,
There is enlightenment within this very life.
Then the teacher acts within the field of beings.
This is the ultimate path directly to enlightenment,
As it was formerly traveled by countless vajradharas.

Those of good fortune who desire liberation should depend on this path, and strive appropriately with great effort.

d. The power of ripening the ground,

There are three sections teaching the stages

1) As for its being received in general and in terms of our own tradition

Now as for the teaching of the stages of the power of ripening the ground, mantrayana:

Using whichever of these tantras arouses devotion
Let us establish the state of perfect enlightenment.
First consider the precepts taught in each tradition
Of initiation, permission blessings, and empowerment.
By doing so our minds will be completely ripened.

"Abhishiṇca" occurs when defilements are washed away, and by powers being established "empowerment" arises. Because defilements in the being of students are purified, powers are produced of later attaining the enlightenment of buddhahood and meditating on particular incidental paths. After the details of the initiatory liturgies of permission blessings, empowerments, and so forth of the various individual tantras have been explained, one starts to practice.

In the initiatory rites and permission blessings of kriya tantra, depending only on the mandala, disciples are empowered by the water of the vase and merely by the mantra permission blessings being bestowed, they become suitable vessels for meditating on the view.

In upa tantra, by the empowerments of the five abhishekas of insight, six with the discipline abhisheka, disciples become suitable vessels.

In yoga tantra, preceded by the five abhishekas of insight, when the vajra master abhisheka has been completely bestowed, students become suitable vessels. Here the empowerment uses a sand-painting mandala, one painted on cloth, one of flower clusters, or the body mandala. By the lesser empowerment there is a mandala of images, in the middle one uses only heaps of flowers or symbols of the deities and so forth. The highest, the body mandala, is bestowed depending on the body, speech, and mind of the guru. The Ghanta says:

Though from two created essences
These students desire empowerment,
These beings are non-dual
With the self-existing mandala.

2) How the four unsurpassable empowerments are completely received

In these ways:

Within the excellent, secret path of the mahayoga,
There are the four empowerments producing ripening,
and development and completion, that bring us liberation.
The vase empowerment is that which purifies the body.
The secret one the speech, and prajñajñana the mind.
The word empowerment is that which cleanses habitual patterns.
Also by this empowerment the siddhis are conferred.
The first three of these complete the accumulation of merits.
The fourth empowerment completes the accumulation of wisdom.
The obscurations of kleshas and knowables are removed.
So through the ripening of gaining the four empowerments,
Cultivate liberation through development and completion.

In the tradition of mahayoga there are the well-known four empowerments:

1) The vase empowerment purifies defilements of body. One is empowered to meditate in the developing stage.

2) The secret empowerment purifies obscurations of speech. One is empowered to meditate on tummo or chandali.

3) The prajñajñana empowerment purifies obscurations of mind. One is empowered to meditate on bliss emptiness, the wisdom of complete non-thought.

4) The precious word empowerment purifies all defilement. One is empowered to meditate on mahamudra, the natural state.

By the first three the accumulation of merit is completed. Obscurations of the kleshas are purified. By the fourth the accumulation of wisdom is perfected. Obscurations of knowables are purified. If they are related to the paths and bhūmis, the vase empowerment is the path of accumulation, the secret empowerment is the path of preparation. Prajñajñana is the path of seeing. By the empowerment in mahamudra the path of meditation is completed. By completing these four empowerments one is ripened. By meditating in the developing and completion stages, one is freed.

3) The peak of all the yantras

Now from the teaching of the stages of secret mantra in general, in particular the peak of all tantras is entered according to the Non-dual Tantra of the Great Illusion:

Whoever wants to enter the vision of ati yoga,
Receiving full empowerment, possessing the samayas,...

First, in the stages of empowerment, Lesser ones use a sand mandala, and supreme ones enter using the mandala of the body of the vajra master. The great bliss mandala uses the mandala of the two bodies of the father and mother, and the details of the five families as depicted in the sand mandala. The Secret Tree says:

As for the mandala of mahasukha,
There are two ways of dividing and also five.
If those who have faith have also completely entered,
Desire and pleasure become equanimity.

Here the ten empowerments of benefit and the five empowerments of power are completed. As for the first ten, according to the same text they are those of the:

- 1). head ornament
- 2). crown
- 3). garland,
- 4). armor
- 5). victory banner
- 6). mudra,
- 7). parasol
- 8). vase,
- 9) eating the five meats
- 10) drinking the five amritas.

The second five are:

- 1). The empowerment of the listener, the student
- 2). The empowerment of the explainer, the teacher
- 3). The empowerment of buddha activity for the benefit of others
- 4). The empowerment of the universal word of a vajra king
- 5). The empowerment of the supreme secret

These fifteen are divisions of the four empowerments. The ten including the vase empowerment are preliminary to the action of the vase and are collectively called the vase empowerment. From the secret empowerment the supreme secret and prajñajñana empowerments arise.

As for the word empowerment, after the empowerment of the universal word of a vajra king has been taught, the explainer and buddha activity empowerments are the action of this.

As for the listener, since upāya is increased, it is included within these. If the way of inclusion is done differently, the benefits will not arise, so do not proceed in that way.

If these empowerments are completed or also if other unsurpassable empowerments like these are obtained, then one has the good fortune of practicing the path of these.

e. The details of the associated practice and samaya are explained as additional points.

Now from the two sections on the practice of mantra and samaya,

1) the samayas connected with the empowerments will be explained.

a) The essence of samaya is the particular excellent thought of guarding without faults the good discipline of entering into mantra.

b. The divisions are the root and branch samayas.

a) The essence of samaya

Within the first are the three samayas of body, speech, and mind.

1) The body samaya

In the body samaya one meditates on the bodies of the deities, and refrains from unwholesome actions of body such as cutting off life, taking what is not given, dirty deeds, and all their aspects.

2) The samaya of speech

In the samaya of speech one recites mantra and eliminates the four unwholesome kinds of speech and all their aspects.

3) The mind samaya

In the mind samaya, one meditates in profound samadhi and refrains from the three unwholesome actions of mind and all their aspects.

In brief, in bodily practice of ordinary aspect of body, speech, and mind, does not contradict the samaya of true body, speech, and mind. If one divides these rather briefly, the Wheel of Entering into the Discipline of the Array of Samaya says:

From beings' thirty-three ripenings,
There are three samayas of mantra.
To fix the particulars,
Of body, speech, and mind,
Each of these has nine.
They are known from the aspects
Of entering and action.

Samayas of body, speech, and mind exist because beings exist primordially as buddhas. Since siddhi is attained from not transgressing these, they ought to be kept. The threefold samayas of body that ought to be kept are outer, inner and secret. Each of these is again divided into outer, inner, and secret

- 1). In the outer of outer one abandons taking what is not given
- 2). The inner of outer is abandoning dirty deeds
- 3). The secret of outer is abandoning the cutting off of life.

The Mansions of the Vajra Essence Tantra says:

The outer samaya of body
Is divided into three.
By taking what is not given
The external is transgressed.
The limbs of the sign of transgression
Are outbreaks of disease.
An unbearable variety
Arises in the body.

Dirty deeds are the inner
As a sign of transgressing this
There will be diseases
Arising in the senses.

Cutting off life is the secret.
As a sign of transgressing this
Disease of the vessel of meaning³⁹⁷
Will be experienced by yogins.

Regarding the means of keeping these, the Tantra of Unbroken Samaya says:

By a yogin who has the signs,
For outer of outer activities
Seven clay sculptures and drawings,
will liberate evil deeds.

Samaya is guarded by making colored statues and paintings of the gods seven times. Also the same text says:

The way for the inner of outer
Is sculpting seven statues
By consecrated efforts
And offering them to the guru.

One should make seven statues of the deities of mantra and offer them to the guru. Also the same text says:

If the sign has arisen
Of secret of outer transgression,
Nine or eleven vajras
Or bells should be offered the guru.

As for the outer, inner, and secret of inner, the Golden Mansion Tantra says:

As for outer of inner, relatives
And their fathers and mothers,
As well as one's own body
Should never be degraded.

The inner of inner, in general,
For the greater and lesser vehicles,
Is desiring to enter, and entering
and as for entering,

Degrading or trying to harm
The grasped reflection of body,
If the ornament is degraded,
The body of buddhahood
Redeems it a hundred times.

For the secret of inner,
Because one's personal body
Is the mandala of deities,
Eat medicine and food
That have been mixed with poison.
Even if stabbed by weapons,
Be without the path of defilement,
Or receiving a hundred bodies,
Later they will experience
the torments of the hot hells.

In amending these violations, confess with remorse. As for the three of the secret of body, the Glorious Edifice of the Sun and Moon Tantra says:

If with vajra brothers and sisters
One defiles the body ornament,
Offending with striking hand
If another enters into it
This will increase the cause

Of the unremitting Hell.

Within it greatly mixes
And widely proliferates.
Even just as a joke
Striking or trying to strike

If even in a dream,
One so endangers one's consort,
Until one has confessed it,
This equals the actual deed.

The secret of secret, the guru
Do not defile even his shadow
In Guru's pure presence also
One should never grasp a weapon.

Do not extend hands and feet
Or lie down in his presence.
Sit properly cross legged
And do not turn the back.

Shoes, and seats, and mounts
And elegant ornaments
Such things as parasols
Ought to be left behind.

In the guru's pure house also
One should never hold
Or keep within the hand
A weapon or a stone.

100,000 times worse
Is disrupting the teacher's house,
And doing any evil deed
That makes a mock of his body.

Such limitless evil deeds
As carelessness with the guru
If one does not scrutinize them,
Will have limitless consequence.

Even if one had attained
The supreme kayas of fruition
The ripening of this
Would be indescribable.

Evil deeds involving the guru involve karma a hundred thousand times heavier than others.
If they are done, confess them continuously for a whole day. Even if they were not actually done, anything involving his body, should be confessed before him.

The samayas of speech are three times three in a similar way.

1). In the outer of outer, abandon speaking falsely.

The Edifice of the Wheel Tantra says:

By devoted practice of mantra,
Beings are purified.

By having spoken false words
Because of selfish desire

And having taken delight
In the speaking of such words,
We will lose the ability
To recite mantra genuinely.

With others our speech will be impotent.
By harming our own speech
The tongues of other beings
Will descend on us like vultures.

With a body covered with moles.
We will live in the north.
We will experience suffering
In various lower realms.

2). The inner of outer is not speaking slander.

The same text says:

Those beings who dwell in mantra
But tear at others with slander,
When they teach the dharma
Will never gather a retinue.

Whatever they do goes wrong
If this is not analyzed,
They will make many enemies.
Who stab their bodies with weapons.

Having died and been reborn,
They will have bodies with claws.
Then they will experience
A succession of lower realms.

3) The secret of outer is not speaking harshly of others.

The same text says:

Speaking harshly builds up karma
Both earlier and later
Beings without kindness are angry
Even with their friends.

They overturn even the Dharma.
When they die and transmigrate
These very arrogant people.
Will go to the lower realms.

As for the inner:

4). If one reviles those who speak the Dharma, that is the outer. 5). If those who practice, that is the inner.

6). If those who meditate, that is the secret.

The Array of Samaya Tantra says:

Those who glorify and denigrate
And speak reviling words
Of those who are abiding
In the discipline of mantra,

And of those who teach the Dharma
And of practitioners,
And those who meditate,
Diminishing others' discipline,

Diminish their own possessions
Certainly forgetting
And totally overthrowing
The Dharma for themselves.

Against their expectations
They will then experience
Sufferings without limit
Within the lower realms.

7. The outer of secret is reviling and denigrating one's vajra brothers and sisters.
8. The inner is to speak disparagingly of the guru's consort and close retinue.
9. The secret is denigrating the guru. The Chagya Nyijor Tantra says:³⁹⁸

With Vajra brothers,
the consort and retinue,
If they violate in speech
Within the three lower realms

For a hundred million kalpas
They will suffer especially
Harshly and unendurably.

Beings who experience this
As a later sign
Of what they formerly did,

In their successively experience.
By former deeds, during this life,
Their station will be low,
Even if formerly high.
As soon as they are reborn
They will experience this.

As for the karmic destiny
They have produced by that,
In this life as servants
The karma of speech they hear

Will come from the tongues of the retinue
and other lesser beings
The stream of speech which is pure
Of the incidental will cease.

With the guru's wife and children,
And whomever is close to him,
If one violates the command

and transgresses in one's speech
The karma is twice the former.

Of the guru in particular
If root and branch violations
Are spoken in one's speech,
If one has speaks exaggerations
Or denigrating words,
It is a thousand times worse.

The ripening is unbearable.
By gradations one becomes separate,
Torn away from the holy guru,
This occurs at once.

The samayas of mind are also three times three.

- 1). As for the outer of outer, ill-will is abandoned.

The Tantra of Receiving the Essence says:

Those who to vajra holders
Either others or themselves
Harbor malicious ill-will
Their bodies will have lesions.
For every time they have done this,
Receiving 5000 bodies,
They will certain be born in hell.

- 2). The inner of outer is abandoning craving and malice.

The Meteoric Iron Blazing Like Fire says:

If for an ordinary being,
The mind of ill-will arises
Their evil deed will be equal
To an ordinary person
Who has cut off 300 lives.

If possessing signs of a teacher
Embodied ones go wrong,
with one who abides in mantra
It is a hundred times that;

With vajra brothers and sisters
It is seven times more;
With a guru of tantra
Still a hundred times more;
And with one's own root guru
A hundred thousand times.

- 3). The secret of outer is perverting the doctrine of oneself and others.

As for a person who does this, the Great Array says:

Of either the doctrines of oneself or others
If one makes a wrong path which degrades the Dharma,
One violates this root samaya of mind.

In the earthly realm the sufferings of fire
Will be experienced for a very long time.
By one's own wrong views of doctrine arising,
There will be no way to be free from hell.

From the three of inner mind,

- 4). The external is wrong action,
- 5). The internal is wrong meditation
- 6). The secret is wrong view.

What is wrong is to be abandoned. The Tantra of the Crystal Palace says:

Wrong view, meditation, and action
These are the great wrong path.
All the sufferings of beings
Will ripen within the mind.

As for the three secret ones,

- 7). The external is not paying attention to the meditation and action.
- 8). The inner is not paying attention to the yidam deity.
- 9). The secret is not paying attention to the guru and one's vajra brothers and sisters.

The Cast Lotus Expanse says:

One whose action of mind is frivolous
Transgressing in the dharmas of attention
Who has not properly turned the mind to them,
With destroyed and violated intention
Will experience suffering in the Avici Hell.

Remedy violations of every aspect of these and try to confess them. That completes the teaching of the root samayas.

- 2) The five times five branch samayas,
- a) The samayas of the five things to be known.

Since all dharmas are primordially enlightened, it should be known that:

- 1). the five skandhas are the five fathers,
- 2). the five elements are the five consorts,
- 3). the five consciousnesses are the five bodhisattvas,
- 4). their five objects are the five female bodhisattvas,
- 5). the five collections of thoughts are the five mandalas.

The Array of the Three Samayas says:

First as for the samayas of things that should be known:
The five skandhas, elements, and consciousnesses
The five organs, and their objects, and such things
Are in nature the deities and the mandala.

It is also explained like that in the Kunje.

- b) The five samayas that are to be performed

These are the great samaya. By those who are capable, when they are performing benefits for others, there may be cutting off life, taking what is not given, impure conduct, and false speaking. The same text says:

As for the samayas to be performed
Tana, gana,³⁹⁹ taking what is not given
Dirty deeds, and false speaking,
As for its five aspects those wise in skillful means
if they see that harm will come from not performing them
They will do them.

Also the Bodhisattva pitaka says:

For those who have great skillful means,
The kleshas are the limbs of enlightenment.

In accord with that explanation, without being bound up with one's own benefit, acting when there is an opportunity to benefit others is as taught previously.

c. the samayas of the five things to be accepted,

Excrement, urine, rakta, white bodhicitta, and human flesh are the five essences.⁴⁰⁰ The former text says:

As for the five samayas,
Of the five to be accepted
They are excrement, and so on,
the five samaya substances.

Regarding their qualities the Vajra Tent of the Dakinis says:

Yogins who are relying
On immovability
Will abandon all diseases.
And always have great brilliance.
As for the vajra sun
It never will grow old.
Relying on vajra Dharma,
One has all one needs.⁴⁰¹
Creatures' bodily vajras
Are the king who possesses the meaning.
All splendid goals are accomplished
That yogin will go to peace.

By drinking the immovable
Sustained 5000 fold.⁴⁰²
One's throne will then express
Ten million vajra suns.
Times beyond all measure
In countless numbers of lives.
As limitless as space,
Being drawn by seven horses,
With two limitless vajra suns,
Are the roots of gathering a retinue.
If yogins depend on these,
They are equal to those of good fortune.

d. The samayas of the five things that are not to be abandoned

The five poisons or kleshas should not be viewed as enemies, as they are by the shravakas. Being of the nature of wisdom, they should be brought to the path. The former text says:

As for the five samayas
Of not abandoning,
The five poisons of the kleshas,
Passion, aggression, and so forth,
As the great secret vajra samaya,
The five kleshas are transformed,
Becoming the five wisdoms.
These five poisons are not abandoned
But accepted as the five wisdoms.

If the five poisons are exhausted by skillful means they are not abandoned because:

- 1). They become associated with the path,
- 2). They are of the nature of wisdom,
- 3). They are primordially unborn space,
- 5). All dharmas are of the nature of equality without accepting and rejecting.

These are called the samayas of not abandoning. The ordinary forms of the five poisons are not made into the path even in vajrayana. In reality, when they are exhausted by skillful means, and bodhisattvas make them into the path, the purified kleshas are gathered into one.

e. The five samayas to be established

One makes an effort to establish the previous five topics within one's being. The same text says:

As for the five samayas
Which are to be established,
The five skandhas and five elements,
The consciousnesses and objects,
Are established as the mandala.

Perfecting the three samadhis
And the five aspects of ritual.
The mandala of the five families
Of victorious ones is established.

Our minds should therefore strive
In these samadhis and rites.

The three samadhis are:

- 1 the suchness samadhi
- 2 the all-illuminating samadhi
- 3 the cause samadhi

The five rites are:

- 1 visualizing the deities
- 2 reciting mantra
- 3 meditating in samadhi
- 4 abiding in samaya
- 5 offerings and tormas

In general according to the Miracles of Secret Mantra the Secret Essence has five root samayas, ten branch samayas, and four great samayas, nineteen altogether. The root five are

- 1 not abandoning the three jewels
- 2 reverence for the guru
- 3 not cutting short mantras and mudras
- 4 being kind to those who genuinely abide on the mahayana
- 5 not speaking the secret to others

The same text says:

Not abandoning the matchless,
Reverencing the guru,
Not cutting off mantra and mudra,
Being kind to those
Who abide on the genuine path,
Never telling the secret
To those who are outsiders.
These five are the root.

Within the ten branches are the five samayas of not abandoning. The same text says:

Ignorance and passion,
Aggression, pride, and envy
These are the five samayas
That are not to be abandoned.

As for the samayas of the things to be accepted it says:

The red and white essences,
Human flesh, and excrement
Are the pure vessel and essence
And should not be rejected.

The four great samayas are the fundamental four, regarding cutting off life and so forth.

In new translation mantra, samayas to be guarded and samayas to be performed are distinguished. As for the first, fourteen root downfalls and so forth are explained in their particular traditions. As for the second, knowing the nature of the five meats and five amritas, one should enjoy them.

The five meats are those of the cow, elephant, dog, human, and horse. The five amritas are excrement, urine, semen, blood, and brains. and so on. As for the benefits of eating these, the Shri Guhyasamaja says:

As for the high samaya
Of eating human flesh,
The excellent three vajras
Will be established by that.

As for the high samaya
Of eating human shit,
One will be the leader
Of all the vidyadharas.

By the high samaya
of eating the flesh of cows,
One has the five attainments
Of the higher perceptions.

By the pure samaya
Of eating the flesh of horses,
One becomes a master
Of invisibility.

By the high samaya
Of eating the flesh of dogs,
All the host of siddhis
Are perfected and established.

By the high samaya
of eating the flesh of elephants,
One becomes supreme
A solid vajra sender.

Also:

The flesh of cows and horses
Should be eaten as food
If we eat no other food
great minded bodhisattvas
And buddhas will be pleased.

also:

Excrement and semen,
Blood and all the others,
Should be offered to deities.
When this is done the buddhas
And bodhisattvas are pleased.

If one does not have them, make food in their form or visualize eating them. The same text says:

As for pure human flesh
If it is fully visualized,
One will gain all the siddhis
That are part of the secret body,
The secret speech, and mind.

also:

If none of the meats are there,
One can visualize them.
Performing this vajra union,
One will be blessed by the buddhas.

By practice of these actions like those of worldly degraded people, liberated from all attachment, one will have the virtues of being without good and evil, pleasing the dakinis and mahasiddhas, and so forth.

4) How to guard these samayas

They are guarded by means of mindfulness, attention and conscientiousness, by being upright, and having fear and reverence.

As for mindfulness, not forgetting the details of samaya, and what is permitted and prohibited, one keeps them in mind. Day and night one makes vows of bodhicitta and confessing and vowing to refrain.

As for conscientious attention, having examined to see whether the three gates abide in samaya or not, if anything that one does goes against samaya, one abandons it. What does not go against it, one practices.

As for being careful, as one is careful about great enemies and friends, when samaya is harmed and there is danger of going to the lower realms, hold it very tightly.

As for shame, if one's samayas proclaimed before the guru are transgressed, thinking that no one is lower than oneself, one should exhaust or avoid the slightest fault of the root and branch violations depending on oneself.

As for decency the guru, yidam, dakinis, and great beings are decent individuals. If one thinks they have been agents of degradation, depending on others, one should guard against that.

As for guarding fear, having thought of one's faults of transgression against samaya, we should not let go of it even if we die.

As for guarding devotion, inspired by the great benefit, devotedly guard samaya.

5) The meaning of the word, "samaya," dam tshig in Tibetan, has two meanings. If what is true and holy "dam" is guarded, non virtue is burned away, "tshig." Also, if one transgresses what is holy in body, speech and mind, one will be damned and burned in the fires of hell. The Tantra of the Array of Samaya says:

SA, in producing that level
If, MA, it is not transgressed,
All the siddhis will be bestowed.
YA, if this is weakened
DAM, it must be restrained
If this should be let go
That is called transgression,
TSHIG, if that is transcended,
We experience fires of suffering.

As for the benefits of guarding samaya, within this life all our wishes will be established, everyone will be pleasant to us, all the dakinis will bless us, all the accumulations will be gathered, and no obstacles will arise. Even if our effort and powers don't go the distance, as long as samaya is not transgressed, in seven lives or sixteen we will certainly be liberated, attaining ultimate buddhahood. The Secret Essence says:

By abiding within the samaya of equality
The equality of the great perfection will be gained.

The two bad consequences of transgression within this life are that everyone will be unpleasant and there will be many diseases and obstacles. What we want will not be established. Even if it rains, little will grow and so forth--everything we do will go wrong, and various kinds of unpleasantness will arise. Not to mention that in the next life, we will go to hell. The same text says:

Those without root defilements
Need not struggle to cure them.
An instant of denying them
And faults will not arise.
But if there is transgression
Of the major root samayas
All practice will go wrong.
Various unpleasant fruitions
Are gathered in spite of ourselves.
If there is transgression
Of the branch samayas,
Without attaining fruition,
We fall to the lower realms.

The Two Examinations says:

Snakes who tell the secret
And thieves who steal the dharma,
Set fires all over the earth.

Also:

Plagues and calamities
And various obstacles,
Kings and fires and serpents
Floods, dakinis, and bandits
Vicious attacks of Döns
And agents of perversion.
Destroyed by such assassins
Beings will go to hell.

6) Means of confession

Now the means of confession are explained.

a) Divisions

Divided by time all transgressions are of four kinds:

- 1). Going against samaya is not longer than a day.
- 2). Less than a month is a fault.
- 3). A breach is more than that up to a year.
- 4). Up to two and three years is severance of samaya.

Transgressions up to these, if they are confessed with great exertion, are purified. It is taught that confessions of those which cannot not be purified will not be received by one who is like the guru. The Tantra of the Array of Samaya says:

Generally for the different samaya transgressions
The division is distinguished by the time.
Going against samaya is violation
Which has lasted not longer than a day.
If one makes confession of the object
It is fully remedied by that.

A fault of samaya lasts up to a month.
It is remedied by strong remorse.
If one breaches samaya for a year
Uninterrupted confession will remedy that.
A longer time of up to two or three years,
Is said to be a severance of samaya.
It is repaired with immensely strong confession.

More than three years, is simply incurable.
If it is received, both master and student burn.
Certainly in the subterranean realm
They will only suffer continuously.

Transgressions are classified either depending on the essence or on time. Those known by the essence are transgressions of the root and branch samayas described before. For those depending on time, the degree of transgression depends on how soon it was confessed. By teaching these, the divisions are fully explained. As for how to amend, the same text says:

Going against samaya is confessed
With the performance of a ganachakra.
Transgression is remedied by one's possessions.
Breaches are repaired with spouse and children,
With possessions and acts of body, speech, and mind.
Severance is remedied with one's life.

Faults up to a day are remedied by a ganachakra. Having joined one's palms before the guru and so forth, say:

Guru, great vajra holder please consider us. For us by the power of confusion such and such errors have arisen. These, which we purify by confessing, we supplicate you to purify.

Say this three times, with lamentation and remorse. Later commit yourself to keep trying not to do these things again. By the gate from which the transgression arose, as an antidote do homage and so forth.

For violations up to a month, offer your cherished possessions to the person who was the object. Then remedy with a ganachakra as before.

For those up to a year, in addition to that, impoverish yourself, and offer your cherished spouse and children.

Up to three years, also with strong effort accomplish heavy deeds of sacrifice for the sake of others, gurus, and so forth.

Moreover, transgressions done in dreams, and bad lapses of slandering others should be told. Examining to see what was said of others in speech or mind, even in fun, all these should be confessed. The Great Array says:

To the guru and close retinue
To vajra brothers and sisters,
Not the smallest evil
Of spoken words should be said,
In nuance or reality.
Or just in dream or mind,
They all should be confessed.

If actual and mental faults,
Remain ungrasped by memory,
Passed by and not confessed,
Pulled down by that halter
One goes to the lower realms.

When one has done these, one will be liberated from the transgression by: Performing feasts, fire offerings, and service to the guru in body and speech, requesting empowerment, in the four periods doing the hundred syllable mantra, offering mandalas, trying to establish the ten virtues such as furthering life, reciting sutras and dharanis and so forth, expressing the virtues of others, telling one's hypocritical transgressions to all tantrikas in the ten directions, wishing for virtue, and pleasing those who rejoice in it, and meditating in samadhi and on kindness and so forth, the four immeasurables, etc.

To confess and remedy offenses worthy of hell, if this is done on the eighth day of the lunar month, all transgressions up to that time will be remedied:

b) The Liturgy

In the space in front visualizing the guru, yidam, and assembly of deities of the mandala, prostrate, make offerings, and confess the evil deeds.

Then, from their body, speech, and mind, there arise red, white, and blue light rays. By their dissolving into one's own body, speech, and mind, all transgressions and defilements are purified. After the evil deeds and obscurations of all sentient beings are also purified, they become light and dissolve into the heart center of the guru.

Here, while the mind rests in equality like the sky, as one does the dedication, it is excellently taught that all transgressions will be purified.

As for the measure, if the obscurations have been purified, in dreams one will be dressed in white, one will reach the peaks of mountains, the sun and moon will rise together and so forth. That completes the presentation of samaya.

7) the conduct accompanying that

a) General

the benefits of the view and meditation, and the special qualities are established. As for the essence, after one meditates in samadhi, guarding the experience in post-meditation brings the benefit of mixing meditation and post meditation. Moreover in terms of the lesser conduct of shravakas and the supreme conduct of bodhisattvas, as the benefit for oneself, by pacification and taming one binds non-virtue of body and speech. As the benefit for others there is the conduct of the six perfections.

the four teachings of the vast and extensive secret mantra for:

- i). Beginners
- ii). Those for whom a little experience has arisen
- iii). Those with a little stability
- iv). Those who have attained great stability.

i). As for the first, chiefly activities between sessions are done. There are the yogas of food, tormas, making tshas tshas, water offering to the pretas, mandalas, prostrations, and reciting sutras; seven fold service, offerings of writing and such, the 10 dharma activities.

As for the practice, the preliminary part is arousing bodhicitta. The main part is the unborn. Afterwards complete by dedicating the merit. As for the ten dharma activities, The Tantra of Realizing all the Actions of the Oral Instructions says:

Transcribing, doing pujas, giving, and listening;
Reading and comprehending, explaining, and reciting,
Contemplating and meditating on these things.
These ten acts of dharma have limitless merit.

ii). When a little experience has arisen through these, it is called the practice of Samantabhadra. As for the second topic, the practice of those for who this has arisen somewhat, the experience arising in meditation becomes of equal taste with post-meditation, joined with all the self-appearances of the senses. As within the meditation of the developing stage, when one is meditating on the mandala of the yidam deity; in post-meditation too all appearances are viewed as the illusion-like divine mandala. Become familiar with that. Within the meditation of the completion stage, whatever experiences of the nyam arise are joined in equal taste to all the self-appearances⁴⁰³ of post-meditation. In brief, when the practitioner rises from meditation, and when various objects are experienced, at the time of enjoying form, sound, smell, taste, and touchables, all these are known to have the nature of the deities. These are also known as one's own mind. The mind is known as emptiness by the deities' divine realization and activity. By that there is the divine offering of the play of wisdom. Practice this as dharmata dissolving into dharmata. All the sense appearances of post-meditation become associated with the path. One's own five skandhas are OM, the five fathers. Form and so forth, their five objects are SUM, the five consorts. Obscurations and so forth are HUM, the offering deities. One practices by visualizing these. The Secret Essence says:

The senses, and the limbs and consciousness,
Become the completely ripened syllable OM.
Meditate on the perfect mandala
And on the mandala of the wrathful ones.

Form and sound, smell and taste and touch
Become the completely ripened syllable SUM.
Meditate on the mandala of the consorts.
And on the mandala of the wrathful consorts.

Clothes and ornaments, eating, drinking, and songs,
Verses and dances, heaped-up clouds of feasting
Are known as HUM, when they are fully practiced.
The wondrously risen mandala is attained.

These are known as secret or insight activities. Whoever does them between sessions will have these beneficial experiences, and by relying on non-harming, harm will be abandoned.

iii). In the practice when experience is slightly stabilized, since these same experiences are beneficial, the discipline of insight should be practiced. This is with, without, and completely without complexity.

1))) The practice with complexity is undertaken by those who are young in age with much vigor and little prajna. In a retreat house, doing sadhana, they do a ganachakra and confession. Have collected yogins and yoginis, complete in their ornaments, equal to the number of deities, and having meditated on the developing and completion stages, at the end while doing songs and dances, manifest desire without clinging. In six months, or whatever it takes, siddhi will be attained.

2))) The practice without complexity, is to be done by those of middle age, prajna, and vigor. Like the other before, practice alone with an authentic consort or perhaps two or three together.

3))) The practice supremely without complexity is done by those who are old with little vigor but much prajna. In solitary places like charnel grounds, abandoning physical consorts, they unite directly with the vidya of co-emergent wisdom herself, and do kusulu practice.

Except for eating, sleeping and voiding waste, they abandon all other activities, and practice in emptiness.

Moreover since these are practices of taming the kleshas by wisdom, these words are said. In these cases if there are many emanations and gatherings of insight, finally the various activities of "cutting the continuity of the city" of samsara will be completed, and the primordial activity of doing nothing at all will be established. That is the benefit of these practices. The Song of the Oral Instructions of the Inexhaustible Treasury says:

Sometimes abiding in charnel grounds the "lamps" are practiced.
With fearless mind one sleeps in places haunted by pretas.
Associating with outcasts, the wheel of taste is straightforward.
There is no "who does what" and no grasping the proper rules.

There is an assembly of sacred celebration
Yogins come together with many songs and dances,
With flutes and other instruments, they make delightful music.
The assembly sing and dance with the six dances of heruka
Their minds are so uplifted that there is no sadness at all.

Wearing robes on their backs and ornamented with copper,
With wheels in the topknots clinging to their heads.
All their limbs adorned with ornaments of bone,
With elephant and tiger skins tied above and below,
Carrying khatvangas and sounding the bells in their hands.

They excellently perform the actions of the great secret,
The delightful celebration of intoxicated insanity.
Forbidden activities that are shameful to perform,
Like drunken elephants plunging hugely into a lake,

Performing degraded acts, they are freed like a flying arrow.

This is the called the "activity of all the protectors." The Guhyasamaja says:

All the acts of desire,
If one manages to do them,
Just as one would like,
By such a wealth of union,
One quickly gets enlightened.

Also:

Unbearable self-denial
Is not to be relied on.
Rely on desirable qualities
To quickly be accomplished.

What's more, by this path without accepting and rejecting, the buddhas are very pleased.
The same text says:

Buddhas and bodhisattvas
And those who know the practice
Of the highest action of mantra,

Attain immovability,
Supreme in the highest Dharma,
By relying on all enjoyables.

That these practices are connected with the proper kinds of beings and times is important.
If beginners do this feat practice or try to perform the "activity of all the protectors," they will just go to the lower realms.

8) Fruition: the two siddhis

a) relative

Having attained the benefits of the path by these activities, one will quickly attain the two siddhis. There will be the eight karmas, eight ordinary siddhis, and so forth. As for the eight karmas, the Two Examinations says:

The powers, higher perceptions, destroying hosts of enemies, driving away, killing, magnetizing, pacifying, and enriching will really be performed.

As for the eight ordinary siddhis, the Vajra Tent says:

With these there is no problem.
The eye potion and swift running,
The wondrous enchanted sword,
Finding treasures under the earth,
Magic pills and flying,
Becoming invisible,
The elixir for making gold.
By pleasing the vajra-holders.
One quickly becomes accomplished.

The Secret Essence says:

The mudra of songs and dances

Goes in a rush to the sky.

The mudra of songs and verses,
Attains the siddhis of Dharma.

The mudra of dress and ornament,
Gains the blazing, invincible king.

The mudra of eating and drinking,
Grants wish-fulfilling amrita.⁴⁰⁴

The mudra of vowels and consonants,
Makes anything into anything.

b) absolute

Supreme siddhi is the establishment of buddhahood. The Two Examinations says:

As for trikaya being within the body,
That should be expressed by the form of samsara.
As for trikaya being completely known,
That is expressed by the wheel of great bliss.

By that the explanation together with the subsidiary points is completed.

3. The path that produces liberation, the extensive explanation of the developing and completion stages.

a. The developing stage

There are five sections.

1) Meditation on the protection circles:

Now we will enter into the details of meditation on the mandalas of samadhi. In a solitary and compatible place

Sitting in cross-legged posture upon a comfortable seat,
Having taken refuge and aroused the bodhicitta,
Then from within the nature of simplicity,
Where dharmas all are empty and ego does not exist,
The syllable HUM arises, then in turn from that,
Extending above and below, as well as in all the directions,
The deployment of the protective circle is huge and vast.
Its ten spokes have the marks⁴⁰⁵ of the ten wrathful deities.
The circle is splendid with blazing fire within and without.

First, as for the preliminaries, sit cross-legged on a comfortable seat. Visualizing the guru and the assembly of deities of the yidam mandala in space, take the three refuges and as it is explained in the Sparking Precious Net:

Myself as well as limitless sentient beings,
Are in reality primordial buddhas,
By I who know that this is really so,
May supreme bodhicitta be aroused.

Having said that three times, with the SVABHAVA mantra all dharmas are established as the great emptiness. This is the suchness samadhi. The Great Development and Completion says:

HUM

The nature of bodhicitta, which is completely pure
Is primordially unborn, and eternally all-encompassing,
Limitless, topless and bottomless, boundless in every direction,
A non-existing, unperceivable state of simplicity,
Inexpressible beyond thought, a perfect space of equality.

The Principal Heruka says:

This inconceivable space of dharmadhatu
Is free from all concepts and discursive thoughts.
This inconceivable space of dharmadhatu
Is not perceived, as space is not perceived.

Meditate like that. From the state of dharmakaya is manifested the auspicious coincidence of the arising of rupakaya. As all lesser productions are exhausted in the empty nature of the great perfection, one necessarily unties the knot of attachment to things and characteristics. The Stages of the Path says:

By emptiness all paths are marklessness.
Attachment to ego-grasping is liberated.

Then, in order to untie the knot of one-sided attachment to emptiness, there is meditation in the all-illuminating samadhi. The appearance of all dharmas is natureless. With illusion-like compassion, meditate for a little while the natural luminous wisdom of self-awareness without a grasper. The same text says:

Get accustomed to the king of self-awareness,
And so supreme enlightenment will be gained.
Therefore after the suchness of seeing this
Rest in the ground of arising of compassion.
Their rising in sequence like this is a certainty.

Then from the two sections on the cause samadhi, play is the circle of what is to be guarded. Here from HUM, in the limitless universal brilliance of the space of the sky, comes a ten spoked wheel. Between rim and center, in the empty space inside, which is equal to dharmadhatu, the ten spokes are transformed into ten lotus, sun, and moon seats marked with HUM.

Above is Humkara. To the east is Vijaya. To the southwest Blue Danda. To the south Yamantaka. To the southwest Achala. To the west Hayagriva. To the northwest, Not Attained by Others To the north Amritakundalin. To the northeast All-Victorious in the Three Realms, below Mahabala.

Each of them has one face and two arms ornamented with all the supreme⁴⁰⁶ and nirmanakaya ornaments. The right leg is bent and the left extended. They hold scepters symbolizing their respective families or a bell and vajra. The two wrathful ones above and below are of the tathagata family. They hold wheels. Those to the east and southeast, of the vajra family, hold black and white vajras. Those to the south and southwest, of the ratna family, hold dark yellow gems. Those to the west and northwest, of the padma family, hold dark red eight petalled lotuses. Those to the north and northeast, of the karma family, hold dark green crossed vajras and swords.

In the extensive version, in their three centers and six hands are the lady tramens. Their six feet are on the seats of the protectors of the ten directions. Each has the five symbols signifying increase and so forth of the five families. These should be learned elsewhere.

As for the main topic, the cause samadhi: Having meditated on oneself briefly as the chief deity, see the palace, whether visualized or not, as empty. It is joined with the meditation of the seed syllable of visualizing the deity.

2) Meditating on the mandala

In the center is the great mandala of Samantabhadra.
There are four sides, and four gateways, topped by arches.
The five-colored walls have ledges where there are the five sense-pleasures.
The cornices have garlands with jeweled pendent strings.
The eaves are decorated with balustrades and railings.
Ornamenting the dome is a precious-jewel vajra.
There are eight charnel grounds that surround the mandala.
In the center there is a seat of a lotus, sun and moon,
Supported by lions, elephants, horses, peacocks, and *shang shang

This is the visualization of the support, the palace. The display of the field and palace is within the luminous nature of mind is. This is the dwelling place of Samantabhadra. Moreover within each of the visualizations is the mandala of Samantabhadra. Meditate on this as being as limitless as the sky.

To the right and left of each of the four gates, are the two pillars of the gateways. The three gates of liberation are in every direction.

The body of the palace is cubic. The five layered wall is blue, green, red, yellow, and last white. These five are transparent like a rainbow. The four raised areas are the four wisdoms, the mirror-like wisdom and so forth. As a symbol of the dharmadhatu wisdom, in the middle is a circular vase pervading the whole of space. At the top of these walls are the precious cornices. On top of those are the precious eaves⁴⁰⁷ in the form of little dome-like shapes,⁴⁰⁸ outside of which are variegated chains of garlands and pendants of jewels and pearls. Moving with the sun and moon pranas, supporting the chains, is a precious railing,⁴⁰⁹ built in the shape of chörtens.

In the middle is the vase like a circular raincoat. the shrine hall's stratified roof above the eaves, covering the internal space, has a roof in two stages, above, in the center, center and on the four sides spreading like a five pointed vajra fence. It is marked at the top with a vajra and precious jewel finial.

At each side of the gates in the four directions two pillars support the archways. Each archway has four layers, adorned with various ornaments. On top of them is a wheel turned by two deer, at whose center is a life tree of precious substances.

At the four corners are victory banners and on long poles are hanging pennants. From the edges of the stories tipped with precious bells, are lifted garlands stretched from the center of the vajra finial to the sides of the archways, from their jingling giving a pleasant sound.

There are Jeweled yak tails and silk tassels⁴¹⁰, with precious staffs and sun and moon finials. There are many kinds of deities and divine ornaments, and heaps of offering clouds from all the ten directions.

Outside the outer walls are ledges of desirable qualities, red where many transparent-appearing offering goddesses on sun and moon seats pour offerings of the five desirable qualities with a flourish.

Then there is a courtyard or field, green appearing around which, in the eight charnel grounds, are the eight self-arising stupas, Deje Tsegpa⁴¹¹ and so forth, and Garab Dorje (Prahevajra), Manjushrimitra, Padmasambhava, Vimalamitra, and so forth, the eight teachers. The charnel grounds are adorned with eight fires, eight lakes, eight clouds, eight trees, eight lokapalas, eight deities, eight nagas, and so forth.

In the center of the palace is a throne whose center is adorned with a lion, the east with an elephant, the south with a horse, the west with a peacock, the north with a shang shang. On that is a sun, moon and jewel seat. In the other places of the deities, meditate that there are self-arising lotus, sun, and moon seats equal to the number of the deities. The Secret Essence says:

Wisdom is visualized in the four directions and center.
With the spontaneous presence of the limitless mandalas,
By yogins with realization of the great perfection,
The mandala of the source of arising is realized.
A wheel with four spokes and a rim, a courtyard adorned by a cube.

Having square gateways, with music like heaps of various clouds.
This is adorned by forty-two different mandalas.
Great lion, elephant, horse, and garuda thrones float in space
With sun and moon and lotus or jewel seats.

Here as the garuda and peacock both are alike in overcoming poison, there is no distinction between union and purification in overcoming the poison of desire.

The four great layers of the archways are divided into halves by sub-layers making eight. The Fierce Lightning of Illusion says:

In the space which is the space of the human mind
The edifice of the four elements is spontaneously present.
On top of that arising from the four kinds of jewels
Spontaneously present and completely immeasurable,
As for the beautiful ground which is supported by that,
It is carpeted with various kinds of jewels.

Giving way when pressed down, raising back on lifting,
On that there is the edifice of the palace itself.
With its cubic shape it is very beautiful.
It is made of four different kinds of precious jewels.

In the center of the structure is a four spoked wheel,
Also made of four different kinds of precious jewels.
At the peak of the vase⁴¹² is the crest ornament of dharma,
Variegated like the feather of a peacock.

Each of the four gates is adorned with an arch.
At the sides are eight pillars holding up the archways.
At the center of each is a vertical four spoked wheel.
The navel supports a tree made of precious substances.
The squares of the courtyards are beautifully brilliant.
The precious light rays collect together like a staff.

The deities have seats of a lotus, sun, and moon.
They sit on blazingly brilliant excellent jewel seats.
The foot supports of the precious thrones are beautiful.
The excellent ornaments that adorn this wondrous palace
Blaze with suns, and moons, and various precious jewels.

Canopies, victory banners, food, and parasols,
Flowing silken streamers and long garlands strung with pearls,
Covered with ringing bells and the finest yak tail whisks,
Adorned with various kinds of musical instruments.

The assembly of worldly deities is beautiful.
These and other ornaments are inconceivably excellent.
The four gates of the palace are adorned with elephants.
The silk tassels⁴¹³ hanging from the archways
Are brilliant with a cascade of golden bells,
And chains with the symbols of the three excellent jewels.

The front of each gate is adorned with matching potted palms.
They have fine form and fragrance, and shine with radiance.
In these potted palms are cuckoos and so forth
Auspicious birds whose melodious voices resound with song.

In front of each gate is a washing pond of excellent shape,

Whose water fully possesses the eight limbs of excellent taste⁴¹⁴
In each are inconceivable countless gods and goddesses.

Outside the surrounding walls of this palace of deities
Are peaks and places for walking of indescribable beauty.
These and so forth are inconceivably excellent.
Primordially self-established without needing to be sought.

If this mandala is associated with the three purities of ground, path, and fruition, the ground is that all sentient beings exist like that primordially. Therefore the four gates are the four immeasurables. The four archways are the four foundations of mindfulness. The five-fold wall is the five wisdoms. The eight pillars are the limbs of the eight-fold noble path. The bells, collections of za ra or bakuli, garlands of suns and moons, yak tails and jewels are the five senses and powers. The parasols are dharmadhatu. The wheels are the four truths. The cornices are the changeless nature of mind. The garlands and pendants are the seven limbs of enlightenment. The eaves are the great compassion. The stupas of the railing are inconceivable dharmata. The circular vase is the wisdom of dharmadhatu. The four rises are the four excellent wisdoms. The five seats are the essential purity of the five poisons. The vajra and jewel finial is the primordial luminous nature of mind. The eight charnel grounds are the eight consciousnesses. The eight teachers are the eight self-arising wisdoms. The eight fires are the completely torment of false conceptions. The eight trees are the eight natures of the kleshas. The eight ponds are the eight-fold purifying path. The eight deities are the eight gates of siddhi. The eight nagas are the assembly of eight qualities. The eight lokapalas are the eight collections of merit and wisdom. That faults at the time of impurity and enlightened virtues correspond two by two is kindness. For example, as the five kleshas are counted as an aspect of the five wisdoms.

If they are connected to the path, they are associated with the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment. The four archways are the four foundations of mindfulness. The four tassels or ribbons are the four genuine abandonments. The four ornaments of wheels and so forth are the four legs of miracle. The five-fold wall is the five faculties. The cornices, garlands and pendants, eaves, railings, and overflowing containers are the five powers. The five animals, the lion and so forth, plus the sun and moon are the seven limbs of enlightenment. The eight pillars are the eight limbs of the noble path. The stairs by which the gates are entered are the six perfections. The four pillars are the four immeasurables. These three together at each gate are the three gates of liberation. These are the virtues from the path of accumulation through the path of meditation.

If it is connected with the fruition, the connection is with the qualities of the level of buddhahood. As for the 37 factors of completing the path, from this way of connecting, in particular the four fearlessnesses are the lion-thrones. The ten powers are the elephant thrones. The ten faculties are the peacock thrones. The four legs of miracle are the horse thrones. That all knowables are unobstructed is the shang shang thrones. The five wisdoms are the walls. The inexhaustible wheel of ornament of body, speech, and mind is the swirling light rays. The protectors of beings are the parasols. The matchless finial and so forth are adornment by the ultimate buddha qualities. These are arranged as in the Net of Illusion. The details are as extensively explained there.

Though some tantrikas say that these things that are connected are not really in the mandala, this tradition of mantra is a wrong conception. Here the beautiful symbols appear like reflections in a mirror. From the power of display of these qualities, the palace and deities naturally-arising like a rainbow should be known to exist spontaneously. When the ground is free from all obscurations, the power of self-appearances of Akanishta actually will manifest. The Net of Illusion says:

The inconceivable self-existing mandala
By which all sentient beings are consecrated,
Possesses the perfection of all mandalas
Along with their environments and inhabitants.

c. Meditating on the deities

Now we shall discuss the mandala of the inhabitants, the deities. Within this palace, on thrones of lions and so forth, from the transformation of the seed syllables of the individual deities:

There are the deities of the five families with their consorts There are also eight male and eight female sattvas.

There are also four male and four female door-keepers.

The buddhas of the six lokas are in their proper places.

Their bodies, perfect in color, scepters, and ornaments,

Emanate limitless light rays to the limits of the directions.

In the center is Vairochana together with Akashadhatvishvari, dark blue. In the east is Akshobhya together with Mamaki, white. In the south is Ratnasambhava together with Buddhhalocana, yellow. In the west is Amitabha together with Pandaravasini. In the north is Amoghasiddhi together with Tara.

On the ground below them is a four-spoked wheel. There the five families abide. Outside of the wheel is a square and four square patterns. At each of the bordering corners inside and out there are two deities making eight altogether.

At the southeast corner is Kshitigarbha and Lasya, the goddess of grace green-blue. In the southwest is Akashagarbha and Mala, dark blue⁴¹⁵ and blue. In the northwest are Avalokiteshvara and Gita. In the northeast are Samantabhadra and Gandhe green-yellow.

On the edges of the courtyards are the six buddhas. At the east gate are Yamantaka and his consort. At the south gate are Vijaya and consort. At the west gate are Hayagriva and his consort. At the north gate is Amritakundalin and his consort. They stir up the continuum a little so that it will unite.

d. How to meditate on the great mandala of the environment and inhabitants.

In particular as for its being taught that action and doer are displayed in the courtyard, this is the courtyard of Vairochana's heart:

Within the heart-center of the principal deity,

Ground-Samantabhadra is being embraced by his consort.

His body is adorned with the major and minor marks.

In color he is like a spotless sapphire sky.

He is seated in cross-legged posture in a blazing globe of colors?⁴¹⁶

Meditate that from this light rays are emanated.

They purify the vessel and essence of the world.

All is completely pure as the gods and goddesses.

In the heart center of Vairochana on a sun and moon disk is Samantabhadra, in meditation with his consort, dark blue. By the emanation of light rays of all colors,⁴¹⁷ all the environment and inhabitants of the phenomenal world become one with the palace of deities. Meditate that all dharmas become of the nature of the buddha field of Akanishta Gandavyuha. As this is joined with the texts, the Fierce Lightning says:

In the numerous host of wisdom deities

Who are the inhabitants of this palace

The deities are united with their consorts.

At the center in the heart of the glorious palace

Is Vairochana along with his mudra consort.

They are of the color of Indranila.⁴¹⁸

As their emblem they hold wheels in their hands.

In front of that hero is Vajrasattva with consort,

Having the colors of conch shell and of crystal.

As their sign they hold vajras in their hands.

To the right is the Bhagavan Ratnasambhava.

He is of yellow color like Jambunada.
As his sign he holds an eight sided jewel.

Behind is lord Amitabha, colored like ruby.
As his emblem he grasps a crimson lotus.

To the left is the lord Amogasiddhi.
With a body color like Indranila.
As his emblem he is bearing a sword.

They are all adorned with peaceful ornaments,
And are wearing the crown of the five families.
They are sitting in full lotus posture
With long necklaces and customary armlets.
Their bracelets and their earrings are exquisite.
The major and minor marks are all complete.

The consorts who are embraced with the left arm
Are Samantabhadri and Lochana
Mamaki, Pandaravasini, and Tara.
They embrace the lords of upaya with the right hand.
With the left they grasp their signs and bells,
With customary ornaments like the fathers'.

The spokes of the wrathful wheel are self-existing.
In front of it there is a beautiful rise.
In the deities' hands are vajras of light blue.
Their sign is the three pointed vajra that they hold.

To the right of these is Kshitigarbha.
Green-blue in color grasping a precious sprout.
Behind this mandala is Akashagarbha.
He is blue and holding his symbol, a sword.

To the left embraced by beautiful Gita.
Lord Avalokiteshvara is light red.
He grasps a lotus, his customary sign.
His topknot is adorned with jñanasattvas.
He sits in the cross-legged position of the sattvas
Adorned with the customary ornaments.

Embracing these above four deities
Are the consorts Nritya, Lasya, Mala, and Gita.
Their right hands by upaya grasp the principals.
The left are in dance mudra, with mirror, and mala
They have a vina,⁴¹⁹ and their ornaments
Are like those of the principal deities.

As for the beautiful squares that are at the borders
They are white to signify kindness or maitri.
They are adorned with beautiful snake-wood gandis.

In the square that is on the southern border
Is Nirviranavishkambin who is blue,
Holding in his hand a dharmachakra.
Beautiful on the border to the south-west
Is light red Manjushrikumara.
He holds as his symbols a lotus and sword.

Beautiful on the border to the north-west,
Is Samantabhadra yellow-green in color.
His emblems are a jewel and ear of grain.
At the corner of the northeast intermediate direction
To the left of these who were just described above
Embracing these above four deities
Are the consorts gandha, pushpa, Gita, and Dhupa
With their right hands they embrace their consorts.
With the left they are holding their own signs.
With customary ornaments as before.

At the four gates are the four conquerors.
Blazing Yamantaka is dark blue
With a goat's head holding the scepters of confidence

Dwelling as the guardian of the east
Is blazing Vijaya, who is dark yellow,
Holding a vajra at the southern gate.
Blazing dark red is horse-headed Hayagriva,
Holding a skull and snake at the western gate.

Blazing Amritakundalin, dark green,
Holds a crossed-vajra at the northern gate.
He is standing in a dancing posture,
Adorned with the various charnel ornaments.

All these show their teeth in a frightening way
They are all enveloped in blazing fires
The sounds of HUM and Phat are loudly resounding.

Embracing these above four deities
Are Shemo, Gyaljema, Tamdrinmo, and Khyilma.
Awesome, holding iron chains and bells.
Their scepters are iron hooks and iron nooses.
Their accoutrements are like those of the conquerors.
Those at each of these gates are self-existing.

Within the beautiful courtyards of the palace,
Are the great sages, the six nirmanakayas.
They show whatever bodies⁴²⁰ are needed for taming.
And so the accoutrements they show are uncertain.

In these beautiful courtyards, in the front and back
Are Jepapo and -mo, of sky-like color.
They are resting in the state of samadhi.
These and so forth are inconceivably excellent,
Unexpressed and inexpressible.

The palace is filled by a host of deities.
The limitless mandala is self existing.
In the heart centers of these excellent deities
Are jnanasattvas whose light is full of colors
On their tongues are the syllables of their signs.
Their own signs clearly appear over all the mudras.
They are of every color, with all the styles,
Soft, supple, caressing, yielding, and young,
Clear, brilliant, and abundantly bountiful
They are consecrated with brilliant blazing.

That divine nature illumines the mandala.

Pure of the five skandhas, these are the pure deities of the five families. The deities with their consorts are explained as the union of appearance and emptiness. The eye, ear, nose, and tongue are the four inner bodhisattvas. Form, sound, taste, and touch are their four consorts, the four inner female bodhisattvas. The pure eye, ear, nose, and tongue powers are the four external sattvas.

The four times, the past, future, present, and inconceivable dharmata, are the outer female bodhisattvas. Touch, the toucher, the touched, and awareness of touch having symbolized sense consciousness, sense, sense-object, and the four gates are the pure forms of the four ayatanas arising from sense consciousness. All dharmas are neither eternal nor nothingness. They have no self-natures and no characteristics. These are the four gates of dharmata.

The pure existence of the six kleshas, six perfections, six kinds of beings, and six purifying sages, and alaya and alayavijnana is Samantabhadra and his consort. All these deities presently divided from alaya are joined to the collections of consciousness with their faculties and objects. This is the situation of impurity. If they are purified, they are joined to the wisdoms and buddha fields. Knowing them in that way is knowing them as the pure deities.

e. How to recite the mantra

After the nature of the mandala thus elucidated has been known as one's own mind, from the seed syllables in the heart centers of the deities filling the space of the sky, the mantra garland goes from the mouth of the deity into that of the consort, and from the secret space, on the tips of whirling light rays, come a host of syllables and bodies of deities and countless scepters. In the world they do benefit for sentient beings. Think that the self-sound of mantra resounds like a thousand thunders OM AH HUM SVAHA or OM HUM HRAM HRIH AH.

Recite the three syllables and the seeds of the five buddha families.

They become unborn sound-emptiness, like an echo.

Let yourself come to rest in this unfabricated state.

Recite the three syllables and the seed syllables of the five families. It is like the unborn roar of a thousand thunders. Within that rest in meditation without artificiality. Also abandoning the faults of additions and omissions and reciting too fast, slow, weakly or, strongly, do the recitation. This very sound emptiness of reciting the mantra is the completion stage of sound. From that state, undisturbed mind and yoga without attachment should be produced.

b. The completion stage,

There are three sections

1. The main explanation of how to meditate

At this time:

Our minds are eternally of the nature of the deities.

Our bodies are the mandala; the words of our speech are mantra.

Within the great wisdom everything is self-perfected,

Wisdom and samaya are a non-duality.

Nothing needs to be summoned and there is nothing that comes.

Therefore, there is nothing that we could ask to depart.

There is no good and evil, no accepting and no rejecting.

This primordial mandala has always been within us.

By supplicating when we know that this is so,

This, which is unestablished, will never be made to be.

Having supplicated simply by knowing that all dharmas are the single mandala of buddhahood, we do the recitation, offerings, and praises, within the state of everything being the great spontaneous presence of the nature of one's own mind. Nevertheless in the yantras below yoga tantra there is attachment to the duality of good and evil, and therefore the jñanasattva enters into one from outside, and also the departure of the deities after the session is not explained in the same way. The Wondrously Arisen King says:

Within the primordial mandala of self-existing equality,
Having attained the knowledge that one was always there,
By different stages of mind involved with meditation,
Inviting and supplicating is not necessary.

Since body is established as the deity, speech as mantra, and mind as samadhi, practice does not differentiate samayasattva and jñanasattva. There is no contradiction between this and saying that beginners and those who delight in complexity should invite jñanasattvas and make offerings and praises to them. The Secret Essence says:

We enter the three thousand worlds as a few tiny syllables,
From space we invite the mandala make our offerings.

2. How afterwards one gathers everything into the conceptionless.

Afterwards, there is a gradual gathering in of attachment.
Rest in simplicity without conceptions of anything.
When not there in illusion like the moon in water,
Dedicate the merit to help all sentient beings.

Here beginners gradually gathering in, meditate on emptiness and then by having trained in that very visualization of exhaustion, meditating within the illusory state of appearance/emptiness, dedicate the merit.

3. The stages during the sessions

Act as if all is illusion, emptiness/luminosity.
All appearances and sounds are deities and mantra.
All memories and thoughts are self-arising wisdom.
From moment to moment this should be known unwaveringly.

During meditation on the mandala of the deities, and also in post-meditation, the environment, the apparent phenomena of the world, are the palace, and the beings who inhabit the world are the gods and goddesses. All sounds are mantra. All cognitions are self-arising wisdom. They rest shimmering in the great non-grasping where whatever arises and is encountered is liberated. So that they do not become ordinary appearances and thoughts of the five poisons, try to remain there undistracted day and night.

c. The accompanying samaya and action/practice,

1) The instruction to keep pure samaya,

Now as accompaniments to the practice of secret mantra:

Let us purely keep our root and branch samayas.
Know and accept them purely. Do not give up, but act.
Five times five samayas are meant to be accomplished.
These twenty-five can be summarized under body, speech, and mind.
Let us try to keep our minds completely pure.

As explained before, guard the three root samayas and the five times five branch samayas. In brief, train in mind being pure and faultless as the chief samaya. The Tantra of the Array of

Samaya says:

What is often talked about
As "samaya blah blah blah"
Is guarding one's own mind
In a state of purity.
Samaya is a great wonder.
So all the buddhas have taught.

The Individual Enlightenment says:

Performing no evil deeds,
Acting in perfect virtue,
One's mind is completely tamed.
Thus it is taught by the buddhas.

That is enough for a brief summary, but for the extended version, there should be as many samayas as the assembly of thoughts of sentient beings. The Secret Essence says:

As for this samaya
It is most wonderful.
In the ten directions
In all of the six lokas,

As many as thoughts of beings
Inhabiting the three realms,
There are that many samayas
For the purpose of taming them.

Accountable samayas exist in relation to relative truth. In relation to absolute truth all dharmas are inexpressible, beyond any limits that could be guarded, the great suddenness, the unestablished samaya of Samantabhadra. The same text says:

As the unestablished ultimate,
The mudra of supremacy,
The King Samantabhadra,
Everything is established.

The All-Creating King says:

Kye! As for the samaya of me the doer of all,
It is unborn like the sky, beyond all partiality,
Without the duality of guarding and non-guarding,
Realize the samaya of the King, the doer of all.

2) Delineating the particular times of practice and accomplishing

Moreover to complete the two accumulations and pacify all hindrances accomplish siddhi and therefore remedy all violations:

On the fifteenth day of the month and the time of the new moon,
And also on the feast days of the eighth and twenty-ninth,
And the tenth day and night of the waxing and waning moon,
Perform the proper approaching and accomplishing
With feasts and offerings, confession and amending.

There are six times for accomplishing siddhi and the remedy of confessing. These are the fifteenth day of the month, the time of the empty sky of the new moon, and the eighth, twenty-fifth, tenth, and twenty-ninth days of the month. On these externally dakinis are abroad, and internally the pranas are especially well-gathered in the nadis. These are called "the times of close gathering." In particular, the night of the tenth day of the waxing moon and the night of the twenty-fifth, the tenth day of the waning moon, in the places of practice, those who have the dakini practices gather to accomplish whatever karmas they want to attain. They should exert themselves in the four, approaching and so on, and make feast offerings and confessions. By that, on these days of the month all transgressions will be remedied. The supreme and ordinary siddhis are quickly accomplished. Moreover in single trees, rock mountains, islands in lakes and, so forth there are gatherings of the dakinis at the auspicious times, which are therefore called places of "gathering near."

The four inner chakras are always included in the dhatu and wisdom. This is called "gathering at the auspicious time at the place of drawing near."

The external places are the twenty four places and so on. The "near" place, is any place where the dakinis are. Internally they are the twenty four places of the petals of the nadis, the crown of the head and so on. The secret great bliss is the ground of offering. This is the "place of drawing near."

3. How from the virtues the fruition manifests,

Since on all these days the supreme level is chiefly established, arising from the secret individual tantras and oral instructions:

Let us earnestly try to reach the profoundest piths
Of the yoga of prana and mind, of nada and bindu.
By meditating on the path that unifies,
The experiences of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought.
Let us be vajra-holders within this very life.
Let us attain the state of perfect enlightenment.

As for the supported, the samadhi mandala, yogins familiar with the upaya of the developing and completion stages always train in the completion stage of the great wisdom, knowing how to meditate on the above-taught nature of prana, nadi, and bindu as it is and in its ultimate arising. When one dwells in non-dual wisdom, by the tummo of the navel, the drops of the melting element at the crown of the head, the great essence, fall from the throat into the heart center. They activate the secret center and the downward going prana is reversed. By its essence going into the heart, the support of the above-mentioned bodhicitta, mixed with light, is touched by that, so that the luminous nature of mind is pervaded by mahasukha even more than before.

When the nature of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought arises, rest in the subtle light of the heart center. By the arising of inconceivable wisdom whose body is space, this is called treading on the level of the great dhyana. At that time, body, speech, and mind become one and inseparable, and it is said that the three realms are not separate.

Also as for the nadi petals of the heart center and their essences, the Commentary of the Secret Drop says:

"Whoever has that absorption" and so forth, means whoever has that absorption has the essential nature. If it so exists, as for the white silk essences of the nadis which are like twined cords, their producing the essence of the skandhas from non-obstruction is the essence of arising. It appears as earth. This is the consort who illuminates the buddhas' eyes, Buddhalochana. That is the wisdom of the great emptiness. It produces the support of everything not being other than the state of complete purity.

These white silk cords, are vibrated by the vermilion sound essence. As for its existing like the essence of the mother, since it has made the skandhas primordially pure, that arising essence appears as water. This is the consort Mamaki. The wisdom of equality is the nature that combines all these in a single space without separation.

The breath-essence, gold, existing under the earth as mere vapor, producing the primordial support of the rising and motion of the skandhas, appearing as the air element is Tara and all-accomplishing wisdom. This nature produces the essence of great bliss.

Moreover, the primordial heat-essence, like the sun resting in a mirror, existing as a mere fragrance, ripens as the apparent element fire. This is Pandaravasini and discriminating awareness wisdom. It is the wisdom lamp of realizing everything as the space of mahasukha.

In the center of that light, consisting of the great bindu, bodhicitta is the great essence. It produces the support of the primordial luminosity of the skandhas. It is the essence of arising, appearing as space and the nadis. That is the wisdom of the great pervasiveness, the consort Samantabhadri revealing the luminous state of everything as the space of authenticity, appearance/emptiness. The essence like a flower of molten gold is prajna, the nature of all the consorts. What is like precious saffron anthers is the essence of the king of Upaya, Samantabhadra, and so forth, the father deities. Moreover, the precious white stone ke ke ru, seemingly filling all gaps, is the mirror-like wisdom. By that the essence of bodhicitta is seen as if unseen, without a seer, and nothing to see. That which is the father is the mother. That which is the mother is the father. They are seen as radiance without difference. That should be viewed as that having that itself. That is called bindu. What exists in that way is the union of upaya and prajna. Not only that, but it exists as all the three realms. That nature of bodhicitta is viewed. It should be continuously viewed and magnetized.

In the center of the eight nadis of the heart, are the essence nadis, divided like ten hairs of a horse's tail and no bigger, and within that the blood essence is the breath. The essence of breath is luminous like light. For example, like the oily wick of a blazing lamp, self-arising wisdom is luminous with the brilliance of the five lights. The essence of the elements goes up and down, since they dwell there like many oils, and like the blazing up of a luminous lamp, self-arising wisdom also produces great luminosity within the body, and in all the nadi petals. Since bliss increases, it arises as the wisdom of self-awareness. Here appearance is the five fathers. All the solid earth of the nadis and so forth is Buddhhalocana. Moisture and water are the great essence Mamaki. Bliss and heat are Pandaravasini. Lightness and movement are Tara. Since simple space is inseparably united with these ladies, this is called the great union. At that time, the body, speech, and mind syllables of the nadis blaze with light. When the syllables of the basis of purification have been burned, no karma and habitual patterns are conceptualized. Liberation of samsara into dharmata is produced. This is supported by the nadis. By breath bliss is moved. By heat bliss is ripened. By space, the space of equality/equanimity of the great perfection is produced. Realization of the complete liberation of the three worlds as Samantabhadra is produced. The same text says:

If it is asked, "If one meditates like that, what happens, and from what does it arise?" What is being talked about is the wisdom of buddhahood. It is the arising of space as form. The great yoga is not different from the three realms. From what does it arise? From the great essence, profound and unbroken, from that it arises. If it is asked what comes from that, From that that arises. That itself arises, so it is said.

When bindu-bodhicitta has just become workable and radiant, above and below OM are SU and TRI and above and below HUM are AH and NRI. Above and below AH are PRE and DU blazing with light. The bindu drops of the essence become natureless. Since bindu is natureless, in the nadis like white silk cords no bigger than ten hairs of a horse's tail only the vibrating vermilion essence of the mother exists producing desire within the great bliss. By that blazing with light, the breath essence like gold in a brocade, abiding as a mere vapor produces movement within the great bliss. That blazes with light. Within it the essence of heat, like the sun in a mirror, existing as a mere fragrance, ripens the great bliss. Blazing with light, it becomes the natureless great essence.

Arising only in the form of space, all the three worlds spontaneously rise as non-individualized wisdom, so it is said. This bindu-bodhicitta arising as the form of space is dharmakaya. That is called "just so."

Then within the navel the nadi petals blaze, and regarding how the heart bodhicitta is illumined by that and made to blaze with light, the same text says:

The secret prajna bindu is called space and so forth. This secret prajna is called the bindu having the nature of Samantabhadri. This is dharmadhatu. Where does it dwell? In the navel. In the center of sixty-four nadis dwells the sun. What is its nature like? It is like prajna and upaya. Arising from that bindu, all marks being grasped is the fathers. It is upaya. As for this natureless bindu being dharmadhatu, this is prajna, the mothers. Thus bindu consists of inseparable prajna and upaya. From that bindu form and the three realms arise. All these elements in a mandala of forty-two do not become many. Becoming a mandala, since all these are the bindu of dharmadhatu, they are said to develop or be sealed as everything. Here the five wisdoms are spontaneously present. They exist and are seen as five and so-called. As the above essences become radiant from the power of heat, their heat descends. This is the bindu of the nature of Samantabhadri. Its dissolving downward is called "descending." The bindu of the nature of Samantabhadri blazes with light. This is called the blaze of dissolving into the essence of the heart center. By this the great essence brilliant gold, until then existing under a covering, having existed as a mere vapor, blazes with light, having become the radiant drops of the essence. Without the ground of breath, it becomes ever weaker until it is motionless. If that motion is absent, its causeless fruition existing as the great bliss is called the great-bliss offering. That heat of great bliss dissolving into the above bindus is called urging the bindus to blaze with light. Moreover, by the heat of the heart center the bindus descend. By their touching the bliss heat in the center of the nadi petals, again that heat becomes the essence. When it dissolves into the heart-center essence, by the ceasing of the cause of coarse prana, bindu rests without coming and going in the heart. Existing motionlessly, it is dharmata, absolute truth.

Then by the heat of the heart center, touching the essence in the center of the nadis of the throat, the essence proliferates in the heart. Also, by the ceasing of prana it rests in dharmata, about which the same text says:

This light of the great essence dissolving into the bindu of the throat, is called union. Where does it dwell? In the center of sixteen nadis, as a lotus blossom, it is said to be in a nadi mandala of two fives and six. Energized by the heat below, it blazes with light. Existing as the great bliss, this is called the great bliss. The great bliss is spontaneously present. After this it does not move back. The great rejoicing should be offered. By what is called the merit of the arising place of knowables and so forth, knowables are objects, and arisings⁴²¹ are thoughts. Exhaustion is radiant bindu. This is called the wisdom of exhausting thoughts through light and luminous bindu. Bindu itself without nature appears as the great bliss. This is called the music of the play of bliss. That is called bindu entering into and dwelling in the place of great bliss.

Moreover, when the heat of the heart center dissolves into the throat-bindu, prana and thoughts do not wander. This is the virtue of breath dissolving into bindu. As for heat, at the time of non-identification, or non-grasping at essences,⁴²² when passion has been exhausted, there is the wisdom of great bliss. As for breath, at the time of non-identification, when aggression is exhausted, it is the wisdom of luminosity/emptiness. When the empty hollows of the nadis are not identified, that is the time of exhausting ignorance, the wisdom of the simplicity of dharmadhatu.

Now the heat of the throat enters the essence at the crown of the head. Regarding how the wisdom of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought is produced, the same text says:

"In a mandala of three tens and two" and so forth having come into the center of thirty-two, having come into the center of space, it exists as moon-bindu-bodhicitta.

That same bindu is the substance of buddhahood, dharmakaya, the main point. The perfection of the mandala of the ten directions and four times is this itself. Body, speech, mind, quality, and action are this same bindu.

But after the bindu of the great bliss has been touched by the light of that throat bindu, dissolving into light, it becomes a coronation vase of the nature of the great bliss. The three realms become non-different. After wisdom has arisen in the form of space, it becomes dharmakaya pure of all things. In this sense, the yogin who becomes dharmakaya will see the faces of all the buddhas at once.

Moreover, that great essence in the center of the space chakra at the crown of the head, blazing with light because of that heat, is the mahasukhakaya. Having reached that, by enlightenment one treads on the level of the great ushnisha. If the four stages of this are briefly summarized, first in the center of the navel, the aspect of heat, the bindu having the essence of the sun, in the center of sixty-four nadis, is made into a condition by touching the heat in the essence of the heart center. Then the wisdom of nirmanakaya is realized.

When the heat blazes upward touching the great essence of the heart center, the prana and breath essence subsides. False conceptions are pacified. This is the wisdom of sambhogakaya.

Since the essence of this mode of dharmas is free from producing movement, prana and mind dissolve back into luminosity as the great wisdom. However, as for the essences increasing in the nadi petals being the wisdom of bliss-emptiness, it is not so. These essences are collected back into the essences in the center of the four essence chakras. A non-supreme luminosity arises. The bliss-heat-desire aspect is the wisdom of bliss. The moving breath prana-dissolving aspect is the wisdom of luminosity. Mixed with the space element aspect within the nadis, these arise as the three wisdoms of non-thought. This is called the circle⁴²³ of the three wisdoms. As for the fruition of all these, incidentally one has mastery over life and is established as a rigdzin of mahamudra. By attaining the virtues of the paths of seeing and meditation, as signs of that level one sees many buddha fields, accomplishes great samadhis and miracles, and benefits beings with inconceivable emanations and Dharmas. Finally, by buddhahood, the spontaneous presence of wisdom manifests. The same text says:

"This is the ultimate empowerment." As for this and so forth, the yogin who is capable of this is empowered with mastery of life and so forth, whatever is desired. There is no other empowerment than this. By oneself existing as the mandala, as above in the supreme samadhi, one becomes the mandala. Here by this self-existing buddhahood in which the two accumulations are perfected, since one becomes all mandalas, their many enjoyments and ornaments do not fail to occur, this is called the ornament.

"By the dual perfection, the union of bindu..., " Since bindu is workable, there is dharmakaya. This arises from perfecting the two accumulations. Such a yogin by the great compassion for sentient beings of the ten directions and four times, does benefits like dream or illusion and liberates them from samsara.

By these passages the teaching of extraordinary completion stage is completed. Now as for the summary of the developing and completion stage:

By having the single yoga,
All mandalas are accomplished.
Therefore this itself
Develops as well as perfects
The realm of Samantabhadra.
Moreover as above,
In regard to elaboration,
There are complex and very complex,
and also supremely complex.
Inconceivable to thought,
the limitless mandalas
Become spontaneous presence.

These are the incidental verses.

Here first is the presentation from the viewpoint of those who are not able to enter into the extensive developing stage or only devote themselves to the completion stage with little elaboration. As for the explanation that all will be meditated upon by meditating on the single deity, after going to refuge and arousing bodhicitta, as it says in the Secret Essence:

This rootless nature of mind
Is the root of all the dharmas.
The nature of the mind
Is the nature of the syllables,
The precious wishing clouds.

Also:

A is the middle way
Of having no conceptions
In between emptiness
and a non-empty reality,

All is just a name,
A whirling syllable garland
Abiding as all the buddhas.

By reciting A A A, all dharmas in a state without one and many are unobscured in the center of a sky free from clouds. In the center of the sun and moon shining brilliantly with rays of light, glorious Samantabhadra and Samantabhadri are non-dual. Having the mudra of meditation, as the nature of dharmakaya they are without the customary ornaments. Meditate on them in the midst of encircling light rays of the five colors, and that by the light of the palaces of Akanishta all the space of the sky is filled, so that the phenomenal world blazes with light.

OM AH HUM A A. Saying this as many times as you can, rest in the ultimate space of the sky. By this meditate on all the mandalas of the buddhas, since this is their source. The Secret Essence says:

In the limpid center of space on a sun and moon,
Meditating on the king of wisdom,
Seated cross-legged, in meditation pasture,
We are meditating on all the mandalas
Of the victorious ones without remainder.

Then as for how meditating in a single completion stage is meditating on them all, visualize that in the heart of the one meditating like that, brilliantly blazing globes of light, having the radiance of the five wisdoms of non-thought, take hold of the mind and render it immovable. When prana becomes immovable, whatever is perceived will not exist. One can rest for a day and night within the wisdom without one and many. Lights and rainbows appear. Buddha fields are visibly seen. By mixing day and night the mind rests in self-awareness wisdom with no rising or setting. Except for making clear that one's mind has been like that primordially, in attaining buddhahood no other nature is attained. The Secret Essence says:

In the four times and in the ten directions
No other perfect buddha will be found.
Mind itself is perfect buddhahood.
Do not search for any other buddha.

This kind of developing and completion stage unites all the mandalas of developing and completion. All the siddhis are accomplished. Little omissions and additions to rituals are no hindrance to siddhi. There are measureless benefits. The same text says:

By completely uniting all mandalas,

All mandalas are accomplished.
Now there will be no transgressions
Of additions or omissions.

Now, as explained above, in the brief teaching and the details of the extensive meditation on the mandala, these details should also be trained in. First, train successively in the three samadhis, the suchness samadhi and so forth until the signs are attained. Then from a white A by emanating and gathering fine A's, emanate and gather the vowels and consonants. Do the same from the seed syllable of the deity. The same text says:

A
From white A which has become completely stable,
Other very fine A syllables emanate.
Having filled and illumined the directions,
Even when they are gathered back again,
They are stable without increase and decrease.
From these the brightly blazing assembly of names
Is similarly emanated and gathered back.

Meditate on the seed syllables of the deities until they are clear. The virtues of this are long life, freedom from disease, not being harmed by obstacles of obstructing spirits and dōns, accomplishing the four karmas, and uniting with the supreme level. The same text says:

This dependent arising
of the vajra siddhi
Becomes the cause of wisdom.

Then meditate successively on the body of the deity, the ornaments, the syllable at the heart center, and the consort. Then while meditating on the retinue, Akshobhya and so forth, one after another, meditate on development and completion as one. At this time the signs of perfecting the path of accumulation arise.

Then on a rise in front visualize the retinue with Akshobhya as the principal one. Perfectly visualize behind the mandala the retinue with Amitabha as the principal one. This is the mandala of three groups. Train in these as body, speech, and mind.

Then on a rise to the south and north visualize the mandalas of Ratnasambhava and Amoghasiddhi. These are quality and action. This is the mandala of five groups.

Then with the gate-keepers in union with their consorts, this is the root of all mandalas. There is no need to meditate on any other, since this is the mandala in which all others are included. These gatekeepers of the four directions are the gatekeepers of the four directions of all mandalas. For example, below the rise in the east are Ankusha and consort as gatekeepers. To the right below Ratnasambhava are Pasha⁴²⁴ and consort. The west and north are similar. The faces of all these deities are seen from whatever direction they are viewed. The same text says:

From every direction their faces are clear and vivid.

Meditate on them facing in the direction of the principal deity. At that time, the virtues of the four stages of the path of preparation are perfected.

Then in the four directions above and below meditate on the mandalas of the five families.

In the east is the mandala of Vajrasattva, like that there are 5 x 5. In the south, west and north too, are three more, with 5 x 5. In the center is the mandala of Vairochana with 5 x 5. Within the 25 mandalas, the number of deities of the root mandala is 42 2.[422?]. The rises 38 8 [388?] these 170 x 5 = 850, [810?] by meditating on those the virtues of the path of seeing are perfected.

Then the 1000 and 20,000 appearance-producing buddhas of the lower seven bhūmis are perfected.

Then meditating on those as limitless as space, there are limitless self-existing mandalas. The virtues of the three pure levels are perfected. These very numerous teachings are established.

This style is explained in the Great Net of Illusion. Some deities are deities of blessing body, speech, and mind. Some are crown-ornament deities. Some are heart syllable jnanasattvas. These divisions should be understood from the Secret Essence and so forth. By that the explanation together with the subsidiary points is completed.

C. The dedication of merit

Now there is the dedication of merit:

Thus by this utterly secret, unsurpassable heart,
Beset by karma and kleshas of beings here in samsara,
Yet living so close to the palace of Sri Heruka himself,
May the weariness of mind come to rest this very day.

By the power of wondrously risen unsurpassable virtue, may all beings preoccupied by the games of the kleshas be liberated from the city of samsara. May they effortlessly reach the primordial city of Heruka whose primordial ultimate nature is self-existing. May they be confirmed by joy. May their weariness be relieved by the goodness of the Dharma of complete liberation.

Fully illumined by massive accumulations of virtue,
By the limitless radiant wisdom of the sun and moon,
May beings truly vanquish the darkness of the four continents.
May appearance of the good path of freedom be produced.

From the principal essence amid a measureless ocean,
By the crown jewels of the nagas, the two accumulations,
May degenerations of many births be cleared away.
By the wealth of the Dharma wishing-rain, may they be fulfilled.

By the power of riding the horse of the excellent vehicle,
Completely carried away from the three worlds that burden beings,
When all has been transformed to the path of enlightenment,
May they cross to the city of the great liberation.

This is the commentary on the tenth chapter of the NATURE OF MIND, THE EASER OF WEARINESS, Prajna Realizing the Ground that Does not Dwell in the Two Extremes

Having briefly explained the paths that ripen and free, together with the characteristics of the three essences of these, the view, meditation, and action, now there is

X. The view of prajna that realizes the ground without dwelling in dualistic extremes.

There are nine main topics.

- A. The nature of all dharmas consists of the unborn.
- B. The view that realizes suchness.
- C. What is to be abandoned.
- D. The one who abandons.
- E. There is no realization by the words of the doctrine.
- F. Passing the pass.
- G. The conviction of realization.
- H. The primordial liberation of appearance and mind.
- I. The dedication of merit.

A. The nature of all dharmas consists of the unborn

Having fully taught the two stages of secret mantra, now we shall enter into the teaching of the nature of all dharmas as the natural state, co-emergent wisdom, the primordially natureless essential meaning of all Dharmas. As has been explained:

By the yoga that unifies development and perfection
Dharmas enter into the empty and unborn.

"By" this means it starts to do this until it is completely done. The nature which should be known is the unborn, transcending the four extremes. The Noble Sutra of the Arising of the Three Jewels says:

If one does not understand
How everything is empty,
The consequence is like making
Everything into space.

For everything there is,
No nature at all exists.
Nothing becomes another.
How will an absent nature
Change into something else?
How will the natureless
Be anything at all?

Therefore it was taught
By the Tathagata.
That everything, even the Dharma,
Is motionless, stable resting.
Changeless and undisturbed,
It is simply peace itself.

As the sky is without awareness,
Not knowing that beings are stupid;
As mountains do not move,
So Dharmas are always motionless.

They do not die and transmigrate.
Therefore they are unborn.
So the Dharmas were taught
By the Victorious One.

The Absolute Samadhi says:

Dharmas are without birth
And also without arising;
With no death or transmigration
They do not have old age.

Since the Lion of Men has taught this,
Hundreds of sentient beings
Have been established in it.

They do not have a nature.
Nor does anything else.
And nothing else has them.

They are not internal
And also not external.
So the Lord Buddha taught.

The Gathering of Intentions says:

E MA HO, wondrous marvelous Dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
It is not empty, it is not non-empty.
Nor is it conceived as being in the middle.

Attachments to external objects are abandoned by those objects being known as one's own mind or as the deities and the palace. Although they are known as unborn, even this antidote is essenceless. No one enters into any "nature" of all dharmas. The Commentary Ascertaining the Intention says:

As they depend on mind only,
Thoughts of external objects
Are abandoned and left behind
As nothing whatsoever.

Later even that
Is completely left behind.

The Lankavatara Sutra says:

After they are seen to be mind-only,
They are not conceived as external objects.
After they exist in the perfect state,
They are seen as transcending even mind-only.

The yogin who exists without appearance⁴²⁵
By that has the vision of the great vehicle.

In that way we enter into knowledge of emptiness.

B. The view that realizes suchness

There are five sections.

1. The natural state:

Though all the dharmas of samsara and nirvana
Are this simplicity that is without a self,
By fixation and ignorance, we wander here in samsara.
Though samsara's joys and sorrows do indeed appear,
From the time they appear, their nature is emptiness.
Therefore, we should know them to be like dreams and illusions.

Though all dharmas are empty and without a self, by not knowing this, by grasping me and mine, there are the dreamlike confusions of samsara. Though individual joys and sorrows may be experienced, they should be known to be natureless. The Wondrously Arisen King says:

The primordial universal Buddhadharma,
Is without a beginning, middle, or end,
Not rightly knowing this nature like the sky,
Fools all whirl about within samsara.

But with no bondage and no liberation,
Its nature is like the nature of illusion.

The Secret Essence says:

By conceptions that grasp at self
Space is tied in knots.
Without bondage and liberation,
The actual Buddhadharma
Is primordial self-perfection.
However in order to teach it
We make up complexities.

By grasping what is selfless as a self there is confusion. The Noble Clouds of the Three Jewels says:

These are indeed selfless, but for foolish individuals, attached to grasping them as self, in the self-natures of the skandhas, a self exists. By being attached to that, they do not enter into suchness. Therefore, like the circle of a whirling torch, they wander in the revolutions of samsara.

These various confused appearances are established through attachment to habitual patterns of mind. The Lotus Array Sutra says:

The son of the gods, Lotus Array, spoke to Manjushri saying, "Manjushri, were these external objects made by a creator, or how should they be viewed?"

Manjushri said, "Son of the gods, these external objects were not made by a creator. They are appearances of mind or habitual patterns of thought."

The son of the gods said, "However habitual patterns may have matured, how can these mountains, oceans, the sun and moon, and so on appear to be so hard and solid?"

Manjushri said, "Son of the gods, they can so appear. In the great city of Varanasi, a bhramin named Agnidatta meditated on his body as that of a tiger. The people of the city saw him as a tiger and fled. The city was emptied. By meditating on exhaustion as earth and water, it appears as earth and water. When the monks of yogachara meditate on filth and bones as their former perceptions, they so appear. By unobstructed maturation of habitual patterns, why should all this not appear?"

The son of the gods said, "By the power of maturation of habitual patterns, why have various selves appeared?"

Manjushri said, "All appearances are uncertain. Some appearances of earth are dark. This is earth only perceived as earth. Earth is also perceived as fire. Earth is also perceived as action and enjoyment. Earth is also perceived as suffering.

Fire is perceived as fire. Fire is also perceived as action and enjoyment. Fire is also perceived as resting in place. Fire is also perceived as food. Water is perceived as water.

Water is also perceived as fire. Water is also perceived as earth. Water is also perceived as amrita. Water is also perceived as resting in place.

Space is perceived as space. Space is also perceived as resting in place. Space is also perceived as earth. These perceptions are uncertain. It is by the power of habitual patterns that things appear as they do.

Not certainly fixed as being any one thing, like a dream, things are natureless. For example, one man may appear in many roles as a friend, an enemy, a monk, a bhramin, and all kinds of other people with which his appearance is not contradictory. The various appearances of dharmas are essentially without dualistic natures.

The Dohakosha says:

Just as, when blown by wind, unmoving water
Is agitated into patterns of waves,
Thus like appearance of Saraha to the king
By stirring up oneness various things are produced.

Just as for stupid people wrongly looking
One lamp has the appearance of being two,
Thus for the non-dual viewed and viewer,
Kye ma! Mind appears as dualistic things.

Because of wind, the unity of water appears as many waves. One lamp, by pressing the eyes, appears as two. One Saraha is seen as both good and evil. All dharmas, in reality non-dual, but dualistically grasped, are like these examples. Therefore, in their duality, all dharmas are appearances of what does not exist, like a dream. They should be known to be non-dual.

2. The refutation of maintaining that appearance is mind

Though phenomena appear within mind, apparent objects are not mind. As for the explanation of this:

Thus all the things that appear to be external objects
Appear within the mind, and yet they are not mind.
Nor do they exist as anything else than mind.
Though by the force of habitual patterns, there appears
The dualistic appearance of grasping and fixation,
From the time they appear the grasper and grasped have not been two
This is like a face reflected in a mirror.

If a face is reflected in a mirror, the clear surface of the mirror can support the arising of the reflection. By the condition of this power of reflection, there is the appearance of the face. However the reflected face is not really a face. So, from the viewpoint of confusion, images of phenomena appear as this variety of things, while those things are really non-existent.

When they appear by the conditions of interdependent arising, as confusions of cause and condition, this variety of apparent objects, mountains and so on, is also not mind. Nor, as appearances due to confused habitual patterns of mind, are they truly existing objects other than ourselves. They are phenomena of confused appearance. For someone with floaters, hairs seem to trickle in front of the eyes, but nothing like what appears really exists. These are the same.

Now someone may say, "Earth and rocks and so forth, these appearances, if they do not exist as anything either inside or outside, how could that be? How could they be there at all?"

"Attached to establishing things only in terms of dualistic grasping, you are a pig!" So we should reply.

These phenomena, the phenomenal world of samsara and nirvana, do indeed appear, but from the time they appear, they do not exist as anything external, internal, or in between. Their appearance is like that of the eight examples of illusion. The Shri Samadhiraja Sutra says:

In a mirror surface or the surface of a vessel
As she adorns herself, a woman sees her face,
Though her entire face seems to appear in these,
It is neither existent or non-existent there.
All dharmas should be known to be like that.

These appearances, appearing while they do not exist, are made to arise as a confused object of grasping and fixations of things as being that way. Grasping, zungwa, is the thought that grasps the thought object arising in the first instant. It is the nature of mind having confused phenomena⁴²⁶n Fixation, dzinpa is later⁴²⁷ analysis, the mind-contents. The Discipline of Avalokiteshvara says:

Grasping, zungwa, the seer,⁴²⁸ is object grasping mind. Fixation, dzinpa, is mental contents examining that.

This is the proper account of how it should be known. Most people, learned or unlearned, proudly say, "zungwa, the grasped," is just the object, appearances of mountains and so forth. dzinpa, "the grasper" is just the subject, one's own awareness."

Well, cowboys, enough of your wrong conceptions! Tell me this--for noble ones who have 'abandoned zungwa and dzinpa,' do objects appear or they do not?

If they appear, according to you, grasped and grasper appear to the noble ones. If the object itself is the grasped and awareness itself is the grasper, they would have to appear.

If they do not appear, what about the illusion-like appearances of the enlightened noble ones in post-meditation, such as shravaka arhats who see mountains and viharas. what about the buddhas' measureless awareness of all appearances of objects in the knowledge of extent? Many reasonings and scriptures call the view that they do not appear a total mistake, let alone being beyond extremes. Dharmakirti says:

Because the wrong path is endless,
They should never have begun.

That appearance is mind has already been refuted, nevertheless, when these mountains and so forth have been made into objects, the mind that first grasps this is "appearance." True, at this point appearance and apparent object are not distinguished. That intellect pure of projecting things externally is to that extent wise.

But then by becoming attached to a wrong or exaggerated meaning, it becomes fixated.

The apparent object is not mind. This is because mind exists in its fashion, even if it is natureless. When it goes into the mode of self and other, mind does not turn into appearances with color and shape. If the apparent object is one's mind, its existence is linked to one's own. if one's mind exists, the object exists. If it does not exist, then the object certainly cannot not exist either. As mind is without color and shape, the apparent object would be so too etc. Since there is certainly appearance, and appearance is mind, that there is mere appearance would entail that there is truly existing mind. This is pretty stupid. Arrogant people who say the apparent object is mind, are exponents of a most sublime illogic.

3. The phenomenal world is like illusion

Thus, when its reflection appears to arise in a mirror:

Though the image appears, no face is really there.
Nothing goes into the mirror that is other than the image.
But though it does not exist, the appearance of two is there
Know that all the various dharmas are like that.

Though the face does not go into the mirror, it appears there. From the time it appears, no dharma other than a face is there either. Just so, from the very time that all the dharmas of the phenomenal world appear within mind, they are established neither as mind nor something other than mind. They are like the eight examples of illusion. The Mula-madhyamak-akarikas says:

Like dream. like illusion,
Like a castle of the gandharvas,
Like that is birth, and like that is duration.
Like that too is destruction taught to be.

The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

Like the moon that shines in a cloudless sky,
Though a clear, still lake shows its reflection,
The moon does not move from the sky into the water.
All dharmas should be known to be like that.

Just as for people by a rocky mountain,
By their singing, talking, weeping, and laughing,
An echo of their singing may arise,
But the melody never goes beyond those sounds,
All dharmas should be known to be like that.

4. Mind is essenceless,

When these appearances of variety are examined in terms of reasoning:

As long as they are not examined they will please us.
But when they are examined, they are ungraspable.
On thorough examination, they go beyond speech and thought.
They cannot be conceived as existing or not existing.
Extreme conceptions neither apply, nor do they not.

If we do not examine all dharmas, they appear to be truly existent. If we examine the atoms of external appearances, they are natureless. No grasped objects are perceived. Inner fixation is a partless instant beyond any identifiable essence, and so no mind of fixations is perceived. Non-dual and free from complexity, this is beyond expressor and expressed. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Kashyapa, what is this world-transcending medicine? It is exertion that completely seeks out mind. Completely seeking out mind is like this: What is this mind that becomes passionate, aggressive, and ignorant? How does it arise in the past, future, or present. Past mind has ceased and is exhausted. Future mind has not yet arisen. That which is presently arising has no support or duration.

Kashyapa, mind does not exist internally, nor does it exist externally, nor between the two, nor is it perceived as something without these two.

Kashyapa, as for mind, there is no scrutiny, no showing, no appearance, no understanding, no existence.

Kashyapa, even by the buddhas, mind has never been seen, and never will be seen.

Kashyapa, if mind is sought everywhere, it is not to be found. That which is not to be found, is not to be perceived anywhere. That which is not to be perceived, will not be in the past. It will not be in the future. It will not arise in the present. It will not be something which has passed away or something which is to come. Nor is it something that is arising now. It completely transcends the three times.

Also:

Like mind, all dharmas too are not to be perceived, and therefore they do not exist at all.

The Sutra Requested by Maitreya says:

Mind has no shape. It has no color. It has no existence. It is like space.

The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Those who wish to enter this sphere of realization of the Victorious One should abandon all wishes, like space. They should abandon grasping of concepts, thoughts, and perceptions. They should enter into this mind like space.

The Mula-madhyamaka-karikas says:

It excludes the expressible

And experience of mind.
Unborn and also unceasing,
With a nature like that of nirvana.

The All-Creating King says:

It is not a thing whose characteristics are shown.
It is apart from objects perceivable by sight.
It is unknowable by any verbal expression.
This, the essence that does not arise from any cause,
Is free from all the superimpositions of conception.

If one wishes truly to realize what is the meaning of this,
By example, it is eternal like the sky.
The meaning is the unborn, the space of dharmata.
Its sign is being the unobstructed nature of mind.

Dharmata, itself is like the space of the sky.
It is symbolized by the example of being like the sky.

5. The examples of naturelessness

These appearances of what does not exist, though, like an illusion, they appear to arise and so forth:

From the time they appear, their birth and such are natureless,
Like water in a mirage, or the moon's form in a pond.

Like the moon in water or the water in a mirage, from the very time they appear to arise, they should be realized to be unborn and so forth. The Secret Essence says:

E Ma Ho! Wondrous marvelous dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
From the unborn is born all that there is.
Yet all this from its birth is birthlessness.

E Ma Ho! Wondrous marvelous dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
From the unceasing comes everything that ceases.
Yet in cessation this is ceaselessness.

E Ma Ho! Wondrous marvelous dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
From the non-enduring comes everything that endures.
Yet the time of enduring itself does not endure.

E Ma Ho! Wondrous marvelous dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
From the inconceivable comes all that is conceived,
Yet conception itself is inconceivable.

E Ma Ho! Wondrous marvelous dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
Though from what does not come or go there is coming and going,
The nature of coming and going never comes or goes.

The Dohakosha says:

As various rivers are all one in the ocean,
Many false things are overcome by one truth.
By the appearance of the single sun,
Many darknesses are overcome.

Though clouds receiving water from the ocean
May spread until they cover all the earth,
If we are inside them, they are like pure space,
There is no increase and there is no decrease.

The Buddha's perfection is completely fulfilled.
Co-emergence is the single nature.
As that all sentient beings arise and cease.
Within it there are neither things or non-things.

As narrow waters become one in the ocean, what appears to be born is one within the unborn. As many darknesses are overcome by the single lamp of the sun, by knowing the single unborn, all confused appearances are also known as the unborn.

When clouds arise and cover the earth, within them there is nothing solid that is great or small or increases and decreases; just so, arising from unborn dharmata, the dharmin appears to arise and cease, but within the unborn nothing increases and decreases. Though within the naturally pure nature of mind, all beings are confused by attachment and grasping, their nature has never moved from the nature of mind. This is because mind itself is the primordially pure nature of things.

The Commentary Ascertaining the Intention says:

Subhuti said, formerly when the Lord and I were in a forest, a monk was also there. By perceiving various signs, we verified this. Some said that was by perceived by the skandhas. Some by the ayatanas. Some by the dhatus. Some by interdependent arising and the objects of mindfulness. I said, since the marks of one such dharma are known to be egoless, they cannot but all be like that.

C. What is to be abandoned

Thus of these dharmas appearing while they do not exist, which are primordially natureless:

in particular this appearance of the beings of the six lokas
Is an appearance of things that are not really there.
These are the forms of confusion, that come from habitual patterns.
As those whose eyes are filmed see hairs before the eyes,
And, if they want to be cured, must treat the imbalanced phlegm,
Those who want to purify confused appearance
Have to take the cure for the film of ignorance.

Those whose sight is obscured by a disorder of the phlegm treat the phlegm, when it appears that hairs are drifting before their eyes and so forth. Similarly sentient beings, are obscured by habitual patterns of grasping "me" and "mine" from beginningless time, and by the film of ignorance. Though they really exist as mind itself, the luminous nature of buddhahood, not only do they not see that, but they experience external stones, rocks, and mountains, and internal attachments and thoughts of the kleshas and suchlike, like hairs in the eyes. From the time these appear they do not exist at all. They are merely seductions for fools. The Prasannapada says:

Because we follow the errors of ignorance, the world thinks complete absence of nature has a nature. Those who have filmed eyes are attached to the nature of natureless hairs in the eyes and so forth, by the condition of having filmed eyes; similarly fools whose eyes of intellect are corrupted by the film of ignorance become attached to the natureless phenomena of things as having a nature.

The Lankavatara Sutra says:

Just as those with filmed eyes,
Wrongly grasp hairs in the eyes,
So these conceptualized things,
Are the false constructions of fools.

The noble ones who actually see naturelessness, realize only the purity and essencelessness that accord with the essential nature. The Prasannapada says:

When, those with the eye of undefiled prajna, free from the film of ignorance, use that vision; then just as those who are free from filmed eyes do not see the hairs before the eyes perceived by those who have filmed eyes, the noble ones, who do not see according to the constructions of foolish people's minds, do not see these natures of things.

Also:

Because the deceptive dharmin beguiles fools, appearance is erroneous, like the seeming circle made by a whirling torch. On the level of no nature, all conditioned things are false, because they are the deceptive dharmin, like the water in a mirage. Whatever is true, like nirvana, is not the deceptive dharmin. Therefore by the reasoning of the teachings and these scriptures, things are established as natureless.

D. Abandoning.

1. How to train in the middle way free from extremes

Here is what is said about those who wish to remove the film of this ignorance:

By insight-wisdom, which is the antidote for this,
Emptiness passes the pass of samsaric habitual patterns.
When we gain the conviction that emptiness appears,
The two truths are known as non-dual appearance-emptiness.
Madhyamaka training cures dwelling within the two extremes. The extreme of existence as well as that of non-existence.
Dwelling neither in samsara or in nirvana,
We will be liberated in the space of the sky.
This is the very essence of the true meaning itself,
The natural state, the nature of the great perfection.

True prajna is one's intrinsic personal wisdom. If by that the nature of dharmas is viewed; all karma, kleshas, habitual patterns, and so forth, confusions of things that appear while they do not exist, are liberated into the emptiness which one has entered. The Mula-madhyamak-akarikas says:

Kleshas, karma and all
The doer and the fruitions,
Are like a gandharva castle,
Like an illusion or dream.

The Sutra of the Complete Purification of All Karmas says:

That karma should be viewed as being by nature essenceless emptiness.

It is also empty, because it arises from conditions, *The Sutra Requested by Ma Dröpa*⁴²⁹ says:

What rises from conditions does not arise.
It does not have the nature of arising.
What depends on conditions is called empty.
To know it as emptiness is being heedful

Appearance/emptiness is emptiness merely of true existence. The Shri Prajnaparamita-samgatha says:

Form is emptiness. Emptiness is form. Emptiness is not other than form. Form is not other than emptiness.

The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

That, the nature of form
Is likewise emptiness.
Emptiness is form,
The primordially unborn.

Also:

The nature of passion and aggression is emptiness.
Ignorance and pride are completely produced by conceptions.
Yet these thoughts have not arisen and do not rise.
If we know that, we are among the leaders of beings.

The Sutra of All Dharmas Being Without Arising says:

Passion is not perceived and neither is aggression.
Within this, ignorance also will never be perceived.
All the dharmas are like an unbroken expanse of space.
Whoever knows this is an enlightened victorious one.

Divine and non-divine are one in the single nature.
Likewise equal and different are equality.
Because there is no Buddha, there are no Dharma and sangha.
Whoever has knowledge of that becomes a capable one.

The nature of sentient beings is taught to be buddhahood.
The nature of buddhahood is taught to be sentient beings.
Sentient beings and buddhahood are not two different things.
Whoever has knowledge of that becomes an excellent being.

As for relative and absolute being non-dual, truth is inseparable. By training in the suchness of the middle way, the thingless essence of primordial purity, one will transcend suffering and be liberated from eternalism and nihilism, and samsara and nirvana. This suchness is the great perfection beyond being produced or sought. The All-Creating King says:

All the vessel and essence of the phenomenal world,
Buddhas and beings, arise from the essence, enlightenment.
Therefore pass the pass to primordial non-duality.

The Embodiment of the Intention says:

E ma ho, wondrous marvelous Dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
It is uncontrived, unstained, and unfabricated.
The nature of suchness is completely pure.

E ma ho, wondrous marvelous Dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
As for the groundless, rootless nature of mind,
This is the root of all the various dharmas.

E ma ho, wondrous marvelous Dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
The naturelessness that is the nature of things,
Is the spontaneous presence of mahasukha.

E ma ho, wondrous marvelous Dharma.
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
It is not empty, and it is not non-empty.
Nor is it conceived to be a middle way.

2. Cutting the root of mind:

In reality appearance does neither good nor harm,
But if we have attachment, we are bound within samsara.
We need not analyze the variety of appearance;
We only need to cut the root of grasping mind.

Appearance does not bind. If we are not attached to external assertion and denial, we will not be obscured with internal attachment. This is because no connections will be established. Since it is attachment that binds, as for abandoning attachment, the Dohakosha says:

Where there is attachment, that is what is seen.
If there is realization, everything is that.
No one knows anything that is other than that.
That which has been read, and grasped in meditation,
Is also said to be the very heart of the treatises.

When external conceptualizations of apparent form, sound, smell, taste, and touch are analyzed they are natureless. When there is attachment to what is impure and so forth, even if it is renounced, the one who is attached will not be liberated, because the root of grasping is not cut. If one throws a stone at a dog, not understanding who hit it with the stone, the dog attacks the now-inert stone. Such practice of Dharma, will not liberate from the kleshas. When someone throws a stone at a lion, it kills the thrower. Just so, one's own mind, the root of the kleshas of passion and aggression, will be pacified by the examining prajna of naturelessness. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Kashyapa, the single cause of the external many is to be sought within.
Kashyapa, in future time proud monks will arise who are like a dog chasing a stone. Kashyapa, how are they like a dog chasing a stone? The dog, frightened by that stone, chases after that stone, but not the one who threw it.

Kashyapa, thus some monks and brahmins try to separate themselves from inner form, sound, smell, taste, and touchables. They conceive dharmas as impermanent, deceptive, and destructible; but since they do not know where they came from, if they go among villages, cities, towns, districts, regions, and kings' palaces and retinues, they are still harmed by form, sound, smell, taste and touchables.

If these live in monasteries, at the time of death those who dwell in worldly discipline will be born in the celestial worlds. There too they are harmed by the five desirable qualities. When they have died and departed, they will not be liberated from the lower realms.

What are these realms? Those of hell beings, animals, the world of the lord of death, and that of the asuras.

Kashyapa, such a monk is like the dog chasing the stone. For example, though the dog is frightened by the stone, it does not chase the one who threw it but chases the stone. Similarly some monks and brahmins, frightened by form and so forth, live in monasteries. Though they live in monasteries, if they see the objects of form and so on, they do not know how to keep their inner equanimity.

What arises from that fault? From not knowing, they will live in villages again. There they will again be harmed by form and so on. Even if they experience the enjoyments of the gods, having died and transmigrated from these temporary divine and human births, they will fall into the lower realms. These fools will suffer death and transmigration. They will have a hundred such sufferings. The tathagata has taught that they are like the dog who chases the stone.

Kashyapa, yogachara monks of times to come will not be like the dog who chases the stone. For example, if people throw a stone at a lion, it knows where the stones came from. It will chase not the stones, but those who threw the stones, so that this will not happen again.

Likewise yogachara monks who have seen desirable qualities, knowing that they have arisen from mind, knowing by examining their minds that these things do not exist, will be liberated. As the lion eats the one who threw the stone, these yogachara monks, when they see external desirable qualities, know that they have arisen from mind, and know the nature of mind to be emptiness. Therefore they liberate it into union with the natural state.

Kashyapa, for example, it is like this. Those skilled in dressage make horses move here and there as they like, Untrained people cannot do that.

Kashyapa, the yogachara monk too, enters whatever mental contents are seen to arise and fully experiences them. He has no question about where they come from, and thus completely controls the mind:

As a skilled trainer of horses,
Trains horses to be motionless
Yogacharins see becoming
And remove the conflicts of mind

Kashyapa, for example it is like this, a secret divine yantra of illness makes life cease. Kashyapa, similarly since all who view conceptually grasp an ego, the power of life of the Dharma is made to cease:

Just as a yantra harms life
And will not bestow any happiness;
Going into the view of ego,
Will destroy the life of Dharma.

Kashyapa, it is like this, for example, with whatever persons are bound, from that they need to be liberated. Kashyapa, similarly the mind of the yogacharin, for whatever it has desire, from that it should be liberated:

From whatever binds any persons,
From that they should be freed.
So from obscuring desires
Yogacharins should be freed.

That is the secret of mind. The Bodhicaryavatara says:

Whoever has no knowledge of this secret of mind,
These will uselessly wander without any aim or meaning.

3. The mind arising as the six lokas is unreal

Arising as the objects of the six lokas

Within the appearance of mind there is no nature at all.
It is not found by seeking. By looking it is not seen.
It has no shape or color. No essence is there to grasp.
Nothing is either within the mind or outside of it.
Nowhere does it rise or cease throughout the three times.
There are no parts and divisions; no things; no ground or root.
There is nothing to characterize by saying, "It is this."
Mind is beyond the objects of conceptual thought.

If mind is viewed by mind, knowing that no nature at all is identified is knowing the suchness of the natural state. The Dohakosha says:

The root of mind is markless.
By triple co-emergence
Where it arises it subsides,
There is nowhere it endures.

Also:

The true⁴³⁰ mind knows no opposite.
Where it arises it sets.
Its outside is within.

Also:

Within the primordially purity
Of the nature of space,
By always looking and looking,
Seeing will be obstructed.

This is beyond conception, thought, and all complexity. The Noble Sutra of The Source of the Three Jewels says:

There is nowhere dharmas are born
And nowhere they arise.
No dying and transmigration,
Nor any becoming joyful.

As the lion of men
Has taught all this completely,
Hundreds of sentient beings
have been established in it.

It has no essence anywhere,
There is nothing else,
No one has ever found it.
It is not within.

External things as well
Are nowhere to be found.
These teachings were presented
By the Lord Buddha himself.

Though the sugatas have taught
The way of peace to beings,
There is no actual being

Who is ever going to find it.

These completely teach
The liberation of beings.
Having been liberated,
They liberate many beings.

Because all dharmas are taught
To be without a self,
Sentient beings are freed
From this universe of grasping.

One is liberated from going⁴³¹
And by liberation from going
One goes to somewhere matchless.

The great Sage has attained
The other shore of samsara.
Anywhere else to go
Is never found at all.

Elsewhere does not exist,
Any more than coming back.
And yet "I have gone elsewhere,"
Is what is taught in words.

One who speaks these words
Also does not exist.
Neither the one who spoke them
Or the words themselves exist.

One to whom they are spoken
Also will not be found.
One who knows them also
Is nowhere to be seen.

Because of wrong conception
By the power of desire,
All these beings here
Are simply wandering.

Whatever being understands
The Dharma of perfect peace,
Sees the self-arising
Of the Tathagata.

Peaceful ones completely
Know the highest dharma.

Regarding its being groundless and rootless the Secret Essence says:

As for the groundless, rootless nature of mind,
It is not male or female, nor is it neuter.
It is not markless, and has no pedigree.
It has no color, and it has no shape.
It is not existent or anything.

4. Mind is uncreated or unfabricated

Without the increase and decrease of the three times, though it appears to arise continually, it is natureless. From the time it arises as the six lokas, past mind:

It is seen neither in the past nor in the future.
It does not enter the present, remaining where it is.
Not using mind to look for mind, just let it be.

The past is gone. The future is not yet here. Present mind has no arising, duration, nor cessation. Unestablished for even an instant, neither viewed nor viewer exist. They are put to rest by themselves. The All-Creating King says:

Since mind is not a thing that can be viewed by mind,
By looking it is not seen. Let it rest in suchness.

5. Mind as instantaneous

Thus from the very time of emanation:

Objects of conceptual mind are instantaneous,
Assertions and denials of mere recalled cognition.
There are no in and out from the time that objects appear.
What is sought is produced by the seeker, so it is taught.
So if one seeks oneself, one never will be found.

Whatever conceptions of mind have arisen, if they are searched for, they will not be found, since they are the seeker. By looking for oneself one will not find it, since it is non-dual. If examined, oneself is non-existent, and so whatever it perceives is completely pacified. The All-Creating King says:

Intrinsically existing, motionless self-existence,
Naturally existing, uncreated by anyone;
This uncreated existence of suchness as it is,
Is taught to be supreme, the uncreated action.

Also:

By looking at one as two, one's meditation errs.
A single nature cannot be established as two.

6. Because it is primordially pure, it is without birth and cessation:

This is the natural state, eternally unborn.
The non-dwelling nature of mind, unobstructed and unceasing,
Groundless, rootless empty pervasion of the three times.
Ground of the ceaseless appearance of variety
With neither things or qualities, how can it be eternal?
Ceaselessly self-arising, how can it be nothing?
Neither dual nor non-dual, it is inexpressible.
Since here there is no existence, there is no recognition.
Its nature should be known to be primordial purity.

Because the naturally pure nature of mind is groundless and rootless, it is said to be empty. Since its arising is completely ceaseless, it is said to be appearance. Since if examined it has no things or characteristics, it is free from the extreme of eternalism. Since, as mere apprehension, it is ceaseless, it is free from the extreme of nihilism. Since there is no other third class which would be both or neither, it cannot be identified as "this." Except by mere expressions like "Naturally pure" it is inexpressible. It is wisdom unobscured by extremes. Saraha says:

As for spotless wisdom, unobscured by extremes,
Free from actions, it is not accretion of karma.
At any time it is changeless, therefore it is eternal

The net of wrong conceptions is nothing. Though it is divided into enlightened and other aspects the Embodiment of the Intention says:

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
The truly eternal is eternity.
This great eternal has no antidote.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
What is truly nothing is nothingness.
Enlightenment cuts the stream of what is wrong.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
Except for the universal and limitless,
Perfect buddhahood will not be found.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
Mind itself is perfect buddhahood.
No other sort of buddhahood exists.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
The three worlds have primordially been the essence,
Unfabricated, unerring, and self-existing.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
The nature is this self-existing space.
The perfect Buddha does not need to be sought.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
State of goodness of all and everything;
Eternal-pervasion, wondrous to be told.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
Apart from this essence of enlightenment,
No non-realization exists at all.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
Everything is the Buddha and within it
There can be no obscuration by concept.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
Since thought itself is the purity of non-thought,
There is nothing other than sugatagarbha.

E ma ho, wondrous, marvelous dharma!
This is the secret of all the perfected buddhas.
Within the primordial essence of the buddhas
Realization is a spontaneous presence.

7. Be completely without accepting and rejecting, because this nature of mind is destroyed by understanding it:

If it should be examined, it seems to be non-existent.
But if it is not examined, it always will be there.
Within this primordial essence whose nature is non-duality,
There is no conception of accepting or rejecting.
There is no good and evil; there is no hope and fear.
How could this exist by examining and analysis?
Shun the inconstant crowd of the mind of three times.

If with many analyses and examinations one examines the mind, it seems that it does not exist. When it is unexamined, it does not exist either. Therefore it is natureless. Without accepting, rejecting, hope and fear, be at ease like a destitute haughty bhramin elephant. As for the instruction of being naturally in that state of non-aggression without view, thought, examination, memory, and wish, Saraha says:

If the haughty elephant enters accumulations of mind,
If it cuts off coming and going it will be at leisure.
If it is realized like that, there is no place for defilement.
Shameless skillful ones will never realize that.

Also:

By letting loose the elephant of mind,
All the stains of ego all are destroyed.
Like paintings in space, or drinking rippling water,
Let the borders be just as they are.

The object elephant's powers having been grasped by the hand,
That will kill it and how will it be autonomous.
The yogin is someone like an elephant-guard...

E. the doctrine is not realized by words,

There are four sections.

1. it will not be realized by those who manifest pride.

Now there is the teaching that those who evaluate the Dharma merely verbally, will not realize its meaning as it truly is. Keeping track of whether the reason applies to the subject, the forward and reverse pervasions, and what kinds of things agree or do not agree with the reason, we are moved by individual conceptions and kindle erroneous kleshas, so that a bonfire of many sufferings blazes up. Skillful at burning away the true being of oneself and others, such beings manifest pride like a mountain,

The mind of relationship with complexities and concepts.
Is moved, as if by an always blowing blasting wind.
Though a mind like this will have no realization,
Bodhicitta not coming or going, taking or leaving,
Is the all-creating essence of undefiled wisdom,
By resting in that way, that is how it is seen.

Regarding this, the essence or intrinsic nature, the Lankavatara Sutra says:

Sophistic fools examine
What is like a corpse.

Conceptual examination spreads a thousand great nets of complexities that have nothing to do with Dharma. Dharma and the natural state of mind are primordially pure, with nothing that needs to be established or cleared away. Here the Precious Sky Sutra and The Tantra of Oral Instruction accord with the Abhisamayalankara and the Uttaratantra of Maitreya: 39

There is nothing to clear away,
And nothing to be established.
Reality views reality.
To see that is liberation

Enlightenment, bodhi, in Tibetan is jangchub. Eternally undefiled, it is pure, jang. With qualities eternally complete, it is perfect, chub. Arising ceaselessly without obstruction, it is called, jangchub sem, the mind, sem, citta, of enlightenment, bodhicitta. As for the teaching that trikaya is primordially self-existing, the All-creating King says:

The meaning of jang is this: The essence bodhicitta
Is self arising, primordial, and completely pure,
Everything that is done by the doer of all, the King,
Is completely pure in the state of Samantabhadra,
That is the explanation of the meaning of jang.

chub is like this: The essence is self-arising wisdom.
Appearance and existence, within the vessel and essence,
The buddhas of the three times and beings of the three realms⁴³²
As suchness everything, is perfect everywhere,
As all-pervading perfection chub should be explained.

sem is like this: The essence is self-arising wisdom.
By that the vessel and essence of the phenomenal world
Is entered, empowered, and thereby rendered luminous.
That is the explanation of the meaning of sem.

Since all dharmas are naturally non-dual and pure, if we see essential naturelessness, we know how things are. When we realize that the nature of mind has no coming and going, kleshas neither arise nor cease. There are neither abandoning or antidotes. The kleshas are pure as they are. The Song of the Oral Instructions of the Inexhaustible Treasury says:

How could either kleshas or antidotes be produced?
People who work on them bind themselves in samsara.

Being liberated by seeing the pith, does not depend on abandoning any objects. By knowing the nature of the objects in a dream and the one who grasps them, they are self-liberated. Though others would like to be liberated after abandoning objects, the mere appearance of objects and mind does not bind. However, anyone attached to them is grasped by bondage. As for the instruction to abandon attachment, Tilopa says:

Appearance does not bind, attachment binds.
Therefore cut attachment, Naropa.

The Dohakosha says:

Thinking, "that is pleasant,"
The mind of equanimity

That cherishes such irritation
Falls away from the essence.

Even a little bit
The size of a sesame-hull
Produces forever after Nothing but suffering.

Mere appearance without assertion and denial does not produce attachment. From merely realizing the unborn essence of mind, the mind will never produce conceptual apprehension. Though conceptual apprehension is produced, it is not outside of the previous essence, and there is no belief in and be attachment to complexities. The All-Creating King says:

In the uncreated nature which is like the sky,
How can there be examination and analysis?

The Dharmaraja Sutra says:

When someone is struck with a poisoned arrow, if this is quickly pulled out, that person will be saved. Otherwise, while that person is thinking, "this arose from the feathers, or this arose from the shaft or this arose from the point," the malady will spread, and that person will die.

Similarly, as we examine and analyze many reasons, with the power of the mental conception, kleshas arise and proliferate. Therefore, the mind should rest in complete non-thought.

The theories of arrogant people who conceptualize the meaning in mere words have little grasp of the way things are. By such knowing who will be satisfied? Whoever deteriorates because of not knowing, will dispute the dharma and believe in complexities, they will be far from suchness. The Dohakosha says:

That beings without remainder are excellent is refuted
Just by the fault of pride that cannot be their character.

Also:

Kye Ho! listen to me my son,
The corpse of argument by joy knows true abiding
Because of the explanations and productions of sentient beings,
And so on, and so on and so on it cannot be realized.

The Commentary Ascertaining the Intention says:

The bodhisattva Arya Dharma said, "When I reached the buddha field called "Arrogance" of the tathagata Vast Glory, many kinds of extremists thought up all kind of useless philosophies. They pondered them. They thought about them. They investigated them. Not having realized the true meaning, these sophists argued with each other. They abused. They reviled. Having seen that their philosophies were annihilated they said, "Kye ma! When the absolute of the tathagatas is taught to be truly beyond all conceptions, we think that is right!.

The Buddha said, Arya Dharma, now, by really being beyond all concepts, I have become enlightened. Having become enlightened, I have described it. I have clarified it. I have explained that the absolute is individually and personally apprehended by the noble ones.

What is apprehended by individual beings is the sphere of concepts. Conceptions are the realm of philosophy. The absolute is inexpressible. Reasoning increases contention. The absolute pacifies contention. Truth cannot be examined, inferred, or pondered by reasoning. The markless realization of individual and personal awareness, is inexpressible. Therefore it annihilates conventionalities. The absolute Dharma is free from contention. It is beyond the sphere of conceptuality.

The Sutra Encouraging The Excellent Wish says:

Manjushri, those who by having heard much, are self infatuated and haughty, are separated from a true and proper attitude, and the continuum of their minds becomes unruly. Separate from shamatha and vipashyana, they are far from the utter profundity of the Buddhadharma.

Knowing only verbally, such people never accomplish anything very beneficial. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Just as a deaf musician,
Brings rejoicing to others
But cannot enjoy his own music
Such is dharma without meditation

A ferryman on a river
Helping others to cross over,
Just staying there till he dies,
Such is dharma without meditation

As the taste of molasses,
Is not known from mere description
Likewise the taste of emptiness,
Must be tasted in meditation.

Seeking the meaning verbally, devoting oneself only to examination and analysis, is not a cause of true wisdom. The Dohakosha says:

Not drinking the amrita
Of the guru's oral instructions,
Whose coolness satisfies
The torments of the mind,

In the desert of treatises,
In that desiccated plain,
Tormented by thirst
One will only die.

The holy guru exemplifying the meaning of profound dharmata is what will satisfy. Also:

For those who have a wish for rootless suchness
The guru's oral instructions are enough.

In entering the profound essential meaning, do not hope for enlightenment from merely verbal doctrines of Dharma or mere logical lumping together and hair-splitting. Of these two kinds of philosophical conceptions, conceptions of real borders and dividing points are attached to the true existence of individual beings. When words designating these are postulated according to the mind, there are disputes about the classes of what agrees and does not agree with them.

Having become arrogant about such generalities about knowables, their individual ideas about things and non-things and so forth, people make up a heap of distinctions, about the ground, form, and so on. Since none of these external natures could be established, their minds evaluate things in terms of superimpositions.

Within groundless confused appearance, such doctrines, and their bases of distinction, are nothing but obscuring false conceptions. Don't do this. The commentary on the Sixty Stanzas on Reasoning says:

Not only are you bound by the beginningless, universal bondage of the kleshas, but now by bad doctrines you are adding more bonds, like silk worms winding themselves up in their own spittle.

The nature like the sky should be realized to have an essence without divisions. the All-Creating King says:

All of the dharmas exist as examples of bodhicitta.
All are examples of that essence like the sky.
What is being described is the meaning of bodhicitta.

As for the instruction of defilement by mind-made meditation

Therefore as for the phenomena of incidental obscurations or natural obscurations, there are these incidental verses:

Within the purity of the spotless nature of mind,
Artificial defilements never will be seen.
Here why should we speak of development and perfection?
In meditative purity, defilements are exhausted.

By looking for complexities of developing and perfecting within the primordial spontaneous presence of the nature, the essence without accepting and rejecting will not be seen. Pass the pass into the self-completed great perfection. The All-Creating King says:

For students who rejoice in counting characteristics,
Counting mantras is taught and developing mandalas,
For whoever has placed their hopes upon the path of trikaya.
Those who produce understanding by means of heaping up concepts,
For the length of time of a hundred million kalpas
Will never realize the sense of the undeveloped mandala.

Kye! for me the teacher, the King, the doer of all,
By accumulations and mandala being self-perfected,
The nature of Dharmata does not need to be created.
As the nature with neither wish nor development,
Know The mandala of the King, the doer of all.

Similarly within the nature there are also no path, meditation, and so forth. The same text says:

As for bodhicitta, it is like the sky.
Within this nature of dharmas and mind which is like the sky,
There is no view or meditation, and also no guarding samaya.

Buddha activity is effortless; wisdom unobscured.
There is no training in the bhumis, and there is no treading the path.
There are no subtle dharmas and no non-dual relationship.

For mind there are no precepts, and nothing to be resolved.
Since this is beyond both exaggeration and denigration,
There is no passing the pass into reality.
This is bodhicitta, the view of the great perfection.

The Dohakosha says:

Free from meditation, what is there to wish for?
How will that which is inexpressible be explained?
By the mudra of samsara all beings have been seduced.
Who has not defiled the nature of things as they are?

Continuity has no mantra, no goal or meditation.
All these are causes of confusing one's own mind.
Mind's natural purity is unstained by meditation.
Its nature exists as bliss, so do not produce any torment.

The All-Creating King says:

That which is primordial undistracted, and unlost
Is completely undistracted by the tether of samadhi.

But undistracted samadhi can be the deceiver hope,
Within the provisional teachings of the mahayana,
When it has been presented in terms of cause and effect.

That which is primordial, undistracted, and unlost
Is the naturally resting nature, apart from cause and effect.
This is the antidote to establishment and effort.

F. Passing the pass

There are four sections.

1. Passing the pass into the nature as limitless as space,

As for passing the path into the single nature, as limitless as space:

Within the primordial purity of the nature of mind,
Without abandoning, antidotes, separation or attainment,
Objects of meditation are superfluous.
Without outer grasping or inner fixation abandon clinging.
Without any grasping of "this," let us cut through attachment.
Without success or failure, abandon hope and fear.

Within the primordially enlightened nature of mind, there is now⁴³³ nothing to purify, so attachments of accepting and rejecting are unnecessary. The All-Creating King says:

Kye mahasattva,
If one wishes to establish one's own mind,
Since it is established by being without desire,
One should rest in the equanimity of non-thought.
Naturally rest in the realm that neither accepts or rejects.
Naturally rest in the state that is naturally motionless.

Since inner and outer grasping and fixation do not exist at all, do not cling. The same text says:

Without any inside or outside, this is dharmadhatu.
The aspect that is deep has no conceptual objects.

Since within unity there is nothing to call, "this," destroy the coils of attachment. The same text says:

As for mind, the nature of it is suchness.
Therefore all the dharmas are established as suchness.
Do not fabricate anything in that nature of suchness.

Also it says that there are neither success nor failure:

There is nothing to succeed at or fail in producing.
Do not be caught within the trap of hope and fear.

2. Passing the pass into the unity of the sky at the very moment of realization:

In insight which is fundamentally without change,
How can the different conditioned phenomena ever arise?
That very arising is liberation from the beginning.
Dharmakaya is one, like water and its waves.

Within the changelessness of one's own mind, whatever instantaneous phenomena of joy and sorrow and happiness and suffering and so forth may arise are ungraspable. They liberate themselves with no need of other antidotes. As for instant self-liberation without before or after, the All-Creating King says:

Liberation is self-liberation. There is no other kind.

Also the Song of the Oral Instructions of the Inexhaustible Treasury says:

That liberated instant is known as dharmakaya.
"There is another liberation by great bliss."
Though this is said by fools, it is water in a mirage.

Also:

As much as there is emanation from mind,
Just that much the nature of the lord Buddha,
Is otherness like water and its waves.

Such experience arises as we pass the pass into freedom from viewed and viewer.

3. The conceptual mind of assertion and denial disappears:

When anything is viewed, the viewer's essence is lost.
Objects and the directions, when sought will not be found.
The seeker too is not perceived in simplicity.
Without an object of action, the actor does not exist.

Viewing this arising, when we try to reject the watcher and leave things as they are, while we look for something to reject, not only are there no directions, places, and objects; but the borderless, all-encompassing seeker is not perceivable either. There is no trace of anything to affirm or deny, no reference points at all. As for the support, mind, being like space, the All-Creating King says:

Not existing, not realized, no vision of anything,
Naturally existing equanimity of non-thought.
As it is eternal, no mind of effort arises.
Mahasukha abides as the essence of all dharmas.

That is how it is encountered.

4. In encountering the ground, there is nothing to be viewed.

At that time, realization of the indivisible space of the nature of mind is spontaneously present, and so as to what it is like when the self-existing throne of dharmakaya is attained, taking as an example the autumn sky:

Reach the primordial state that is spotless like the sky.
Without its opposite, resting, how can anything go?
When exhaustion has been reached, there also is no coming.
Nobody looks at nothing, so where could we ever be?

That is a display of vajra song of realization without center or limit. What arises is liberated into space like a dispersing cloud. This is the realization arising at that time. By mixing primordial space, the nature of mind, and its self-arising, self-liberated wisdom, the nature of mind is irreversible from the natural state. We reach the level of the exhaustion of dharmas. This is liberation from the defile of knowledge of assertion and denial, that grasps things and characteristics. We reach the stream of dharmata without coming and going. No one goes and there is no place to go. Yogins who reach such a state transcend the objects of confusion. They do not enter the city of samsara. They reach the ground like the sky. The nature of their minds encounters space. The three gates are effortlessly liberated, like clouds disappearing into space, purified into the primordial ground of fixated conceptualization. They see what they are. This is the time when they ascertain the meaning which those of lesser fortune will not see, even if it is explained to them. The All-Creating King says:

Mahasukha dharmakaya is perfect within the mind,
Let it pervade without the three times' before and after.

The Dohakosha says:

Kye lord sirs and madams now look here.
I have realized nothing but this itself.
Before a being whose karma is exhausted
Gain conviction about the nature of mind.

The time of encountering it is like that.

G. The conviction of realization

If this is known, we have a need for nothing else.
Buddhas are nothing now, just as confused as we are.
There are no questions. Rootless mind is gone.
No reference points, no grasping "This," and nothing certain.
Relaxed and even, letting go into unity.
Having realized this, here is the song that is sung.
By the rising of Drime Ozer⁴³⁴ it goes forth from the teaching.

All doubts about the natural state are resolved. This is the time of no further aspirations. Other liberated yogins, have the same realization we do. So now, beyond this absence of doubts and questions, no one has anything to teach us. The Dohakosha says:

Before, behind and in the ten directions,
Whatever may be seen is that itself.
Today like Lord Buddha I have cut through confusion
Now I have no questions for anyone.

That is what it is like.

The former well-ordered sequence of view, meditation, and action, depends on higher and lower stages like a flight of stairs. Its customary attitude regards yogins as higher and lower. Now the mind which asks questions about this is scattered, seeming to lose its ground and root. It finds no reference point at all. Whatever arises is ungraspable, as if one were drunk. Appearances are unrecognizable, as if one were a little child. Without any orderly plan of action, all at once everything is on the same level, naturally, alertly at ease. Without any reference point to lose, there is fundamental oneness beyond grasping. The phenomena of excellence arise within us. The Dohakosha says:

Realization is like a wish-fulfilling gem.
Its confusion-destroying power is very wonderful.

This is when that happens. What arises arises as dharmata. When we reach the ground of confusion, it turns out to be pure objectless wakefulness like the space of the sky. All karma and conditionality are liberated. The Dohakosha says:

Beings by karma are bound to the individual.
Once liberated from karma, they are free.
If one's own being is free, there will certainly be no other.
This is called the attainment of supreme nirvana.

This is when that occurs. Whatever is done is liberated into no reference point. By the arising of the power of non-fixation, one has neither bondage or liberation. The same text says:

If action and non-action are truly realized,
There is no bondage, nor is there any liberation.

By transmission of the realization of the guru, one is liberated. The same text says:

That which is the primordial nature of the unborn,
Today I have realized, as taught by the glorious guru.

Becoming god-like, one sings a song of the manifestation of the nature of mind, self-arising wisdom. This is the natural state, beyond existence or non-existence of the natural state. We realize of the pith of the great limitless impartiality. With the rising of the thousand-rayed spotless disk of the sun, the world of good fortune is made to appear. Luminous mind is displayed as the lotus pond called liberation. One should know, "I have gone to mahasukha, the level of Samantabhadra."

H. by the explanation of the primordial liberation of appearance and mind, how we pass the pass into the great perfection, encompassed and perfected as the great miracle.

There are three sections of closing and summary.

1. The first has six parts.

a. The teaching of the emptiness of apparent objects,

With instruction of appearance and mind as primordial liberation, we pass the pass into the nature of the great perfection:

KYE HO my friends, look at apparent objects.
They are all the unborn. They are empty and equal.
Even though various images rise within a mirror,
The surface of that mirror is really only one,

When reflections arise in a mirror, there is really nothing but the radiance of the one bright mirror-surface, but still these forms appear. So all the dharmas of samsara are nothing else than the nature, emptiness. The Sutra Requested by Jönpa says:

As in the disk of a mirror,
Faces may appear,
So unestablished dharmas
Ought to be known by Jōnpa.

b. The projecting mind is emptiness,

At the time of experiencing the naturelessness of all dharmas, as for appearances:

If we look at the mind that has projected this,
Mind is free from any affirming or denying.
Just as clouds in the sky arise and disappear,
The non-dual miracles of space are purity.
This is the spotless nature that is the primordial buddha.
This is uncreated self-existing dharmata.

Awareness, producing the view, is liberated from projecting objects. The phenomena of object-appearance are purified in non-fixation. When clouds fade away after arising in the sky, they go nowhere but space. Self-dissolving, they become invisible. As awareness is liberated from projecting objects, the three times go into the space of realization.

The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

Just as in space that has no clouds at all
Clouds make a sudden appearance everywhere,
And then as they vanish, with no clouds anywhere,
They make us think they went from whence they came,
All dharmas should be known to be like that.

All dharmas first arose from or in the space of the unborn. Now they remain there. In the end, they will be liberated back into it. Awareness of what arises too first arose from the empty nature of mind. In the present it remains there. Finally it will cease there. That is how it should be known. Such a nature is that of primordial buddhahood. The All-Creating King says:

As for the sky-like nature of the mind,
The essence of the primordial buddha, enlightenment,
It does not exist by effort and establishing.
Rest in that uncreated natural purity.

c. Body and mind are non-dual emptiness:

There is neither object or primordial purity.
There is no receiving and there is no letting go,
No bias or partiality, no negation or affirmation.
What appears has no true existence; what rises is emptiness.
All is equality, free from all reference points.

Apparent objects and fixation-producing awareness, appear while neither of them exists, as within a dream. They are known without accepting and rejecting, and affirmation and denial. The All-Creating King says:

That which is only one within the state of suchness,
Dharmata, appears as five kinds of separate objects.
The five desirables and undesirables then exist.
In single suchness, there is accepting and rejecting.

As these are appearances of self-arising wisdom,
They are not rightly rejected by its own agency.

What is produced by the wrong of rejection is samsara.

Whatever appears is empty of true existence, like the water in a mirage. When this is known, the reflection-like appearance of all dharmas should be abandoned. Then there is equality, essentially providing no reference point for the mind.

d. External objects are uncertain and mind has no reference points:

Objects are uncertain, appearing in various ways.
In the great impartiality, mind has no reference points.
So the nature of mahasandhi should be known.

Appearances are not ascertained as one particular thing, but seem to be a variety. The awareness that fixates them also has no reference points. Everything is liberated as the partless singularity of the great perfection. The Great Space says

Whatever appears is uncertain,
Mind too is impartial,
Having no reference points.
Unfabricated great space,
Manifests as the nature
Of the ultimate great perfection.

e. The reason for these

As for establishing the reason:

Within the world of dharmas of samsara and nirvana,
The dharmas of the past are equality without concept.
The dharmas of the future are unborn equality.
The dharmas of the present are non-dwelling equality.
The three times are timeless as equality with no ground.
All there is was always eternally complete.

As for the five fold equality:

1. Since all dharmas are equal, they should be known to be without accepting and rejecting, and good and bad.
2. These dharmas of the phenomenal world are equal in that once they are gone, they will not return.
3. Since the future ones have not arisen, they are equal in not existing anywhere.
4. In the present they are equal in that if the apprehension that identifies inner and outer essences is examined, none are found.
- 5 Yet equally when unexamined they appear. The Telling the Marks says:

Remain in realization that the three times are timelessness.

The three times are related by not being established in time, and since they are groundless they are equally empty.

Because everything is unborn they are also equal as prajnaparamita. Their duration and cessation similarly from the time they appear are equal in not being established as anything whatsoever. The Middle length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, since all dharmas are equality, the perfection of prajna too is equality.

The Sutra of Motionless Dharmata says:

All dharmas by nature are unborn. By essence they are unmoving. They are free from the extremes of action. They are beyond the objects of complexity. They are primordial equality.

f. The changeless nature of mind:

The phenomenal world that consists of samsara and nirvana
Is nothing but an image reflected in the mind.
The nature of that mind is the great space of dharmadhatu.
The nature of that space is changeless throughout the three times.
That changeless nature was nirvana from the start.
This fundamental enlightenment is Samantabhadra.

Whatever appears is a reflection of confused habitual patterns, arising as if in the surface of a mirror. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Mind is like a painter.
Mind produced the skandhas.
All the worlds there are
Are paintings of the mind.

The phenomenal world is the supported destructible inhabitants, sentient beings, within the destructible environment. By becoming familiar with the habitual patterns of confused mind, they appear to be non-existent from the time they arise like a dream. One gains that conviction about the confused appearances of apparent mind. One gains the conviction that appearance-fixating mind is empty like space. The Dohakosha says:

Mind should be grasped as being like the sky.
The nature of space should be grasped as being mind.

As for becoming convinced that space is changeless, the All-Creating King says:

Just as the space of the sky is changeless,
The space of the nature of mind is changeless.

What is changeless is the primordial peace of nirvana, the nature of Samantabhadra. The All-Creating King says:

This primordial purity, the unchanging nature of mind
Is the self-existing essence, the doer of all, enlightenment.

2. second section

There are five parts.

a. Inseparable appearance and emptiness are primordially the same

Therefore, all dharmas are primordially and universally included and perfected as the wondrously-arisen nature of the great perfection:

Inseparable and primordial appearance and emptiness.
Simplicity without perception of either one or many.
With neither bias or partiality, all is equal,
Equal appearance and emptiness; equal in truth or falsehood.
Existence is equal and non-existence is also equal.
This is equality transcending all extremes,
The single state of the space of primordial purity.

All dharmas are non-dual appearance/ emptiness beyond complexities of one and many, like space. There is nothing solid and definite to them. The All-Creating King says:

All dharmas have a nature like the sky.
As for the sky itself, it is natureless.
There is no example of the sky.
All these dharmas without the least exception,
Should be known to really be like that.

Really equality like space, appearances are equally like reflections in a mirror. They are equally emptiness, having no identity⁴³⁵ of their own. From the viewpoint of confused mind, they are equal in truly existing only in the sense of having causal power. For example, either form or a reflection can produce form-grasping awareness within the eye-consciousness. They are equally false. Their natureless state is confused appearance, like the hallucinations created by eating datura plants.⁴³⁶ They are equally existent, as emanations exhausted in their mere appearance. They are equally non-existent, since their nature is not established, like water in a mirage. They are equally beyond extremes, like pure space. They are primordially equal as the space of dharmata beyond division or clearing away, and without example. As for their being primordially empty, the Noble Sutra of the Clouds of the Three Jewels says:

Dharmas, primordial emptiness, not coming into being,
Have no going or staying, bereft of all existence.
There is never anything to their illusory nature.

Pure of everything, completely like the sky,
The Dharma of the Victorious One has so been taught.
If they were not exhausted, they would not be seen.

These dharmas, from the above, have no selves or being.
Even the Buddha's teachings cannot exhaust such dharmas.
The teachings were taught only after such things were believed eternal.
Within samsara nothing conventional will be found.
Things that formerly rose leave no marks at all.
Those of future time are also known like that.

They naturally consist of nothing but karma and action.
Both supreme and ordinary karmas rise.
Dharmas are eternal peace that is empty of nature.
They should also all be known as selflessness.

The Moon Lamp explains it the same way.

b. all mentally imputed labelings are empty of essence

All that the mind examines is empty of any essence.
Names are inflated myths of individual essence,
Supposedly to be found in this temporary world.
There is neither true nor false, no connection of body and mind
One does not cover the other. There are neither subject nor object.

The doctrines of the skandhas, ayatanas, and so forth are mere mental imputations. As mentally imputed dharmas do not exist, they are empty of essence. Nominal imputations have no reality internal or external. They are incidental and unestablished. The imputation, "This is a real specifically characterized phenomenon." exhausts itself as mere name and concept. Though imputed objects are maintained to be like a fire arising from kindling, like fire in a dream, the natures of these apparent forms of confused habitual patterns are not established. All appearances of the confused viewpoint of samsara are mere superimposed projections. In that sense, from the time such objects appear, they are equal in being only false.

However, if one analyzes apparent objects and the awareness that fixates them, there are neither truth or falsity. Object and perceiver are like space. There is neither related object nor relationship, and so relationship is not real. Nothing has nothing to do with anything. Not only does relationship not exist, but general and particular, though set forth by the mind, are not specifically characterized or identifiable phenomena. Therefore, general and particular are equally either non-imputed phenomena or if they are imputed phenomena, they neither increase or decrease.

So what if relationship and the fixated objects of grasping and fixation are shown by analysis not to exist? Then all the fixations of fools are confused. A small child does has no such superimposed doctrines and distinctions, but later becomes accustomed to projecting obscurations drawn from doctrines of bad learning. The Complete Ascertainment says:

Beings will become rigidified,
Not seeing how virtue is harmed.
Kye ma! Who dealt this mess?
Unbearable devils of doctrine?

The Middle Length Prajnaparamita says:

Subhuti, all dharmas are mere symbols, mere imputations. These mere symbols, mere imputations, are incidental. They are empty of essence.

c. Since mind does not emit anything, objects do not arise.

As for the example of the instruction of not fixating this non-relationship:

Just as various forms appear within a mirror,
Phenomenal objects rise in the space of sense awareness.
By grasping them we feel desire and aggression.
Then there is the confusion of the samsaric world.
Bring them all together, not projecting the mind.
No objective phenomena arise within the mind.
Being essenceless, they do not exist as two.

This short passage about the well-known example is added to make this easier to understand. When the reflection of a face appears in a mirror, does one's face eject the reflection so that they become two? Or does the reflection appear to be like the face, while not ejected out of the face? As for individual appearance in the faculties of the six senses, mind does not eject itself as an external object. Nor does the object appear within the phenomenal apprehension of sense awareness. The face does not eject itself and become the reflection or image; but the reflection is supposed to appear like it.

When phenomena arise the way they are grasped by mind is samsaric confusion. If these objects are analyzed, mind is not externally ejected, and the external phenomena allegedly apprehended do not shoot in and arise internally. As what they appear to be, they do not arise anywhere.

The mind of phenomenal arising too is not established externally, internally, or in between. Then fixation of phenomena does not exist. If phenomena are analyzed, they are essenceless. What arises is unestablished. Phenomena, object and perceiver are things could not possibly be established. The Mula-madhyamak-akarikas says:

Where are they supported? Where do they arise?
In brief such things cannot exist as what they are.
And since they cannot be something other than they are,
They are not nothingness, and they are not eternal.

d. Since object and mind are natureless, they are self-liberated.

Appearing like this:

Objects all are one because they are without an essence.
All theories are one because their objects cannot be grasped. Appearance and mind are not two, but one primordial purity.
There is no need for analysis or examination.
They are a single fundamental liberation,

As the various things in a dream occur within a single state of sleep, all apparent variety is one in naturelessness. Appearances seem to arise continually, but thoughts as one can apprehend no essence to them, like waves that are only a state of a single body of water. Just as obscured vision is one with the eye-awareness that grasps it, appearance and mind are one within non-dual dharmata. Requiring no examination or analysis at all, beyond examination and analysis, the nature of this pleasure garden in the sky is taught to be that of the sky itself. The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

Just as with perception of the ego
Train the mind with every kind of awareness.
The essence of all dharmas is emptiness.
They are completely pure like the space of the sky.

The All-Creating King says:

Thus, since all the dharmas of the phenomenal world
Are a unity within the unborn state,
No grasping and fixation are there to be perceived.
Beyond the reach of conceptions of either thought or speech
Their nature is a single space that is like the sky

e. If one realizes that what arises is self-liberated, that is sagacious:

Non-dual Samsara/ nirvana, is one within the mind:
A variety of rivers are one within the ocean.
All has the equal taste of single co-emergence.
The change of the four elements is one in the state of space,

One in freedom from mental negation or assertion,
One because whatever arises is liberated,
One in the purity of non-duality.
The play of waves is one with the water that is their substance.
Whoever realizes this can be said to be sagacious.

As rivers flowing from the four directions are one within the ocean, samsara and nirvana are one within the mind. The All-Creating King says:

Both the environment and the inhabitants,
Buddhas and sentient beings, all the phenomenal world
Were made by mind, and they are one within the mind.

Whatever changes there may be in the four elements, they do not depart from space. So whatever phenomenal experiences of the view, meditation, action, and fruition may arise are one within the co-emergent natural state. the Highest Peak says:

That which is co-emergent with the natural state
Is all of one taste with that, and it is one with that.

Assertions and negations that arise within the mind are one in being empty, because they have moved from the suchness of co-emergent wisdom. As waves are one with water, what arises is one with the unborn. The complexities of mind are one with the nature of mind. That nature is primordially without emanation and gathering. The Embodiment of Realization says:

Complexity has no complexity.

Discursive thoughts dissolve in the ground like water mixing with water. The Dohakosha says:

As when water is poured into water,
That water becomes of one taste;
Lord Buddha does not see
Minds having faults and virtues.

The lord Buddha, the nature of mind, is without complexity, beyond objects of seeing. Those who know that are sagacious. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

To completely analyze the meaning, within the words of the sagacious there are no conceptual thoughts.

3. The instruction that the meaning of being without accepting and rejecting is being without grasping and fixation

a) The final summary, introductory:

Here all dharmas are not grasped as different.
These reflections have the nature of non-duality.
This play has no good and evil, accepting or rejecting.
Let us rest where the mind does not fixate duality.

Since essentially pure suchness arising as play, is beyond action, seeking, memory, and thought, as for resting in the non-duality of mahasukha, the All-Creating King says:

Within the unborn, in dharmata completely pure,
The appearance of things that are born rises like a reflection.
Since the nature of what arises is non-dual,
Rest in mahasukha, the effortless nature of suchness.

b) the nature of the great perfection is without fixation

When one rests there:

Fixed objects do not arise when there are no reference points.
Insight without fixation is the completeness of being,
The nature of the great perfection, the natural state.

At this time non-fixating insight arises in natural freedom from all assertions and denials. The great perfection is spontaneously present.

The All-Creating King says:

Kye! I, bodhicitta, the king, who am the doer of all,
have no glorification and denigration of objects.
I meditate without any thoughts of anything.
Artifacts of the three gates rest naturally as they are,
Naturally liberated, just as they arise.
Just as unborn space transcends all partial divisions,
So the nature of mahasandhi should be known.

I. The dedication of merit

Now there is the dedication of merit:

Thus, because of the equal nature of all dharmas,
Having passed the pass of fixations of intellect.
With limitless awareness bound in servitude,
May our exhausted minds today ease their weariness.

By the merit of presenting this garland of the wondrously-arisen Dharma of instantaneous liberation into the essential meaning, may whatever beings there may be, enter into being the space of the great freedom from partiality. The fences of their personal doctrines and their view and meditation do not encounter the nature without bondage and liberation. They are bound in assertion, denial, and so forth, wearied by attachment to true existence. May these rest in spontaneous adherence to the conceptionless nature of the great perfection. This the vast space of the doer of all, bodhicitta.

The heaped up clouds in the sky of the unborn essence
Resounding with the thunder of emptiness, effortless suchness,
By the unmoving nature of mind, the level of enlightenment,
See the inexpressible essence of perfect equality.

May the minds of sentient beings, the state of confusion
Which have entered the entrapments of grasping and fixation,
Cross without exception into the nature of purity,
Known as the great vastness, equal space free from existing,
The field of Samantabhadra, where all is eternally perfect.

Sailing waters disturbed by conception-related prana,
May all who far from profundity fixate reflected forms,
In the cool lake of non-thought, which is self-arising wisdom
Come to rest in spontaneous motionless clarity.

XI

The Commentary on the Eleventh Chapter THE NATURE OF MIND, THE EASE OF WEARINESS, the CHAPTER OF THE PATH, SPOTLESS DHYANA, THE UNION OF SHAMATHA AND VIPASHYANA

Now that we have gained confidence in the view of the great freedom from extremes, the nature of all dharmas, there is

XI. Meditation, the chapter of spotless samadhi

There are four parts.

- A. Having, resolved the view, the teaching of meditation.
- B. The teaching of the gradations of powers by which one meditates.
- C. The explanation of the stages of the path of meditation.
- D. The dedication of merit.

- A. Having resolved the view, one should meditate:

Having explained the view of the great freedom from extremes, the natural state like the sky, in which all dharmas are by nature unborn; now there is the teaching of meditation, self-arising wisdom luminous like the sun and moon. As just explained:

And so when we have seen the equality of all dharmas,
It is important to rest within the natural state.

After first cutting through extremes with the view, by meditation rest within that. Otherwise we will not be liberated from the host of kleshas or perfect the virtues of the path. Therefore we really ought to meditate. Rest in the sky-like purity of the natural state, cutting through complexities of hope and fear. The All-creating King says:

Kye Ho vajra being! Now meditate on the meaning.
In dharmata enlightenment without any meditation,
There are neither meditation or its object,
To rest in the nature without meditation is meditation.
The meaning is the unborn, which is the meaning of all.
When the marks of discursive thought are apprehended as suchness,
None of the motions of memory, discursive thoughts, and mind,
Can cause the least distraction from the unborn state.
When it is known that thinking like that is meditation,
Resting in non-meditation will never be distracted.

Also:

Kye Ho vajra being! Now you should meditate well!
Whatever appears, all the dharmas of sight and sound,
To one who well knows the meaning, are only that single meaning.
When the nature has manifested, that which has been shown,
Is realized to be the nature of the unborn itself.
Hopeless fearless non-distraction is meditation.

After hearing, contemplate and meditate on the meaning. This is so that the essence may arise in our being.

The Sutra of Ascertaining the Truth of Suchness says:

Shariputra, if someone listens to the Dharma for ten kalpas, and someone else meditates for merely the time of a finger-snap in the samadhi of suchness, the merit of the second will be increased much more than that of the first.

B. The gradation of powers of those who meditate into high, middle, and low

1. Those of the highest powers,

a. How the very highest will be liberated:

Meditators:

There are levels of this teaching for those of different capacities.
Those of the highest powers will be liberated
By their realization of the natural state.
Meditation and its object are seen to be non-dual.
The phenomenal world is liberated as the ground.
Unbounded insight flows along like the stream of a river.

Having the good fortune of formerly accumulated merit, those of the highest powers, with the condition of the holy guru, are liberated just by realizing that they are already liberated. This brings them into the natural state beyond meditation and meditator, like the sky. Without needing to work at meditation, their constant yogic union with the nature of mind is like the stream of a river. The All-creating King says:

Kye! what is taught by me the teacher the doer of all,
Is the all-inclusive unborn, completely pure samadhi.
Not depending on coarse conditions of meditating or not,

The object of meditation is whatever dharmas appear.
There is no particular way of where and how to rest.

This is liberation of things as they are without seeking is meditation.

Kye! within these oral instructions of non-meditation,
Since this is the meaning that goes beyond words and speech,
No former generations taught the doer of all.
Later ones will never teach the doer of all.
Even now the doer of all is not being taught.

Kye! By the teacher of teachers, the doer of all, the King,
The meaning is being displayed of unerring realization,
The essence beyond all glorification and denigration,
Like meditation and non-meditation disputing space.

b. Becoming Space free from meditation and meditator.

When such meditation becomes Space, as for the meaning or object:

We cannot delineate sessions with a definite, "this is it."
All is self-liberated as the field of Samantabhadra.
This self-arising vastness, which is the space of the ground,
Is suchness which has been like that from all eternity.
There is no straying, and also, there is no place we could stray.
It takes no special skill. We get no profit from it.
Convinced that there is no attainment nor non-attainment,
We are buddhas right now, without even having to ask.
Yogins like this are universal like the sky.

When we have been liberated from attachment to true existence, there is no meditation on antidotes. For that matter, there is no meditation at all. There are no breaks between sessions. We continually abide in non-attachment to true existence. This play without fixation, self-liberation beyond partiality, is experience of the field of Samantabhadra. The All-Creating King says:

Kye! if we have attained the empowerment of the King,
Insight does not fabricate, suchness always rises.
Absence of cause and conditions is the path of excellent peace.
What rests in the ground is resting in itself.

The great upaya of the King, the doer of all,
Is the empowerment of ultimate realization.
If we enter into all objects exactly as they are,
We know both faults and virtues as equality.

Then we go beyond both entering and non-entering.
The changeless self-existence of the field of the King
Is the self-perfected nature--No progress, no renouncing.

As when we meditate on things and characteristics, there are no identifying signs and criteria. The same text says:

Like the dharmas of grasping at things and characteristics,
Criteria and signs are non-existent, like space.

With nothing we are supposed to reach, there is nowhere to go astray. With nothing in particular we are supposed to look at, the seer can have no obscuration. The same text says:

As for this itself, the nature of bodhicitta,
It is the essence of all the dharmas without remainder.
The unborn is completely pure and unobscured.
Without a path to tread, there is no such thing as straying.

Because of straying, obscuration, purification, improvement, view, and meditation, we look right at the nature of mind without seeing it, and obscuration arises. Trying to progress where there is no such thing is already straying. The same text says:

Within bodhicitta, the single nature of all dharmas,
Counting the one with numbers is straying and obscuration.
Progressing where there is no progress, straying rises.
By having a view about how things are without conception,
The nature is not seen and there will be obscurations.

From the time we become convinced that our own mind is really the primordial self-existence of buddhahood, we know enough not to aspire to any buddhahood other than that. From that very moment we abide on the level of buddhahood. The same text says:

Since the nature of mind is primordial enlightenment,
We cannot succeed or fail, and there is no hope and fear.

Also:

Since I, the doer of all, am that which is all-inclusive,
Therefore I am explained to be complete perfection.
From the triple nature of me, the doer of all,
Teacher, teaching, and retinue all arise into being.
With those the label "doer of all" has also arisen."

First, as for nature of the perfect teacher,
From the self-arising wisdom of me, the doer of all,
The triple nature of the three kayas has arisen.
Trikaya is taught to be the three-fold perfect teacher.

Regarding such a mantra-yogin the same text says:

The individual body of a god or human being
Is realization, dharmata, and buddhahood.

c. The instruction of how intermediate and lesser ones should meditate

Those of average and low capacities
Have to make an effort to be familiar with this.
Until fixations of ego have subsided into space,
They must use various skillful means of meditation

Because they are not free of ego-grasping, the cause of samsara, those of average and lesser powers have to work hard at meditation. Here there are distinctions between meditation and non-meditation and the grasping and fixation of mind subsiding or not subsiding into space. The All-Creating King says:

As for duality and pure non-dual wisdom
They are labeled as meditation and non-meditation.

d. The suitability of meditation

Those who have not reached self-arising and self-liberation, have the usual ordinary thoughts:

Evil discursive thoughts have led them into samsara.
To be free from these they use the means of meditation.
Later vast prajña rises, free from all extremes.

By conceptions one falls into samsara, Dharmakirti's Praise to Manjushri says:

Conceptions are great ignorance.
It is these that make us sink
In the ocean of samsara.
If we are without conceptions,
We will pass beyond
the sufferings of conceptions.

The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

By constant conception we wander
In the wilderness of samsara.
Because of constant formation
Of karma and the kleshas,
Hundreds of sufferings
Are made to manifest.

Since these are pacified by meditating, by doing so the prajña in which all dharmas are perfectly liberated is sure to arise.

e. The need to unite shamatha and vipashyana

Kleshas are first suppressed by one-pointed shamatha.
Then, by vipashyana, they are eradicated.

The All-Supreme Clouds says:

By shamatha the kleshas are suppressed.
By vipashyana they turn into perfect enjoyment.⁴³⁷

The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Having learned the kleshas will be overcome
By vipashyana possessing excellent shamatha;
First of all one should search for shamatha,
Established by genuine joy, without any worldly desire.

Regarding the single essence and the dualistic individual, resting or being in the first is shamatha. Luminosity or clarity of the second is vipashyana. Shamatha and vipashyana are unified by realizing luminosity/emptiness free from extremes. This is liberation from samsara. The Spiritual Letter says:

Without any prajña dhyana will not exist.
Without any dhyana, also there is no prajña.
Where these exist as two, there is samsara.
Get rid of it like a trace of polluted seas.

Difference has two divisions. There is difference according to words and difference according to the meaning. As for the first, hearing about one pointed mind, is shamatha. Realizing the meaning of this is vipashyana.

As for the second, by meditating, first, establishing one pointedness is shamatha. Later, realizing that as natureless is vipashyana. The Clouds of the Three Jewels says:

Shamatha is one-pointed of mind. Vipashyana distinguishes dharmas as they really are.

The Commentary of Ascertaining the Intention says:

There are two kinds of shamatha and vipashyana, according respectively to prajña and the oral instructions. As for those arising from prajña, mental comprehension of the words of the twelve aspects of sutra is shamatha. Realization of the meaning is vipashyana. As for that arising from the oral instructions, producing motionless mind by the oral instructions is shamatha. Realization of the meaning of that is vipashyana.

f. The explanation of the reason

The reason:

For the highest, evil thoughts dissolve in dharmakaya.
With neither good nor evil, we need no antidote.
Average ones meditate on unity with clear brilliance.
Thoughts of good and evil vanish into space.
Then there is realization of unity like the sky.
Lower ones first must search for the peace of shamatha.
Attaining a steady ease, whatever may be perceived.
Then, by vipashyana's discriminating awareness,
Everything is liberated as the ground:
Inner as well as outer, appearance as well as mind.
Thus, it is important to know the gradation of powers.

Those who come to an island of gold, will not find ordinary rocks and stones, even if they look for them. So, for those of supreme powers, whatever arises is liberated as dharmakaya. When the antidotes are liberated into space, meditation with sessions and breaks is unnecessary. The All-Creating King says:

In uncreated suchness, the Buddha's realization,
How can conceptions of mind and mental events arise?
By knowing how to rest in unborn suchness itself,
One is free from characteristics of doing and seeking.

Average ones, by realizing the view, rest within the unborn, clarity free from drowsiness and discursiveness, like a motionless undisturbed pond. By that they unify shamatha and vipashyana. After discursive thoughts subside into space, sky-like realization arises. The Basket of Holy Samadhi says:

If we rest the mind
Exactly as it is,
In the dharmata of suchness,

Experience unobstructed
By any names arises.
This is called samadhi.

Lesser ones are stirred up like unruly monkeys and can hardly rest at all. They moisten the mind with one-pointed shamatha. Then as a further antidote, by meditating on vipashyana they discriminate all dharmas as natureless emptiness and all appearances as illusion and so forth. By that they realize the unborn. The Sutra Requested by Maitreya says:

Having established shamatha, train in vipashyana.

From the three sections on

2. How those of average powers should meditate, first there is:

a. The instruction to rest in non-thought

Those who have average powers in their ways of meditation also are of three kinds:

Now meditation for those of average powers is taught.
Just as when troubled water is being tossed by waves,
Reflections of bright stars are unsteady and unclear,
The undisciplined mind is lured into unsteadiness,
When it becomes preoccupied with complexities.
The luminous nature of mind and the clarity of wisdom,
The stars of the eyes and higher perceptions, do not arise.
Unwavering one-pointed meditation is important.

When water is agitated by waves, reflections that may arise are not grasped. Though the mind has self-existing virtues of the higher perceptions and so forth, because of disturbing waves of false conceptions, these virtues do not manifest. Therefore meditating in unity is important. The Dohakosha says:

By waves of prana included in the mind
Moving and stirring, the mind becomes unruly.
If the co-emergent nature is realized,
By that one's nature will be stabilized.

Rest like that, with no disturbance by the waves of thoughts. The water of mind will rest motionless, self-illuminated by the luminous lamp of the nature of mind. The same text says:

The excellent lord who is without any waves,
Samadhi without disturbance, will occur.
Rest in the water and the self-luminous lamp.
Not coming and going or accepting and rejecting.

b. The extensive teaching of how to meditate

1) The points of posture and means of resting

Free from the three extremes, rest in the nature of the three motionlessness.

The body is like Mount Meru, with the seven points of posture,
Because the senses are free from the limits of extremes,
Sensation is like the stars reflected in a pond.
The empty, luminous mind is as clear as the shining sky.
Neither drowsy or discursive, rest in simplicity.

As for the seven points of motionless body, as one meditates:

- 1 the legs are crossed
- 2 the hands are in the meditation mudra
- 3 the back is straight
- 4 the tongue touches the palate
- 5 the breath is slow
- 6 the eyes are focused on the tip of the nose

7 the neck is slightly bent forward.

As for motionlessness of the senses, the eyes do not fidget. The ears, nose, tongue, and body are not hindered. Whatever forms, sounds, smells, tastes, touch, and thoughts may arise, their sense doors are not hindered, but neither do we pursue them. The five eyes, the divine eye and so forth, and the six higher perceptions, are virtues of resting the mind. If the doors of perception are hindered, clarity will not be attained. If we follow after thoughts, their continuity will not be cut. We will be no different from ordinary people.

Therefore, within the motionless pond of sense-awareness, meditate by letting objects of individual appearance arise without obstruction, like reflected stars and planets. If that discrimination of objects is not grasped, in addition to no harm being done, individual virtues will arise. This non-conceptualization of phenomenal appearance is the wisdom of non-conception or non-thought.

If there are no phenomena, the mind perceiving these will also be absent. With apprehension neither of thought nor non-thought, the wisdom of complete non-thought will be absent. Therefore, when objects appear in the senses, rest in non-thought. By the guru of individual and personal awareness, there will be a gap in the coming and going of thoughts. This is the cessation of prana, and at that time realization will manifest. Though the prana of breathing moves in the nose and mouth, thoughts will not move. In this gap in complexities, the time of simplicity where thoughts are pacified, there is no need to meditate on the antidote. Why talk about needing an antidote for complexity, in the presence of the yogini of simplicity, prajña? Saying that it is not necessary, the Dohakosha says:

The eyes are not closed, and mind too is unhindered.
As for cessation of prana, the glorious guru is realized.
At that time the cause of prana does not move,
Let alone with the yogini at the time of death.

That pith-resolution is called naturalness or non-fabrication of the six senses. Though objects appear within the senses, sense awareness does not conceptualize them. They rest naturally. Realization of luminous ultimate samadhi in addition to that is not only not harmful, but facilitates the blossoming of enlightenment. The same text says:

As great an assembly of sense objects as may befall,
These without selfhood and karma completely blossom.

Motionless mind resting without the extremes of complexity will arise within the motionlessness of the body and senses. As for resting in that clear mind without complexities, not moving from luminosity, the same text says:

Things and non-things both are bonds of the Sugata.
Do not distinguish samsara from equality.
The yogin and the oneness of the natural state
Should be known to be like water poured into water.

At that time, objects appearing as external things, and the non-thing mind of inner awareness, preoccupied with thoughts within, bind co-emergent sugatagarbha. Because of that obscuration there are samsara and nirvana and good and bad. Even our own samadhi, because of attachment and grasping, will not be produced at all. By not conceptualizing things and non-things, when the time arises of not wishing for anything else, all the entities of false conception without remainder dissolve into the ground, the nature of mind. When mind becomes motionless and stable, we are liberated from samsara. Without dualistic grasping and attachment to self and other, we attain the body of dharmakaya, the great transcendence of thought and expression. The same text says:

When we completely analyze things as well as non-things,
There all beings without remainder are dissolved.
Then mind is motionless, becoming totally stable,

It is self-liberated from the things of samsara.
When both self and other are completely unknown,
Then the unsurpassable body will be attained.

The All-Creating King says:

Kye! within the realm of suchness of mahasukha
Do not exert the three gates; do not produce fabrications.
Do not engage the mind or follow after marks.
Rest in the meaning of bliss, which is self-arising wisdom.
This is realization of self-rising luminosity.
This is the actualization of buddha activity.
This is the realization of the doer of all the King.

2) How virtues arise

When one meditates like that in complete simplicity:

This is the single nature of the primordial state,
Dharmakaya with no perception of grasped and grasper.
In the spotless luminosity of the heart of the sun,
There arise bliss, luminosity, and complete non-thought,
And there is neither any center or any limit.

By passing beyond conception and thought into dharmata, discursive thoughts dissolve into space. Then there arises realization of the equal taste of dharmakaya, the luminous great perfection together with the nyam, the experiences of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought. This is the great symbol beyond example and meaning. The All-Creating King says:

The three times are a single one without distinction.
Arising is primordial, with neither before nor after.
Because dharmakaya is one and completely all-pervading,
One rests within the nature of the greatest of the great.

Also:

This wondrously arisen play is free from karma like space.
From thoughtless ignorance that immediately arises.

The Dohakosha says:

If we try hard, holding the guru's instruction,
Co-emergence will doubtlessly arise.
Its colors and qualities, unexampled by letters,
Are ineffable and pointless to describe.
Like attachment to the heart's bliss of a princess,
Who can teach that ultimate lord of Being?

The Sutra of the Ultimate Samadhi says:

In the state of dharmata,
Inconceivable by thought,
As mind rests without thought,
Experience without bias
Will certainly arise.
This is called samadhi.

3) How to realize dharmata

When this co-emergent self-arising wisdom arises, from the viewpoint of the mind of the yogin:

Appearance and emptiness are an all-pervading unity,
Transcending all the extremes of existence and non-existence.
Samsara and nirvana are not conceived as two.
Knowing and its objects are of a single essence.
See these as neither equal or not with dharmata.

The inner and outer dharmin, the eight examples of illusion, and dharmata, the essence by nature unborn, are not different. This is seeing the overall unity of appearance and emptiness. The All-Creating King says:

Whatever appears is one in the state of suchness.
As for this unfabricated king of equality,
Realization of dharmakaya, arises from within.

The nature of mind beyond the extremes of existence and non-existence, the pure motionless luminosity of wisdom, arises as the non-dual play of samsara and nirvana. The same text says:

Pacifying beginning, middle, and end,
Pacifying samsara and nirvana,
With the spontaneous presence of great bliss,
By matchless wisdom aware of autonomy,
Dharmas will not arise as something other.

At that time, knowable objects and the knower, mind, arise as the equality of non-dual wisdom. The same text says:

Both inner and outer are subsequently inner.
This profound aspect has no conceptual objects.

4) The main cause of the wisdom of the noble ones

This is the cause of wisdom that sees the noble truths
Then the eye of mind, which is the seer of suchness,
Will perfectly establish the buddhadharmakaya.
May the fortunate rest in this equality.

From becoming increasingly familiar with wisdom without complexity, the path of seeing and the others above are self-established. As to how this occurs, the Namnge says:

This what is real and what is not Having become completely familiar with these,
If that familiarity is perfected,
The fruition is bliss, luminosity, and non-thought.

c. The extensive teaching of the eight means of resting

1) Resting undistracted in simplicity

As for resting without many distractions of emanation and gathering,

In the unborn nature of mind, which is purity like the sky,
Events within the mind are not solidified.
But left to fade and vanish like a heap of clouds.

Rest in what is and what eternally has been so,
The undisturbed awareness of simplicity

Rest thoughts and mental contents as they are in the sky-like nature of mind, watching them fade away like clouds. As for meditating in that undisturbed state, the nature which is exemplified, the All Creating King says:

Kye Ho vajra being, meditate in suchness.
By realizing liberation a it is,
Undistracted resting in the nature is effortless.
All is self-arising and also self liberated.

Also:

This unborn nature of mind that is like the sky
Is unborn and ceaseless. Rest within that nature.

2) Resting in clear luminosity without disturbance

While resting in clear luminosity without disturbance:

We should let ourselves be like a clear and vacant ocean,
Free from the turbulent waves of grasping and fixation.

Clear because mind does not arise, smooth because it is not discursive, be like an ocean resting where it is, clear and pure of conceptual disturbances and defiling thoughts. The All-Creating King says:

The samadhi of a clear and peaceful ocean
Is not produced by word-dependent mind.
It is suchness pure of all disturbance.

Also:

When this is known, by resting within it undisturbed,
Not engaging in effort, the mind does not train in antidotes.
Objects are not abandoned, and mindfulness is not gathered.
Since anything that arises is itself the meaning,
Enter into the meaning of me the doer of all.

3) Resting free from partiality like the sky

Resting free from partiality like the sky:

We should let ourselves be like an empty, luminous sky,
Impartial and free from any clouds of discursive thought.

Rest in the primordially empty sky-like nature of mind, without emanating and gathering discursive thoughts. The All-Creating King says:

Kye great vajra being, now you should meditate.
Within the enlightened nature that does not accept or reject,
Rest like space, without fabrications of body and mind.
Not meditating, because of being completely without
The attachment and fixation involved with attaining perfection,
Completely peaceful like space, free from all disturbance,
Have nothing to do with objects or notions of realization.

4) Resting in spontaneous actionlessness

As for resting free from assertion and denial, hope and fear:

Let us be firm and steady like the King of Mountains.
Free from hope and fear, let us neither affirm nor deny.

With the mind motionless like the king of mountains, rest without discursive thoughts of denial and assertion. The All-Creating King says:

Kye! the teacher of teachers, the doer of all, the king,
Cuts the bonds of duality by realization,
By simply resting in uncontradicted equality,
Realization of me, the doer of all, is established.

That which binds, discursive thought, has been cut through.
Not working on liberation, never gaining nirvana,
The essential meaning does not fixate biased conceptions.
Do not meditate on the goal, nor objects of compassion.

5) Resting in apparent objects as unobstructed

Resting the five gates in their intrinsic luminosity:

We should let ourselves be a clear and luminous mirror,
Within which apparent objects are like ceaseless reflections.

In the openness of clear and luminous mind, rest undistracted as the variegated apparent objects of the senses vanish like mist. The All-Creating King says:

Kye, therefore vajra being now you should meditate.
Though our natural wisdom lies beyond conceptions.
In realizing it conceptual meaning need not be abandoned.
Just go beyond objects and do not guard consciousness.

As things are clearly the essence, do not meditate.
With phenomena clearly the essence, neither hope nor fear.

6) resting in the clear luminosity of primordial liberation

Resting in clear luminosity, undefiled by antidotes:

Like a rainbow, eternally liberated as it is,
Let us shine purely, neither drowsy nor discursive.

As for resting without drowsiness or discursiveness in the clear luminous openness of mind, the All-Creating King says:

Kye Ho vajra being, now you should meditate well.
By appearance of the goal as the pure space of the unborn,
Apparent things are not seen, and fear is not produced.
Appearance is self-liberation into the unborn.
Liberation realizes empty suchness in non-meditation.

Rest like that. Knowing appearance as emptiness is knowing that it is like a rainbow.

7) Resting one-pointedly like an archer

Resting with one-pointed attention:

We should let ourselves be undistracted like an archer,
In natural wisdom that neither gathers nor emanates.

Resting with mind undistracted from dharmata, precisely and directly focus the eyes like an archer aiming an arrow, the All-Creating King says:

The oral instruction is that this essence of non-meditation
Ought to be grasped with undistracted mindfulness.

8) Resting without action in spontaneous presence

Having put ourselves at ease, as for resting there:

Let us be like those who are sure their work is done,
And rest in spontaneous presence with neither hope nor fear.

To rest mind as it is, resolving it into the spontaneous resting of dharmakaya, relax naturally into absence of hope and fear. Then stay there. The All-Creating King says:

Kye, the yogin who enters and meditates on this path
Dwells from now on on the level of the Victorious One.
Not fixating realization, not grasping with partial bias,
Go into the essence beyond success and failure.

Having relaxed the three gates naturally, rest in mere non-distractedness with no need for concentrated mindfulness. Even if we let ourselves be distracted and fall into ordinariness, our ordinary awareness rests in spontaneous non-distraction. The same text says:

Kye, for the teacher of teachers, the doer of all, the king
In dharmata without meditation, thought, or concept
To rest while thoughts subside, is falling into samsara.
Seeking and meditating is the path of conceptualization.

How so? The same text says:

Kye O vajra being, now meditate in suchness.
Let the body be, and do not blunt the senses.
Do not try to discipline speech in any way.
Let the mind rest where it is. There is no need to move it.
By meditating in this actionless buddha activity,
Doing nothing at all the goal will be perfected.

Also:

Kye, to yogins having the fortune of entering all at once,
When realization of the doer of all is taught,
Not intimate mindfulness of the Space of realization,
But no meditation or entering is what they should be taught.

9. summarizing the meaning of the eight means of resting

Of these eight means of resting:

Here within the natural purity of samadhi
Shamatha and vipashyana are unified.
When we rest within the unborn, that is shamatha.

Vipashyana is simple, luminous emptiness.
They are united by having an essence inseparably one.

With neither grasping nor fixation, there is naturally pure samadhi. This is how to unify shamatha and vipashyana. Resting in being is shamatha. The luminosity of that time is vipashyana. Although this is said, these are inseparable, and from the time they are labeled as "unity," they are indivisible. In shamatha, "resting in peace," any perception of resting in peace is pacified. In vipashyana, "clear seeing," conceptualization of clear seeing does not occur. Therefore they are inseparably one in the natural state. The Bodhisattva Pitaka Sutra says:

The bodhisattva's shamatha is contemplation of reality. Not even perception of peace exists. Vipashyana sees the view, but never looks back even at the view. Therefore, what is seen is genuinely seen.

6. Treading the Path

Having learned how to see the inexpressible by the eight means of resting, now, as we rest like that, there is the explanation of how to tread the path by means of four kinds of wisdom. Of these four, as for the teaching of

1) The wisdom of appearance

As by the eight means of resting the mind rests in the natural state:

Now this profound and peaceful simplicity of mind
Sees the truth that is inexpressible by speech,
The wisdom of appearance, utterly without concept,
The luminosity known as prajñāparamita.

The first arising of clear, luminous, motionless wisdom is the wisdom of appearance. This is the peace of mind's entering into the nature of mind beyond speech, thought, and expression. Its luminosity is the meaning of perfect knowledge, the prajñāparamita. The Precious Ocean says:

There are four kinds of luminosity.
After them is the level of the great wisdom.
Appearance is completely without conception.
The wisdom of increase comprehends illusion.
Final attainment, the path of the noble ones.
Complete attainment, finished with that path.

Nyime Namgyal connects these with the four situations of the bardo. They are explained as ways of liberation. Those who attain recognition that things are like that right now are liberated.

Though at this point realization is not complete, by the wisdom of appearance first arising, one recognizes the nature of mind, the wisdom of the natural state.

By the path of liberation being already accomplished, one has planted the seed of enlightenment.

2) The wisdom of luminosity:

By seeing this the mind is totally in peace.
There is little attachment to affirmation and negation,
Regarding the various dharmas, external and internal.
Impartial compassion arises out of this emptiness.
Inspiring us to virtuous actions for self and others.
At this time we have an enjoyment of solitude,
Feeling a need for few distractions and entertainments.
Even in dreams our behavior will be wholesome and proper.
Now we are taking command of the path to liberation.

When wisdom recognizes the luminous nature of mind as the ground, incidental false conceptions are liberated as they are, and the mother and son luminosities mix. By only virtuous behavior, there is the outer variety of the five dharma objects.

The mind of inner cognition complete with its assertions and denials, is free from all attachment. From the self luminous emptiness of mind, by the arising of impartial compassion for sentient beings near and far, one also benefits oneself. One encourages only virtue. One delights in isolated mountain valleys, forests, and so on, abandoning distractions and occupations. With this absence of unvirtuous thoughts, finally, even in dreams, only white and virtuous appearances rise. With body, speech and mind completely trained, "shinjang," the virtues of the path of accumulation are in one's being. In the meditation hall one sees various manifestations of luminosity. The Lankavatara Sutra says:

Without any thoughts, having straightened the body,
To the Buddha and also to enlightenment
Having done prostrations again and again,
We should meditate on selflessness.

If having yoga we meditate on that,
We will have the lotus life empowerment.
We will be protectors for all beings.

If those possessing yoga make an effort,
Like the space of the sun and of the moon,
Mind is radiant and lotus-like,
Depicting truth like fire in the sky

Then:

At that time the godlike hand of buddhahood
By having arisen from all the buddha fields,
Anoints their heads with blessing and empowerment.
This is a sign of engagement with the real.

3) The wisdom of proliferation

With these:

Then by greater and greater familiarity,
Clarity and wisdom are more than they were before.
Appearance is realized to be like dreams and illusions.
When born and unborn alike are seen to be non-existent,
Dharmas are of one taste in non-duality.
This proliferating wisdom becomes complete non-thought.
We attain meditation that is adorned with joy.

By becoming more and more familiar with these former realities, obscurations to the empty luminous mind of self-arising wisdom diminish. There are great waves of prajña, samadhi, and enlightened experience. External appearances are naturally seen as dream and illusion. The many natures of dharmas arise as realization of one taste. Resting in this space-like state is the wisdom of proliferation. The Stages of the Path of Miracle says:

Even in dreams illusion will be seen.
It proliferates and increases.

4) The sign of attaining heat

At this time:

Now both body and mind are purer than before.
There is spotless realization of prajña and upaya.
Through the higher perceptions, compassion accomplishes benefits.
Saddened with samsara, we thoroughly renounce it.
Even in our dreams, all dharmas are realized thus.
Our bodies will have no lice or nits, or any worms.
We will be free from drowsiness and discursiveness,
Established in the state of samadhi day and night.
Such people will quickly see the path of the noble ones.

By spotless realization, there is the special sign of body and mind being shinjanged. By resting day and night in the samadhi of special union, we become inseparable from it. By compassion, activity to benefit beings, sadness and extraordinary renunciation for samsara arise. Even in dreams, all dharmas are seen as dreams, illusions, and so forth. There will be no worms within the body and no lice and other parasites on its surface. One will attain the signs of the path of preparation and quickly come in contact with the path of seeing. The former text says:

By its increase, it is not difficult
To attain fully the path of the noble ones.

5) The wisdom of the noble ones which is attained

Through greater familiarity this will be more intense.
The sun of wisdom that is realized through samadhi,
Arises now although it never rose before.
Now that we have seen the meaning of its being said
That there exists a single equality of all dharmas,
Possessing the eyes and higher perceptions unobscured,
We see limitless hundreds, thousands, and millions of buddha fields.
This is the spotless wisdom of the noble ones.
This is the manifestation of what we call "attainment."

First, by having seen the spotless wisdom of the luminous nature of mind, what is called the wisdom of "attainment" is gained.

Internally the hundred and one pranas of the nadis of the heart center are purified. The wisdom of the red and white essence elements becomes increasingly luminous, and also by illuminating the other chakras, the 1200 special prana minds are supported, and by the 1200 pranas of the kleshas ceasing, according to mantrayana the inner elements appear as the primordial buddha fields.

According to the vehicle of characteristics, seeing the faces of a hundred buddhas and so forth is explained as external appearance manifesting as the buddha fields. According to the level of the bhumis, there are the eyes, and higher perceptions of an individual being, and obscurations and obstructions are greatly purified, so that one attains non-obscurations. Seeing false conceptions for what they are, one is completely liberated from the kleshas that are to be abandoned. Realization of luminous wisdom manifests. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Oppressions cease and indignities of the lower realms.
One is free from fear of samsara, unharmed by anxiety.

We are liberated from fear. By becoming familiar with this seeing which has been attained, the dharani-cloud of wisdom arises.

6) The first attainment of the wisdom of the noble ones:

By letting this increase, grow ever greater and greater still,
The samadhi of realization has countless qualities.
Dharmata is the same whether concepts are there or not.

The nourishing clouds of spotless wisdom still increase.
Meditation and non-meditation are not two.
Resting in meditation then becomes eternal.
Emanations beyond the compass of thoughts will be displayed.
We enter limitless buddha realms and visions of wisdom.

Becoming familiar with what has been seen is the path of meditation. By lesser, middle, and greater attainments, the previously explained countless virtues of each of the bhumis are attained. By emanations, one benefits sentient beings. From the first to the seventh bhumis, conceptions in post meditation, separate meditation and post-meditation. By the manifestation of the three pure bhumis, one is without these conceptions. Meditation and post-meditation are mixed because they have the single taste of wisdom. The Uttaratantra says:

The mind that always acts and accomplishes
Blazes like a fire.

There and so forth it has previously been explained.

7) How the noble ones are perfected by full attainment

With these special qualities of the vajra body:

With nadis and elements pure, prana as well as mind
Are supreme in great and spotless qualities,
Then there are what are called the wisdoms of full attainment.
Here the path of the noble ones will be completed, and then enlightenment will quickly be attained.
This is the yana of the heart of luminosity,
Whose fruition liberates fortunate ones within this life.

The wisdom of the path of meditation is called the wisdom of full attainment. By meditating on the eight-fold noble path, there is co-emergence, and many stains are cleared away. In general, the virtues of the paths and bhumis appear from the workability of nadi, prana, and bindu. They also become workable through the accumulations of merit and wisdom and through efforts of purification as required.

There are twenty-one knots in the central channel. By releasing the first two, there is the first bhumi, and so on, until by releasing the nineteenth and twentieth the virtues of the tenth bhumi arise. The purified is the petals of the nadis. The purifier is that by wisdom proliferating in the nadi petals, confused appearance attending on prana dries up and is emptied. By the purifier, the wisdom essence in the wisdom nadis, prana enters into the complete motionlessness of non-thought. Realization of the paths and bhumis arises.

Moreover, by the workability of the navel emanation chakra, the virtues of union with the accumulations arise. One sees the face of the nirmanakaya buddha. By the throat enjoyment chakra becoming workable, the fields of sambhogakaya appear. By the heart chakra becoming workable, there is the path of seeing. By the throat, the sambhogakaya qualities of the bhumis from the first to seventh appear. By the crown center becoming workable, the virtues of the three pure bhumis arise. When the twenty-first knot of the central channel is released, all the surrounding nadis are completely purified, so that the kayas and wisdoms appear.

The Vajra Miracle says:

As for the bhumis and the virtues of the bhumis
From growing and diminishing in the nadis
There is the action of prana and great bliss.
The purifier and ground of purification
Reciprocally wax as the other wanes.
Samsara and nirvana wax and wane.
The chakras, counted as three or four or five

Two times two times that are not perfected,
As the last tenth bhumi, the bhumi of wisdom.
By milking it is said to go up and down.

As explained above, the three chakras correlate with the three kayas. The four accord with those, with the mahasukhakaya as the fourth. The five are completed by those with the great wisdom as fifth. The twentieth knot of the chakras is that of the tenth bhumi. The twenty-first is that of perfect buddhahood. When these are released one after another, we enter into luminosity. How the natural knots in the nadis are released will be additionally explained in connection with the bardo.

In the situation where the arising of the four luminosities is recognized, as previously taught, the wisdom is in the middle of the central channel luminosity nadi. In the center of the heart the nature of the great essence arises at the time of arising and dissolving. As for the way it dissolves, The Subsequent Tantra of the Manifestation of Wisdom says:

At the time of death of sentient beings,
Form dissolves and passes into sound.
Sound and smell, and taste dissolve in touch.
Touch dissolves in the space of dharmadhatu.

At that time the Play of Wisdom says:

First earth dissolves in water.
Then water into fire.
Then fire into air.
Then air into consciousness.
The grasping and fixation
Comprising consciousness,
Now enter luminosity.

By form dissolving into sound, form becomes unclear. By earth dissolving into water, bodily strength diminishes. By sound dissolving into smell, the ear no longer hears sound. By the dissolving of water into fire, the moist aspect dries up. The blood essences are forced into the nadis and collect in the roma and kyangma nadis. By smell dissolving into taste, the nose no longer smells odors. By the dissolving of fire into air, heat is gathered in from the extremities and enters into the essences in the petals of the four chakras. By smell dissolving into touch, the tongue no longer experiences taste. By prana dissolving into consciousness, breathing ceases. All the essences of roma and kyangma go upwards to the tip of the nose.

When touch dissolves into dharmas, the body no longer experiences touchables, and its luster fades. Consciousness enters into luminosity. The HAM at the top of the central channel dissolves into the white essence of roma. The red A at the nose dissolves into the red essence of kyangma. By the wisdom of the heart center dissolving into the great essence of luminosity, after subtle and coarse thoughts have ceased, luminous wisdom arises. The buddhahood that intrinsically exists within mind appears. From the empty nature of mind the four luminosities of dharmakaya arise, and from the aspect of appearance, the five luminosities of the spontaneous presence of rupakaya arise.

First are the wisdoms of appearance, proliferation, attainment and complete attainment. As for the first, at the instant when consciousness dissolves into luminosity, the external sign or appearance is light rays of the five colors, having merely the aspect of a mirage. This arises when the five essences of the elements dissolve into the center of the heart. The inner sign or essence is that the wisdoms of bliss, luminosity, and non-thought arise like a mirror. The Commentary on Non-duality says:

First that mirage is seen,
With light rays of the five colors.

Also:

Appearance of knowables is complete non-thought.
Within that luminosity, abandoning grasping thoughts
Arising does not arise, and neither does the prana.
As they rest quietly, that is the first situation.

By that wisdom, the thirty-three thoughts arising from aggression cease. The Embodiment of Action of Aryadeva says:

What are the names of the thirty-three thoughts? Non-passion, intermediate non-passion, extreme non-passion, mental going, coming, suffering, intermediate suffering, extreme suffering, peace, discursive thoughts, fear, intermediate fear, extreme fear, craving, intermediate craving, extreme craving, clinging, non-virtue, hunger, thirst, feeling, intermediate feeling, extreme feeling, the apprehender, apprehended, discrimination, shame, kindness, intermediate kindness, extreme kindness, fear, hoarding, and envy. Those are the thirty-three naturally existing thoughts.

Second, at the time of the wisdom of the dissolving of the proliferations of appearance, there is a paleness like that of the rising moon. By the mind entering into alaya, the white radiance of the nadi of arising shines. The inner sign is that more luminous than before, that is not fixated. The Namgyal says:

The second is like the moon.

Also:

Proliferating aspects are complete non-thought.
Greater luminosity does not fixate thoughts.
Subtle wisdom is non-thought that is free from prana,
In the second situation of resting quietly.

By that wisdom, the thirty-three thoughts arising from passion cease. The Embodiment of Action Chödü⁴³⁸ says:

What are the forty thoughts arising from passion?

- 1 desire, chags pa
- 2 intermediate desire, chags pa bar ma
- 3 extreme desire, kun tu chags pa
- 4 joy, dga' ba
- 5 intermediate joy, dga' ba bar ma

 These are the forty? thoughts arising from passion.

Third, as for the wisdom of dissolving of proliferation into attainment, the external sign is like the rising of the sun or brilliance of fire. It appears to be orange. As the klesha mind dissolves into alaya, it is the radiance of the nadi of discriminating wisdom. As the internal sign, wisdom that does not grasp bliss/luminosity arises even more than before. The All-Victorious says:

The third is like the sun.

Also:

The wisdom of attainment is complete non-thought.
 Not even luminosity, it is very subtle.
 Complete luminosity of prana and mind arises
 This is the third situation of resting quietly.

By this wisdom the seven thoughts arising from ignorance cease. The Embodiment of Action says:

What are the seven thoughts arising from ignorance? Dullness, true forgetting, confusion, having nothing to say, sadness, laziness, doubt. All these seven thoughts arising from ignorance cease.

Fourth, the wisdom of attainment dissolving into complete attainment is like dark blue or green twilight. It is the radiance of the central nadi as the ignorance of alaya dissolves into dharmadhatu. The inner sign is that even more than before all stains of attachment to clarity and luminosity are purified. The All-Victorious says:

The fourth is like darkness

Also:

Complete attainment is spotlessness without conception.
 It is self-arising and self-luminous.
 Supreme samadhi has no coarse or subtle natures.
 This is the fourth situation, changeless and all pervading.

At that time, the blood and breath essences in the red and white cord-like veins of the heart completely dissolve into the bindus of A and HAM and the wisdom of ultimate simplicity manifests. This is the buddhadharmakaya. By the successive arising of these four stages of luminosity, A and HAM are gathered into the nadi petals of the heart, gradually dissolving into the great essence in the nadis, which they become.

At the time of the first three luminosities, coarse obscurations dissolve into space. At the time of the fourth, by the dissolving of subtle ones, this moment without all obscuration arises, revealing the first primordial liberation. This is the time when buddhahood manifests. This renunciation of the buddhas is irreversible. As for its being reversed, though there is such renunciation in the path of the buddhas, if it is not recognized for what it is, this is reversible in those without such renunciation.

As for its being irreversible if it is recognized, when we are liberated at the time of recognition, the higher perceptions and so forth are attained without defilement, and there is no place to turn back to from the luminosity of dharmakaya.

The self-existing luminosity of rupakaya arises after the four moments. The All-Victorious says:

Fifth, within that cloudless sky,
Non-thought without center or limit arises.

First, from that dark blue radiance, like a cloudless autumn sky, there rises the mandala cluster of Vairochana. Here within the luminosity of his heart center is the pith of the bodies and buddha fields of the five families. Then the mandala clusters with Akshobhya, Ratnasambhava, Amitabha, and Amoghasiddhi as the principal deities, along with their retinues, arise. Self-arising from the radiance in their hearts, at that time the mandala of the vajra space of Akanishta also arises. Those who have formerly encountered and stabilized this will be liberated at that time.

Moreover since the moments of luminosity are days of samadhi, by having now meditated in samadhi, discursive thoughts will then not be emanated, and the former clear luminosity of the space of cessation will exist, just so, for a long time. Since the instants of the bardo are the stages of samadhi, from now on it is very important to stabilize them. If these are not recognized, the dream-like bardo of becoming will instantly appear, half of former appearances, and half of those of our later existence and place. When these arise, the best reversing the fearsomeness of the bardo by its lack of true existence, the middle like the illusions of the developing and fulfillment stage, and the lowest by going to refuge and so forth. It is taught that they are born in the celestial realms and liberated there.

That completes the exposition of how to tread the path of the four luminosities, together with the subsidiary points.

7. How those of lesser powers, by becoming gradually accustomed to the means of resting, can also accomplish the state of a vidyadhara.

There are three sections, the brief teaching, shamatha, and vipashyana.

a. The brief teaching:

In the stages of meditation for those of lesser powers,
At first there is a separate training in the skills
First of shamatha and then of vipashyana.
After both are stable, these meditations are unified.
Training in this involves innumerable techniques.

b. Shamatha,

1) Taming discursive thoughts

How is it done?

First, regarding the stages of practicing shamatha,

We should stay seated within a solitary place.
In- and out-breaths are counted and colors visualized
Remain for several days to tame discursive thoughts.

At the time of meditating, stay in a place free from disturbances of people and occupations, danger, and so forth, among things which the mind naturally grasps as pleasant. Sitting cross-legged, rest the hands on the knees. Of the three luminous nadis, as from white roma one exhales the breath from the right nostril, all sickness, dōns, evil deeds, and obscurations are purified, like smoke escaping from a cook-house.

When it enters in, the samadhis of the buddhas and so forth becoming light, enter from the left nostril into the red kyangma. Visualize that they dissolve in the central channel, and that for a little while the pranas above and below the hearth of the Sage are grasped and united. Also in gradually sending as before, hold the rest a little while.

As for the colors of pranas, if the three places of the prana of spring are thickened by phlegm, the antidote is the green air prana. To clear away the heat of fire from the three of summer, there is the white water prana. For the three of autumn, to clear away the motility of bile, there is the yellow earth prana. For the three of winter, as an antidote to cold and dampness, meditate on the red fire prana.

As for their shapes, meditate on the essences of prana and mind in the heart center as like a bow, triangular, round, and square. Those are their corresponding touchables.

As for counting, breaths up to seven are mentally counted.

Beginners should visualize the exhalation of that prana going four cubits and so forth from the nostrils, then more and farther until it fills the whole of the three realms. Make the mind completely undistracted. At the time of drowsiness,⁴⁴⁰ not keeping it inside, eliminate it by forcefully expelling outward. At the time of arousing virtue, faith, and so forth, hold them inside. After training prana for some days, completely non-conceptual shamatha of the clear and luminous mind arises. At that time, because the coarse pranas are motionless, mind is without thoughts, and the white and red essences of roma and kyangma are the motionless sun and moon. Within, as that motionless prana remains in non-thought within the central channel, co-emergent wisdom is recognized. The Dohakosha says:

In those whose prana and mind are without wandering,
The sun and moon are inactive and unengaged.
Those who do not know, exhale their minds at this time.

2) Holding the object one-pointedly

Then coarse discursive thoughts are suppressed, and after meditating in that way:

Practice the four immeasurables and the two bodhichittas.
Then, within the practice of the developing stage,
Meditate in one-pointed attention without distraction
On whatever spiritual object may be appropriate,
Such as a picture or a book of the holy texts.

Then train in the four immeasurables, kindness and so forth or in the bodhichittas of aspiring and entering. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Pacify thoughts and meditate on bodhicitta.

Do that or the developing stage. The Dohakosha says:

Grasp with the mind the form of the deity, painted etc.

The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

With a statue that is gold in color,
Entirely beautiful, of the Lord of the World,

The mind of one into whom this image enters
Meditates in the way of a bodhisattva.

Do that briefly. Alternately, those unfamiliar with the former objectless meditation can take some appropriate good object and meditate on it without being distracted to anything else. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Having focused the mind on the object of meditation,
Never let yourself be distracted away from it.

3) The actual samadhi of shamatha

Resting in this way, the mind becomes workable.
It keeps to its object and does not go anywhere else.
It will stay as long as we rest in meditation.
When body speech and mind are pervaded with spiritual joy.
One pointed unwavering shamatha has been established.

The mind stays on its objects until we leave off meditation and does not emanate concepts. Mind and body are blissful. In speech one says little and the words are smooth and soft. This is the time when one pointed shamatha is established. The Sutras say:

O monks, the body and mind of me the yoga practitioner are workable.
Preoccupation with food is small. There is little speech and words are soft. The skin is supple and smooth.

From the two sections on

c. Vipashyana

1) The way of training.

When shamatha has become workable, as for training in vipashyana:

Then we learn the meaning of vipashyana.
All the external appearances of the phenomenal world,
All these various dharmas of samsara and nirvana,
Are like the appearances of a dream or an illusion.
They are like a reflection, an emanation, or echo,
A castle of the gandharvas, an illusion or mirage,
Or heat ripples in the air, totally insubstantial.⁴⁴¹
They appear, but within the nature of emptiness.

Appearing while they are primordially non-existent, meditate on appearances as being like the eight examples of illusion. The Shri Samadhiraja says:

These dharmas are hollow like a plantain tree.
They are ephemeral like lightning in the sky.
They are illusory, like the moon in water.

Also:

Like a castle of the gandharvas or a mirage,
They are like an illusion or like a dream.
All dharmas should be known to be like that.
Meditation on marks is empty of an essence.

The Sky Treasury Sutra says:

By the single Dharma all dharmas are illusion,
Like a mirage they are hollow and ungraspable .
It should be concluded that they are false and impermanent.
Those not kept from this go to the heart of enlightenment.

All the vessel and essence of the phenomenal world as it appears from the viewpoint of confused mind and all dream-like pure appearances of the three jewels are not really established. By not collecting habitual patterns of the viewpoint of confusion, they are purified. These appearances arise as if they were pure, but since they arise from the viewpoint of dualistic appearance, they are false. The sutras say:

Nirvana too is like a dream, like illusion.

The buddhas appearing from the viewpoint of confusion have the false nature of an emanation, in Sanskrit nirmana, like the moon in water. Appearing while in fact they do not emanate from the space of the dhatu, dharmakaya and sambhogakaya; the pure nature of the buddhas dwelling in Akanishta is not false and non-existent. By confused conceptions, samsara and its joys and sorrows follow continuously one on the other, like a series of generations. Yet from that very time depending on the unborn nature of mind, there is neither samsara nor no samsara. Samsara is like a dream. From the time they arise within the confused sleep of habitual patterns, confused experiences do not exist at all. The Noble Sutra Requested by the Close Retinue says:

Minds terrified of hell thus have been taught by me:
Though many thousands of sentient beings have been saddened,
By death and transmigration going to the lower realms,
Those beings in actuality never really existed.

Whatever swords, great arrows, and weapons have come forth,
Even if they did harm, they have never existed.
Even as these weapons descend they do not exist.

A variety of pleasant flowers all in bloom
Elegant golden houses, with a pleasant glow,
None of these have ever been produced at all.
These are established in the power of conception
In the power of conception, the world has been imputed.
By fixating their perceptions fools have done that work.
Neither fixation nor non-fixation ever arise.
They are illusory thoughts, no more than a mirage.

In brief, meditate on these dharmas of imputed appearances of what does not exist as tenuous and ephemeral like the eight examples of illusion.

a) The way they arise

As for not fixating these illusions at all and meditating on them as being like the sky, dharmas:

Since all is non-entity like the selfless space of the sky
Meditate in this simplicity, the state of the unborn.
Realize external dharmas to be non-entity.
Realize grasping and its objects as natureless.

Those appearances without true existence, except as mere imputations, are really intrinsically non-existent, and are not complex objects. Meditate within that. Eliminate fixated thoughts of external objects, either as truly existent or truly non-existent. When it is realized that the grasped object is unperceived and inconceivable,⁴⁴² attachment to that, the mind with thoughts of grasping it, does not exist. Then the subsequent fixation too cannot exist. Because none of these objects have an essence, realize and meditate on this as dharmata beyond perception and conception. The Shri Samadhiraja Sutra says:

In limitless kalpas that are already past,
The principal ones of men were led by me.
The great Sage served them as a sturdy ship.
Names arose in the manner of non-things.
From the time they arose, they supremely existed as space.
All dharmas are taught to be in truth like space.

Then in accord with imputed characteristics,
Sounds resounded in all the various worlds.
All the gods emitted excellent sounds.
Unreality was the alleged Victorious One.

As soon as he was born, he took seven steps,
The Buddha all dharmas were taught as unreal.
The Sage who is the teacher of all dharmas
When the Buddha was victorious over all dharmas,
Like Grass, and toilet sticks, and medicinal rocks,
"Dharmas are unreal," the sound arose.

As many as the worlds, that many sounds:
"All unreal, entirely unreal."
Like that, the melodious sound phenomena
Of the leader of the world supremely rose.

b) The thirteen means of resting

a) Examining the mind

After meditating like that:

Then examine inner mind in the following way:
There is no essence in separating conceptions of mind.
Affirmations, negations, truth and falsity,
Joy as well as sorrow, and also indifference,
Project their different objects, yet we cannot grasp them.
Consider where we come from, and where is this we are now?
Where do we finally go, and what is our color or shape?
Examining this in our thoughts, this is what we shall see:

Various objects are defined as pleasant and unpleasant, existent and non-existent, true and false, joyful and sorrowful, and so forth. In reality, without any essence at all, at first they are without any cause of arising. Where nothing arises, nothing can endure. Therefore their endurance is essenceless. In what does not endure there can be no cause of cessation.

These objects are empty of individuating characteristics. They have no color, no shape, no manifestation. They will not be found externally, internally, or in between, even if we look for them. The example of this unfindable state is the sky. There is nothing to grasp or analyze. Objects are elusive, insubstantial, and completely pure. They arise in freedom from action and actor. This is realizing the natural state, dharmakaya. The Universal Bliss says:

As for the rootless nature of the mind,
Emptiness and suchness eternally so,
Inexpressible wisdom, naturally so,
Ungraspable, it is not found when looked for.

b) Resting naturally relaxed

At that time:

At this time, thinking no thoughts within our minds,
Relax like someone who suffers fatigue to the point of exhaustion.
Do not think about anything. Forsake intellectualizations.
Let everything rest in non-dual equanimity.

Letting go of the previous repetitious steps of conceptual analysis is like relieving someone exhausted by a burden. We reach the end of our struggle. It is gone. Relaxing into the natural state, without thoughts or mindfulness of anything at all, rest in the blissful brilliance of insight. Let ceaseless appearance go free and disperse like vanishing mist. The Dohakosha says:

That mind which has been bound in entanglements
Will doubtlessly be freed when these are relaxed.
The very things that are the bonds of fools,
Completely liberate those who are capable.

In general, meditate on the mind. When it is grasped one-pointedly, let its intrinsic emanations go as they like. That is relaxing in the natural freshness of dharmata. Discursive thoughts are like growing a tail. The same text says:

Bonds are our undertakings that go in the ten directions.
If these are abandoned, we rest stable and motionless.
Wrong understanding is realized to be like a tail.
Even children like you can directly perceive yourselves.

Like a raven on a ship, the mind emanates outward, saying, "I won't come back." Having apparently gone out to external objects, then it returns inside. There it dwells in self-existing realization of emptiness as before. The same text says:

Objects are pure. There are none to manifest.
One is coursing in emptiness alone.
Like a raven who flies up from a ship,
Having circled and circled, it must return.

When objects of form and so forth are emanated from the mind, they have no true existence. The mind is never dependent on them for an instant. Self-eliminated, they rest in emptiness with nothing to analyze; for example, as the raven, flying outward from a ship over the ocean, cannot depend on external objects, but returns to the ship.

c) How realization arises

The way of meditating:

We realize that the individual grasped as "I"
Does not exist as an independent, controlling ego.
The mind that fixates one also is without a nature.

By eradicating thoughts attached to self and ego and becoming accustomed to the reality that they are not to be found, the individual who fixates is egoless. Therefore fixation is natureless. Since former objects of grasping are essenceless, grasping too is realized to be essenceless. By the two kinds of self⁴³ being realized as empty, neither objects or the one who makes them arise within samsara are established. Samsara is liberated into naturelessness, the liberation of nirvana. This is because samsara is not other than mind. The Dohakosha says:

The nature of samsara is the essence of mind.

Directly know that fools are skewered by an arrow.⁴⁴⁴

With such realization, even if there is no liberation during this life, there will be in the next. The Four Hundred on the Middle Way says:

For anyone who knows this,
If nirvana is not attained,
Within a later life,
It will be without effort.

For example, even if experiencing great waves of happiness and unhappiness is impossible, there is the karma of experiencing nirvana later.

d) How to attain stability

After shamatha and vipashyana are individually stabilized:

Then they are unified as wisdom, the natural state.
Appearance and mind are non-dual, like the moon reflected in water.

When the moon arises in the water of a pond, there is no difference between the water and the moon. So at the time of appearance and the fixation of appearance, the mind that fixates is non-dual with appearance. Such false appearance is grasping. Grasping should not be understood as the apparent object. The apparent object and its emptiness are non-dual, like the water and the moon in water.

e) How it is non-dual

Though it is like that, by not understanding this:

Grasping duality is the confusion of samsara.
Awareness of non-duality goes to the peace of nirvana.
Therefore, let us train in this non-duality.
Dharmas are of the essence of mind, and thus unborn.
The nature of the mind is pure and undefiled.
Rest in this spotless simplicity, emptiness/luminosity.

By grasping what does not exist as selfhood, independent reality, the confusion of samsara, already grasped as terrifying, like water in a dream, becomes even more terrifying. Habitual patterns of confused appearance are stabilized when they are not established as anything other than confused appearances of mind. The mind that is the basis of arising of these confused appearances is also pure of nature. It too is essencelessness. Therefore there is no obscured by kleshas. The Uttaratantra says:

Since the nature of that mind is luminosity, the kleshas are seen to be essenceless.

Rest in immaculate wisdom, the essence unobscured by extremes, the essence of simplicity like the sky. Do not struggle with conceptual analysis. This obscures the nature of mind. Proliferating false conceptions are like a poisonous snake in a basket. Left alone, it does no harm; but it will if teased. Mind too should be left alone without effort and establishing or accepting and rejecting. The Song of the Oral Instructions of the Inexhaustible Treasury says:

As for the nature of mind, which is the natural state,
It is hard for anyone to realize.
As for the spotless essence undefiled by extremes,
No one should analyze primordial purity.
If it is analyzed, it is like what happens
To a person who teases a dangerous, poisonous snake.

The All-Creating King says:

Just as appearances are one in suchness,
Within this do not fabricate anything.
Rest in the uncreated king of equality,
The ultimate state, the non-thought of dharmakaya.

f) How the middle way free from extremes is realized:

The way of meditating:

By that the disturbances of kleshas are pacified.
We rest within the great wisdom, completely without conceptions.
Insight, samadhi, and higher perceptions are established.
We realize there are neither grasping or fixation,
As well as the middle way, which is freedom from all extremes.

Disturbances of the kleshas are pacified. By wisdom with neither grasping or fixation, the samadhi of complete non-thought, enlightened insight, the buddha qualities of liberation, the five eyes, and the higher perceptions are established. The Prajñāparamita-saṃgāthā says:

Dhyana eliminates baser qualities of desire.
Insight, higher perceptions, and samadhi are gained.

g) Free from anything to meditate on or a meditator, this is buddhahood

At the time of meditating:

At this time the mind is like the space of the sky.
In this space of simplicity no objects are perceived.
Within this dharmata there is no meditation,
Nor is there any object upon which to meditate.
There is no agent of action, and nothing to act upon.
This is the spotless purity of buddhahood.

At the time of that meditation, from the mind's sky-like freedom from emanation and gathering, apparent objects still appear; but since there is no conceptual grasping, these appearances are non-dual wisdom that does perceive dualistic natures. Since there are neither meditation or meditator, causes of action and their producer are liberated as they are. Dissolving mind and mental contents into space, we reach the space of the primordial nature. This is the goal, the nature of mind. This is abiding in self-existing realization, dharmakaya, buddhahood. The Dohakośha says:

Continuous buddhahood has no exclusions.
Since mind itself is essentially purity,
This itself is the spotless, ultimate level.

As mind and mental contents dissolving into the natural purity of the nature of mind, there is no motion of thoughts. They are like salt dissolved in water. The same text says:

Mind is motionless and stably resting.
As salt dissolves and disappears in water,
So the mind dissolves into its nature.
Self and other are seen as equality.

h) The way of realizing dharmata

At this time:

There is no grasping of objects by any perception/conception.
Any more than with a mirage, or the moon reflected in water.
Perceiving no fixation, impartial and undisturbed,
When appearance and mind are non-dual, the perfections will be there.
Let us appreciate the amrita of dharmata.
Deep and peaceful simplicity, uncompounded and luminous.

Externally, we realize that the five kinds of grasped object are like a mirage, or the moon reflected in water. Therefore, conception/perception attached to grasping thoughts⁴⁴⁵ as truly existent does not occur.

Internally, we realize that fixating awareness is partless like space, and that fixation is essenceless. Awareness with neither grasping or fixation, fresh reality, without intermediate processing by emanation or gathering, is the perfection of prajña. It is profound, peaceful, simple, naturally luminous, individual and personal wisdom. This is like amrita:

Profound and peaceful, simple and luminous, uncompounded
I have found a dharma that is like amrita.

This side is samsara. The other is nirvana. Perceiving neither, the three paths of learning between the two are the perfection of prajña. The Abhisamayalankara says:

It is not the extremes of this side or the other.
Nor is it a matter of dwelling between the two.
Knowing the three times to be equality,
This is maintained to be the prajñaparamita.

i) The way of the ultimate view

As for abiding within this, by the vast, great samadhi without fixation:

Let us cross the ocean of these three worlds of samsara
Within the vast ship of samadhi where grasping is never found,
Arriving at last in the nature of the great perfection.
Along with the bliss of the ground there is a constant well being.⁴⁴⁶

When we have crossed the ocean of samsaric complexities, abiding, as if in a ship, in realization of the view of the great vastness, the ground is primordial simplicity. The mind at that time is mixed with simplicity. This non-dual space and wisdom is called "the great perfection," so that is we have reached. Self-arising, unproduced realization perfects all goals. The All-Creating King says:

Kye, therefore as prophesied by me the doer of all,
Make unerringly stable the meaning of what you heard.
Arising from buddha activity free from action and seeking,
Unmade realization will complete all goals.

j) Identifying the defining characteristics of shamatha and vipashyana.

At the time of meditating, as the mind is quiet, without emanation and gathering:

Within this peaceful resting, or being, of shamatha,
A being which is the emptiness of dharmakaya,
Vipashyana is appearance of luminous rupakaya.
These are upaya and prajña and the two accumulations.
Both developing and perfection are established.

The non-thought emptiness of resting is shamatha. Its cause is dharmakaya, completing the accumulation of wisdom and prajña. Appearance because of luminosity is vipashyana. Its cause is rupakaya, self-accomplishing the accumulation of merit and upaya. At that time, the ultimate six conceptionless perfections are perfected. The Bhrama Special Mind Requesting Sutra says:

No fixation is generosity.
No guarding is discipline.
No dwelling is called patience.
No effort is exertion.
No wishing is known as dhyana.
No conception is prajña.

As for practice of these six, generosity and so forth, they are perfected not by dwelling on them, but by going beyond any thought of them. At this time true discipline is also perfected. The Sutra Requested by the Sthavira Devaputramati

When discipline and transgression are not perceived, this is called perfection of discipline.

The two accumulations are also perfected. The Ten Wheels of Perfecting the Bhumis says:

That non-conceptualizing is the accumulations of merit and wisdom.

The Ultimate Wisdom Sutra says:

The bodhisattva Pinnacle of Wisdom asked, "How should yogacharin monks gather the accumulations?"

The Buddha spoke, saying, What is accumulated is merit and wisdom. Accumulation is their manifold increase.

How is the accumulation of wisdom gathered?

It is generosity and so forth, white dharmas, which possess characteristics.

How is wisdom accumulated?

It is prajña and so forth, which possess no characteristics

How are these two gathered?

The accumulation of merit is called the accumulation of samsara. It is like, for example, the water in an ox's track. Why so? It is quickly lost and exhausted. It beguiles fools. Having experienced the happiness of gods and human beings, they whirl about once more in the lower realms.

The accumulation of wisdom is called the accumulation of nirvana. It is like the water in a great ocean. It is not lost. It is not exhausted. It is not deceptive. It produces attainment of nirvana. O Pinnacle of Wisdom, the accumulation of wisdom alone should be gathered.

The intention is that things belonging to merit are transformed into wisdom by dhyana, and that wisdom in that sense should be emphasized.

k) The functions or actions of shamatha and vipashyana

Arousing this prajña that realizes vipashyana,
We can remain within it because of shamatha.

Our previously becoming acquainted with the meaning of realizing vipashyana, depended on shamatha. Therefore we should certainly try to unify the two.

l) the time of realizing non-conception by becoming familiar with this

At this time of resting any attachment in equality:

When we no longer dwell in the mental phenomena

Of grasping and fixation of either things or non-things,
That is the non-duality of space and wisdom.
Mind and its objects are not perceived, and are pacified.

When one meditates in the genuine meaning, realization that grasping and fixation of things and non-things are natureless is the vipashyana that is "first to be done." Abiding within the state thus realized, without arising of the phenomena of mind is the shamatha, "to be done later" If space and wisdom are non-dual, union of shamatha and vipashyana as the fruition is established. Then these two should be known as inseparable. The Bodhicharyavatara says:

Neither things or non-things exist before the mind,
Other will be absent, in the peace of non-conception.

the six sections on

2) How to establish samadhi by becoming familiar with this.

a. The virtues of samadhi

How, by becoming familiar with this, are the virtues of samadhi established? Though the mind possesses these virtues primordially, when they are obscured by defilements, they do not appear. Meditating in shamatha and vipashyana, we have an opportunity to purify all these obscurations. When the false conceptions of mind dissolve into space:

Whenever the nature of mind, in primordial purity,
Is free from temporary, incidental false conceptions,
Then the nine dhyanas and miraculous experience,
As well as the various higher perception will be there.
Countless clouds of samadhi are spontaneously present.

When the incidental false conceptions of mind are purified, a host of good qualities are established, such as the nine dhyanas.

b. Explanation of the nine dhyanas

i) What are they?

When the mind, with desire to be in its natural place,
Meditates one-pointedly on anything,
With discursive thought and analytic discernment,
With bliss, and well-being, the first dhyana has arisen.
When meditation so analyzes without fixation,
That luminous mind of bliss and well being is the second dhyana.
When meditation neither conceives or analyzes,
Steeped in bliss and well-being, the third dhyana has arisen.
Then when meditation has gathered in its bliss,
There is the fourth with all the benefits of well being.

Here for mind with the wish for cessation, there are the four dhyanas, and the five formless attainments. These nine samadhis are the nine ultimate absorptions. Here, the mind of desire becomes one-pointed. The above-described union of shamatha and vipashyana is the wisdom of complete non-thought. By meditating within it, the mind of bliss, luminosity, and complete non-thought of wisdom are attained from the desirable support of being a human being. The support is attaining human birth with the freedoms and favors.

From access and the main meditation of the mind of dhyana, access is the preparatory stage.⁴⁴⁷ It is said that some do just the main meditation. Also each dhyana is said to be the access to the next.

1) When the mind rests one-pointedly, there is access to the first dhyana, which can handle anything. It has the discursive thought that one should meditate. By joining this to resting in complete non-thought, together with analytic discernment of the peak of mindfulness, there is the real object of meditation, the wisdom of non-thought. It examines thoughts and the boundary of meditation and post-meditation.

2) As for the second dhyana, from the access of the first, one joins non-thought only to analytic discernment without examination by discursive conceptual thoughts. The main object is luminosity and non-thought.

3) As for the third, from the access of the second, transferring by being without either examination of discursive thought or analytic discernment, the special main object non-thought arises.

4) As for the fourth, from the access of the third, together with joy and bliss attained by samadhi, the special object arises. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

The first dhyana has conception and discrimination.
The second discriminates without conception
The third's attention neither conceives or discriminates
Bliss-gathering attention is the fourth.

ii) How the mind attains formless dhyana

The mind of dhyana:

Then the mind is pure translucency like space.
This attains the ayatana⁴⁴⁸ of limitless space.
Then there is mind, without the complexities of all dharmas,
Attainment of the realm of limitless consciousness.
Then there is simplicity with neither mind nor appearance,
Attainment of the realm of nothing whatever.
Mind freed from complexities of existence and non-existence,
Is within the realm of neither existence nor non-existence.⁴⁴⁹ Then there is cessation of the nature of mind,
Composed of all the different complexities of the kleshas.
This is when the peace of nirvana is attained.

5) From the support of dhyana arise the special formless minds. First there is realm of limitless space. As all dharmas are pure like space, there is steady attention to the undefiled essence.

6) Limitless consciousness is mind-only. There is attention on limitless mind, without beginning and end.

7) As for nothing whatsoever, because of non-conception or non-thought, the mind sees nothing at all.

8) The peak of samsara is attention to mind beyond all extremes of existence and non-existence.

9) In cessation, all the complexities of mind cease. The Commentary on the Madhyamakavatara says:

Cessation occurs because all complexities of the mind cease.

To classify, after the mind examines and analyzes there is discriminating cessation. Not examining, resting in dharmata is non-discriminating cessation. Moreover, the cessation of the bodhisattvas, because of compassion, still looks after sentient beings. The Madhyamakavatara says:

Though this is indeed samadhi of all-inclusive cessation,
Compassion remains, arising for helpless sentient beings.

If it is asked, but then complexities do not cease, do they? In the compassion of the wisdom of complete non-thought, complexities do not exist. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

Within the nine ultimate absorptions, there is the goal, "I should produce absorption." In general in the dhyanas of ordinary beings and noble ones, aside from attaining the great fruition of the mind of equal space, there is the bliss of shamatha. Having thought, "all dharmas are like space," within that state, from the subsiding of the engagements of mind, one is impelled into the formless states of mind up to the peak of samsara.

Noble ones, in particular, by the wisdom of vipashyana, attain the unified nature that does not grasp dharmas as "me" and "mine." Having attained the mind of a great being, by attaining the supreme wisdom whose meditation sees as far as Akanishta, they pass beyond suffering to nirvana. Within this mind are all the virtues of the formless dhyanas. Though these samadhis are included within it, the mind does not have the individuating characteristics of those realms. Therefore, noble ones of the great vehicle do not fixate the arising of these realms.

iii) The way of practicing the nine dhyanas.

As just explained:

Then at the end we practice the skills of these nine dhyanas
Either in order, or out of order on the spot.
We shall have the knowledge, both for ourselves and others,
Of all the actions done in former and later lives.
We shall know the places where their minds will go.
Having completely eliminated the obscurations,
We shall see their deaths and births and transmigrations.
We shall manifest one and many emanations.
Because there are no kleshas, we shall have the wisdoms
That know the nature of dharmas and also their extent.
We shall see buddha fields filled with buddha-sons.

By meditating on the ultimate samadhis the formerly unknown eyes and higher perceptions become unobscured. There are miraculous displays, and the virtues of leaping up from bhumi to bhumi. Having seen the buddha fields, we listen to the dharma there, perfect the accumulations, and so forth. Finally, from the three ways of meditating on these objects, as for the yawning lion, having meditated upward by stages in the four dhyanas and four formless attainments, also meditate by stages downward as if one were climbing up and down a nine-runged ladder. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

If it is asked, "what is the samadhi of the yawning lion of a bodhisattva mahasattva?" it is like this. One fully attains the first dhyana. After saying, "I am resting there," after ceasing with that it is taught that after that one goes on up to the peak of samsara, and then back down to the first dhyana.

As for the lesser sudden approach, after having meditated upward on the dhyanas, formless attainments, and cessation, one should jump back down to the first and meditate there.

From the two sections of the greater sudden approach, going up to cessation in a similar way, meditate on the first dhyana. Having meditated on cessation, do likewise in each to cessation. Having entered into each, meditate on them by turns. As for entering into non-meditating mind, having arisen from cessation, produce the mind of non-meditation. So gradually meditate down until the first dhyana.

Similarly the way is taught that without the first dhyana, entering into the second, one should go upward to cessation, and meditate downward on each one. Then leave out the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, all eight, up to the eighth. Then meditate downward on each one. The Abhisamayalankara says:

In the nine dhyanas including the stage of cessation,

Both having gone and come in a twofold way,
Desire that realizes consciousness
Will grasp the border of non-meditation.⁴⁵⁰

As for the sudden approach, among the dhyanas
Having skipped the first and second and third,
The fourth and fifth and sixth and seventh and eighth,
Go up to cessation in different ways.
The eyes and higher perceptions have been discussed.

c. The time of attaining the three samadhis

At the time of attaining the special samadhis:

Fully realizing appearance as illusion,
We shall have attained the illusion-like samadhi.
Since disturbance is pacified, the mind is free from torment.
Then there is the samadhi like a spotless moon.
In a single equality no dharmas are perceived.
There is the samadhi like a cloudless sky.
There will be countless hundreds and thousands of such samadhis.

The single disk of the sun, by dispelling darkness is called the "light-maker". By radiating light rays, it is the "one with a thousand lights." By making lotus blossom, it is called "the friend of the lotus." It has many such different names. Similarly, when appearance is realized as illusion, one-pointedness on that is called the illusion-like samadhi. Pacifying the darkness and torment of the kleshas is the spotless moon samadhi. Realizing that all dharmas are like space is the cloudless sky samadhi. By the manifold increase of the virtues of these and other samadhis, within a single mind, hundreds, thousands, and countless others are attained. The illusion-like samadhi and so forth are taught in the sutras.

d. Briefly the relationship of vipashyana and shamatha to samadhi

Vipashyana is the meaning of total realization,
And proper shamatha will grasp this one-pointedly.
So retention and samadhi are in spontaneous union

The words and sense of the dharma, which have been well realized by discriminating vipashyana, are therefore one-pointedly grasped and kept in ones being by shamatha. As for vipashyana, within that retention, shamatha is resting in samadhi. The Blossoming Wisdom says:

Vipashyana is the keeper
Of the gate of Dharma.
Shamatha is samadhi.

Regarding that grasper, the Tantra of Well-establishing says:

As to the why of "keeper,"
There are three kinds of keeping.
Both words and meaning are kept,
And good karma kept from damage.
Because of keeping these,
It is called their keeper.

By that the details of the subject are completed.

C. The stages of the paths of meditation on this

There are explanations of the purposes of the paths of accumulation, preparation, seeing, meditation, and no more learning. With the final summary, there are six sections.

1. The path of accumulation

a. The lesser path of accumulation:

Now as for the particular paths and their divisions which should be known:

We are liberated by treading the five paths.

On the lower level of the path of accumulation

We should meditate on the four objects of mindfulness.

These four objects are body, feeling, mind, and dharmas.⁴⁵¹

Since all the buddhas attained enlightenment after having traveled over the five paths, their details are described here. The first, the path of accumulation, starts from the time of first meditating on producing the mind of supreme enlightenment. Until heat arises in one's being, the realizations of hearing, contemplating, and meditating along with the virtuous accumulations of samadhi are the path of crossing to the land of liberation.

The cause of this path is awakening the gotra, the enlightened family. This is dependent on the newly aroused bodhicitta of the mahayana. The fruition is the four subsequent paths. Semantically, it is called the path of accumulation because it chiefly "accumulates" hearing, contemplating, and merit.

Of the three divisions, in the lesser chiefly meditate on the four objects of mindfulness, body, feeling, mind, and dharmas, both in meditation and post-meditation.

Here in meditation meditate on the bodies of oneself and others as being like space. Post-meditation is like illusion. Also, as an antidote to desire, meditate on perceptions of impurity.

Feelings too in meditation are not conceptualized, and in post-meditation are meditated on as being hollow and insubstantial like a plantain tree. Turn the attention to suffering.

Meditate on mind as unborn and impermanent.

Meditate on dharmas as only names and merely illusory. The Sutra Teaching the Topic of Enlightenment says:

Whoever sees body as being like space, has the object of mindfulness of looking at the body with the body. Feelings are not conceived as internal, external, both, or neither. This is the object of mindfulness that looks at feelings. Mind is merely a name. By its nature it is unborn. Whoever sees this has the object of mindfulness of mind. Whoever sees all dharmas as non-dual has the object of mindfulness of dharmas.

b. The middle path of accumulation

After developing the former path from becoming familiar with it, meditate on the four means of true abandoning:

On the middle level of the path of accumulation

We truly abandon the four attachments to good and evil.

By yearning, effort, diligence, and exertion.⁴⁵²

So that non-arising of non-virtue will be produced, yearning is produced, and effort. One tries diligently and exerts oneself to abandon persons and so forth that produce the non-arising of virtue; and in order that its arising may increase, one produces effort and so forth, those four. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

Subhuti, what are these four true ways of abandoning. They are like this. In order that non-arising of the non-virtuous may be produced, one produces yearning. One makes an effort. One is diligent. One undertakes to exert oneself supremely.

c. The greater path of accumulation

On the greater meditate on the four legs of miracle.
yearning, investigation, contemplation and mindfulness.⁴⁵³

Meditate on the four legs of samadhi-miracle, yearning, investigation, contemplation, and mindfulness. The Mother says:

The yearning samadhi leg of miracle and these others, four altogether are taught.

On the greater path of accumulation, discipline is directed at enlightenment and we make an effort at yoga by binding the gates of the senses, understanding the proper measure of food and not sleeping in the first and last quarters of the night. By remaining conscientiously in non-accepting and non-rejecting there are delight, unrepenting happiness, joy, faith, devotion and other such virtues that are causes of liberation. By making an effort in hearing, contemplating, and meditating, we are joined to the path of preparation. Also from the lesser path of accumulation one starts gathering the accumulations for three countless kalpas. The Summary of the Vehicles says:

Those with the powers of fortune and ripening,
Becoming specially supported minds
As bodhisattvas over three countless kalpas,
They will make an effort it is taught.

At the time of meditating on the four objects of mindfulness, the time of arising of the path of preparation is uncertain. As for the particular antidotes of this path, when we have conceptually seen how formations do damage, the antidotes completely eliminate them. As for what is abandoned, when we have seen the faults of defiled dharmas, the corresponding attachments that make them manifest are cut off and abandoned. As for what is realized, mostly the two egolessnesses are realized in a general way through hearing and contemplating. There is also the arising of realization from meditation. The General Compendium says:

Prajña arising from meditation is also relevant.

As for qualities, there are the eyes, higher perceptions, and all kinds of others. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

At that time from out of the stream of Dharma
From the buddhas there are shamatha and vast wisdom,
Extensive oral instructions will be attained.

Also:

Dwelling completely within the gates of Dharma,
One is instructed by seeing tathagatas,
As if led away from strife and contention,
One is led from the manifold thickets of faults
To be established in true enlightenment.

At the time of attaining the greater path of accumulation one is mindful of the three prajñas of hearing, contemplating, and meditating, the three jewels, and the three characteristics of all compounded things as impermanent defiled and painful. All dharmas are empty, selfless, nirvana and peace. These are the four mudras of Dharma. Also faith, exertion, mindfulness, samadhi, and prajña are the five according with liberation, not arising within the essence of the senses. One meditates on discipline and generosity, the free and well favored body and birth, and the inhaling and exhaling of the breath. If the practice is completely performed, one should meditate on impure perceptions and the eight thoughts of a great being.

In preparation, first meditate on taking refuge and arousing bodhicitta. To accomplish the final purification, meditate on the nine impure perceptions. These are that the dead body of oneself and others become:

- 1). rotten
- 2). worm-eaten
- 3). bloody red
- 4). green
- 5). black
- 6). devoured
- 7). scattered
- 8). burned
- 9). decomposed.

For desire meditate on impurity, for hatred kindness, and for ignorance interdependent arising. The Sutra Requested by Pungzang says:

Desire is mostly eliminated by one's having viewed
Impure flesh and fat, and skin and skeletons.
Aggression by the stream of kindness and compassion,
And ignorance by the path of interdependent arising.

As for the Eight thoughts of a great being, the Commentary on the Twenty-thousand says:

One thinks the thought, 1) "I am always able to remove suffering from sentient beings," and the thought, 2) "I am always able to establish beings who are afflicted by poverty in great wealth," and the thought, 3) "A body of flesh and blood can always be of use to sentient beings," and the thought, 4) "I could always benefit sentient beings by staying in hell for a long time," and, 5) "By worldly and world-transcending great wealth, I can always fulfill the hopes of sentient beings," and, 6) "Having become enlightened, I could always eliminate the sufferings of sentient beings," and the thought, 7) "the arising of what does not benefit sentient beings, the taste of the absolute being analyzed away as unity, words that do not make all beings think, livelihood that does not benefit others, and likewise body and prajña and wealth and power, and rejoicing in doing harm to sentient beings--in all generations may these never occur," and the thought, 8) "because the fruition of the evil deeds of sentient beings always ripens in myself and the fruition of my virtue always arises in them, may they be happy."

Meditate on these together with taking refuge and arousing bodhicitta. Moreover, as taught before, meditate in the realm of complete purity.

2. the path of preparation

Then there is the explanation of the path of preparation:

There are four divisions of the path of preparation.
In the stages of heat and peak we meditate on the five powers⁴⁵⁴
Faith and energy, awareness samadhi and prajña.
In patience and highest dharma these five are the five supreme forces.

The support of the path of preparation is beings of any of the six realms in whom the greater path of accumulation has arisen and been finished. Countless gods, nagas, asuras, and so forth for whom it arose are described in the sutras. The support of thought is any of the six desire or samadhi levels. The cause is finishing the greater path of accumulation. The Small Commentary says:

According with liberation, for delighted sentient beings there are therefore the aids to liberation.

The essence is the worldly wisdom arisen from meditation. The four divisions are heat, peak experience, patience, and highest dharma. There is meditation in the stages of heat and peak experience on faith, exertion, mindfulness, samadhi, and prajña. They are called powers because they actually produce the power of arousing bodhicitta. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

Faith and these others are explained as powers.

Moreover there are the four wisdoms of the four paths of preparation. First, as for the heat of the mahayana, in attaining the wisdom of appearance, all dharmas are seen merely as mental appearances. By non-attainment the arising of worldly meditation, the antidote to grasping the true existence of objects is produced. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Like that for bodhisattvas,
Within their meditation,
Except as expressions of mind,
All objects are unseen.

As for such appearances, certainty in the dharma produces mental patience. The Sutra of Possessing the River Gate says:

As for patience with the appearance of knowables, the thought of certainty in the dharma is the designation of the word.

That is also presented in the Mahayanasutralankara commentary. Peak experience is the wisdom of intensified appearance. Because the appearance of dharmas is intensified, by making an effort to meditate on egolessness, meditation on appearance arising as the middle way is attained. The Sutra of Possessing the River Gate says:

In order to intensify
The appearances of dharmas,
One should make a total
And persevering effort.

Patience is an aspect of the wisdom of suchness. Meditation-arisen appearance is grasped as consisting of mind-only. Supreme attainment of that produces an antidote for attachment to external objects. The same text says:

As for having intensified
The appearance of all the dharmas,
One should dwell in mind only.
Then all appearances,
Will truly appear as mind.
At this time distraction
Of grasping will be abandoned.
The distraction of fixation
Then will remain alone.

As for the highest or supreme dharma, the immediately preceding wisdom undistracted grasping of the meaning arising in meditation on mere appearance is completely perfected. There is nothing between this and attainment of the path of seeing of the mahayana. The same text says:

At that time unobstructed
Samadhi is quickly reached.

The four aspects of ascertainment are each divided into three as lesser, middle, and greater, making twelve altogether. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Thus in terms of the aspects of ascertainment,
There are lesser and middle, and the great.

As for the particular antidotes, suppression is the antidote of abandoning. In general the four kinds of antidote are:

- 1). antidote of eliminating,
- 2). antidote of abandoning,
- 3). supporting antidote,
- 4). antidote of keeping one's distance.

Of the two kinds of abandoning antidote, suppressing abandons by keeping down manifestations. In abandoning from the root the seeds are also cleared away, as with an unobstructed path. As for the special characteristics of abandoning, the seeds of obscuration and their manifestations are kept down, and one is liberated from the poverty and degeneration of individual beings. As for the special characteristics of its realization, by the wisdom arising in worldly meditation, the two egolessnesses are realized in an abstract way. As for the virtues, it is taught that from clouds of the three jewels there are many samadhis, dharanis, higher perceptions, and so forth.

As for what makes the path of preparation higher than the path of accumulation, though it is without distinction from the greater path of accumulation in meditation arising, in terms the wisdom of complete non-thought not being very clear, the two are distinguished as relatively near and far from the path of seeing. The Great Commentary on the Eight Thousand says:

If there are no obstacles, this "very nearly arising of the path of seeing," should be known as especially according with the aspect of liberation.

3. The path of seeing

Then as for first seeing the wisdom of the noble ones:

The path of seeing occurs at the first bhumi called "supreme joy."
Here we meditate well on the seven limbs of enlightenment.
Joy and shinjang here are added to the five powers.

On completing the great supreme dharma, there is the arising of the wisdom of the path of seeing. It has the nature of sixteen moments. For each of the four noble truths:

- 1) suffering
- 2) the cause of suffering
- 3) the cessation of suffering
- 4) the path leading to cessation there are:

- 1). acceptance of knowing dharmas
- 2). knowing dharmas
- 3). acceptance of subsequent cognition
- 4). subsequent cognition

As for these sixteen natures, The Abhisamayalankara says:

According with the four truths of suffering and so forth
There are dharma knowledge, and subsequent cognition,
With the acceptance of each, the instants of these natures,
And the way of knowing all these, is called the path of seeing.

The commentary says:

Of the individual truths, acceptance of knowing dharmas, knowing dharmas, acceptance of subsequent cognition, and subsequent cognition, as for the natures of these sixteen moments, on the occasion of knowing all these, there is the path of seeing.

The body of a being that is the support of this wisdom is one with the greater supreme dharma. It may be that of any of the beings of the six realms. It is not the seeing of the view of the shravakas. The support of thought is the four dhyanas. The main cause is finishing the level of supreme dharma. Accumulation and preparation are the external causal factors. The fruition is production of the subsequent two paths. In the essence, by dividing the four noble truths, depending on defilements of the dhatu being abandoned, there are the sixteen moments. From the defilements and antidotes, as for the first, there are five kinds of defiling views. These are:

- 1). views of a transitory collection,
- 2). views that fixate extremes,
- 3). wrong views,
- 4). fixating a view as supreme, and
- 5). fixating discipline and asceticism as supreme.

Also there are the five defiling non-views of doubt about these. By the ten kleshas of these ten defiling views arise in the desire realm, there is a wrong way of entering each of the four noble truths. There are forty wrong ways altogether.

For the two above, defiling views and non-views, for each of the four truths, there are also nine times four times two wrong enterings due to the nine bases of enmity, or seventy-two. Thus, all the kleshas abandoned by seeing, are $72 + 30$ or 112. The Universal Compendium says:

As for the hundred and twelve kleshas, those are the kinds of kleshas to be abandoned by seeing.

As for enmity not entering into the four levels of dhyana and the four formless attainments, since one's being has been moistened with shamatha, the nine tormented states of mind which are the bases of enmity are absent. Within these nine are

A. the three thoughts regarding oneself

- 1). This has harmed me before.
- 2). It will do so now.
- 3). In the future too, it will do so.

B. the three analogous thoughts about harm to friends

C. the three analogous thoughts about benefit to enemies

As for the ways of wrong entering by these kleshas, taking the truth of suffering as an example:

- 1) By the view of a transitory collection, within the truth of suffering one fixates me and mine.
- 2) By the view that grasps extremes, within the truth of suffering one fixates the extremes of existence, non-existence, eternalism, and nihilism.
- 3) By wrong view, one grasps the truth of suffering as non-existent.
- 4) By ignorance, one enters not knowing the characteristics of the truth of suffering.
- 5) By doubt, one enters doubting whether the five skandhas do or do not suffer.

Within these five ways of entering,

- 1) Because of attachment to desire, desire is produced.
- 2) By pride, haughtiness and arrogance are produced.

- 3) By fixating the view as supreme, the supreme ultimate is fixated.
- 4) By fixating discipline and asceticism as supreme, one fixates the path to purification and liberation.
- 5) The way of entering with enmity toward what does not accord with these five, produces aggressive thoughts.

Entering the other three truths should be similarly understood. Moreover, the name of the truth of cessation is conceptualized, and one does not perceive the real entering of it.

As for the divisions of the antidotes, by seeing the kleshas of the three realms, the kleshas which are to be abandoned are abandoned. Here for the truths of suffering, its cause, cessation, and the path, there are the four acceptances of knowing the dharmas.

These characteristics cannot be within in one mental substance within one instant of arising time, since there are four aspects individually regarding the four truths, seeds of being seen and abandoned, and since the completely abandoning antidote is not without obstruction. They are abandoned by a hundred and twelve separate instants of seeing and abandoning.

Moreover, the direct cause of acceptance of knowing the dharmas of the individual four truths, and the corresponding things to be abandoned are encountered as two potencies. At a second time, the main cause and its corresponding to-be-abandoned are encountered as two non-potencies. At a third time, the arising of the four dharma acceptances and all their corresponding to-be-abandoned subtle seeds are abandoned in the manner of being simultaneously made to cease. The Uttaratantra says:

As the sprout and so forth gradually arise,
As the husk of the seed is cut and split apart,
So by having seen the ultimate nature of suchness
What is abandoned by seeing is driven out.

In the one mind-substance, the individual dharmas of the four truths are an antidote that is a path of complete liberation from the kleshas, which are aspects of those four truths about the three realms. Similarly with the four acceptances and the four subsequent knowledges, this is the path of the special antidotes of keeping one's distance. These abandonments also deal with the two obscurations. They liberate from these two. The Center and Limit says:

The two-fold obscurations
Of kleshas and of knowables,
As for those obscurations
When they have been exhausted,
That is called liberation.

As for the distinctions of these two, The Uttaratantra says:

Where there are thoughts of avarice and so forth,
These are called the obscuration of kleshas.
Where discursive thoughts of the three realms,
These are called the obscuration of knowables

The obscuration of kleshas is the avarice and so forth of an unpacified mind, whose essence is likely to be obscured by unhappiness.

The obscuration of knowables is thoughts of grasping and fixation, the object and perceiver without freedom from attachment to the true existence of the three realms, where the essence is likely to be defiled or obscured by unhappiness.

False conceptions of the obscuration of the kleshas are abandoned by seeing. The co-emergent kleshas are abandoned by meditation.

As for the obscuration of knowables, coarse thoughts of grasping and fixation are abandoned by seeing. Subtle ones are abandoned by meditation.

As for the distinctions of realization: By world-transcending prajña, the two egolessness are realized in perception. The qualities are the previously mentioned hundred and twelve of the first bhumi.

As for the distinction of time, first by the revelation of the four truths there is the one time of the four acceptances. After that, there arises the one time of the four knowledges. After that arises the one time of the four acceptances of subsequent cognition. After that, by the arising of the single time of the four subsequent cognitions, in the four moments of completing the action, the essence of four kinds and sixteen aspects arises. There is simultaneous realization of the four truths, and so the four acceptances gradually arise.

Those things abandoned by seeing are instantly abandoned by acceptance of the Dharma. This happens in stages over the four aspects of the path of seeing.

Moreover, at the time of the first bhumi, one meditates on the seven limbs of enlightenment. What are they? The Spiritual Letter says:

Mindfulness, investigating dharmas, and exertion
Joy, shinjang, samadhi, and equanimity;
These are the seven limbs of enlightenment.
This assembly of virtues makes one attain nirvana.

How so? The Sutra Teaching the Side of Enlightenment says:

1) Manjushri, for whomever there is no mindfulness and therefore no attention, seeing all dharmas as unreal is the limb of enlightenment of true mindfulness.

2) Manjushri, for whomever, because of completely not practicing virtue, non-virtue, or what is neutral, all dharmas are eliminated and unperceived, there is the limb of enlightenment of true investigation of dharmas.

3) Manjushri, for whomever, because of having destroyed perception of a body, there is neither accepting or rejecting of the three worlds, there is the limb of enlightenment of true exertion.

4) Manjushri, for whomever because they have destroyed joy and non-joy, all formations do not produce joy, there is the limb of enlightenment of true joy.

5) Manjushri, for whomever, because conceptual things are not conceived, the mind has become completely trained for all dharmas, there is the limb of enlightenment of shinjang.

6) Manjushri, for whomever, because they think of all dharmas as destroyed, mind is not conceived, there is the limb of enlightenment of true samadhi.

7) Manjushri, for whomever, because they do not dwell on anything, depend on anything, produce passion, or produce bondage, there is equanimity whose sight does not follow after dharmas, this attainment of joy is the limb of enlightenment of true equanimity.

d. The path of meditation

Because of becoming familiar with what has been seen:

There are lesser, middle, and greater paths of meditation.
Each of these again has been divided in three.
From lesser lesser to greater greater there are nine.
These are stainless, light-producer, and brilliant shining;
Difficult to conquer, presence, and far-going,
Immovable, good understanding, and finally cloud of dharma.
On these we travel over the noble eight-fold path,
Right view, right thought, right speech, right action, right livelihood,
Right effort, right mindfulness, and last right meditation.

The path of meditation accords with the true meaning seen on the path of seeing, producing ever higher familiarity with this. The Abhisamayalankara says:

With the path of seeing Ascertain the limbs.
With the path of meditation,
Contemplate over and over.
Encounter and true perception
Are the path of meditation.

Within the path of meditation there are lesser, middle, and greater, again divided into three, so that there are nine in all. What are they?

The lesser lesser is the second bhumi, the spotless one.
The middle lesser is the third bhumi, the light producer.
The greater lesser is the fourth bhumi, the brilliantly shining.
The lesser middle is the fifth bhumi, the one difficult to conquer. The middle middle is the sixth bhumi, presence.
The greater middle is the seventh bhumi, the far-going one.
The lesser greater is the eighth bhumi, the immovable one.
The middle greater is the ninth bhumi, good intellect.
The greater greater is the tenth bhumi, the clouds of Dharma.

Regarding these nine levels, the same text says:

As for these nine bhumis, the greater greater and so on
They are antidotes to defilements, lesser of lesser and so forth,
On these paths those defilements will be purified.

What is abandoned by meditation also has greater, middle, and lesser, and they are similarly divided into nine as greater greater, middle greater, lesser greater, greater middle, middle middle, lesser middle, greater lesser, middle lesser, and lesser lesser. On the nine levels of the stainless one and so forth they are gradually abandoned.

Moreover, these go from the lesser lesser, the second bhumi, the stainless one, on which the greater greater defilement is abandoned by meditation, up to abandoning the lesser lesser defilement to be abandonment by meditation on the greater greater path of meditation, the tenth bhumi.

These terms have the approach that coarser defilements are called greater and subtle ones lesser. The bodily support arising on these paths of meditation is the same as for the path of seeing. For the most part they are men and women of the three continents and gods of the desire and form realms. Other births are possible, and so the bodily support that has achieved birth can be any. The same text says:

The fields and the practice exist like an illusion,
Samsara is received according to one's thoughts.

The support of mind is said to be mostly the four dhyanas and whatever others there may be. The cause is the first three paths. The fruition is the path of no more learning. The essence, is that depending on the antidote for abandoning particular defilements on the nine bhumis there are

- 1) union,
- 2) the path of non-obstruction
- 3) the path of complete liberation
- 4) the special path.

These also abandon the obscurations of those bhumis. Union and the path of non-obstruction are the antidote of abandoning. The path of complete liberation is the antidote to the support. The special path is the antidote of keeping one's distance⁴⁵⁵.

For example, at the instant of the arising of the wisdom of the second bhumi, by the finish of the previous one of the first, manifestations of suppressing kleshas that obscure the second are abandoned.

While the wisdom of the second arises unobstructed, the corresponding apparent seeds of mischievous discipline, intrinsic but uncertain in their manifestation, are completely abandoned.

In the second instant, there is the main object. By the path of complete liberation, the antidote to the support is produced.

At the end of the bhumi, the level of the special path is the antidote of keeping one's distance.

From the first instant of these bhumis until they are finished, their individual obscurations are abandoned in this way. These defilements are completely exhausted and abandoned at the same time the bhumi ceases.

Here these days some coarse describers of the perfections say that all abandonings by seeing are abandonment on arising. They maintain that all that is abandoned by meditation is abandoned by the path of cessation. By this stupid kind of antidote guarding and dharms are seen as being the same thing. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Here by bodhisattvas, at the time when this spotless one has completely arisen, the defilements of mischievous discipline are completely abandoned.

From that, up to the tenth aspect of defilements that do not accord with the tenth bhumi, at the time when these bhumis arise, having been abandoned on the path of non-obstruction, by the path of complete liberation the antidote to the support is produced, until by the special antidote, the obstruction of keeping one's distance is abandoned.

Moreover, if all that is abandoned on seeing is abandoned by meditation on things as they are, how can these things be abandoned at all?

The quality was already explained in the case of the previous bhumi. As for how the 9 defilements of the 9 bhumis are abandoned, there are six co-emergent stains:

- 1) desire,
- 2) enmity,
- 3) pride,
- 4) ignorance,
- 5) the view of a transitory collection,
- 6) the view that fixates extremes.

By divisions of the realms, in the desire realm there are all 6. Within the dhyanas and formless attainments, enmity is absent, so there are 5 and 5 there, 16 altogether.

By the levels, in desire there are 6. There are 4 dhyanas + 4 formless attainments. With those 8, counting 5, there are 26. [46?]

Divided by greater and middle, the 6, plus greater and middle [and another?] desire = 9. In the other 5 are also 9 each, = 54.

In the 4 levels of dhyana, since enmity is discarded, the greater middle 5 kleshas are 9 and 9 of 45. [?]

Similarly in the formless realm, there are 45 in 5 sets. By combining them, those things abandoned by meditation are 440. [?]

The way of abandoning is that by union they are suppressed. By having no obstacles they are really abandoned. By complete liberation, the antidote to the support is produced. By the special path by the means of producing the antidote of keeping one's distance, within the nine bhumis the manifestations and seeds are abandoned.

Within these bhumis one completely meditates on the eight-fold noble path. The Spiritual Letter says:

Right view, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness
With right samadhi are limits placed on speech and action.
Right thought is concerned with the eight limbs of the path.
Meditate on these for the sake of producing peace.

The Sutra Teaching the Side of Enlightenment says:

Manjushri, wherever someone sees all dharmas as without inequality and non-dual, this is right view.

Manjushri, wherever someone sees all dharmas as unseen, seeing them as without thought, without conception, completely without discursive thought, this is right thought.

Manjushri, wherever someone sees all dharmas as inexpressible, this is right speech.

Manjushri, completely establishing all dharmas in a manner without effort and without establishing is right effort.

Manjushri, seeing all dharmas without engaged attention and mindfulness is right mindfulness.

Manjushri, since all dharmas are not conceptualized, they are naturally at rest in meditative equality/equanimity. Seeing them in the non-disturbance of non-conception is right samadhi.

If one looks at the intrinsic essence of these bhumis, it is beyond conceptual thought. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

As for these bhumis of the buddha-sons, their appearance is utterly and completely pure, like the track of a bird in the sky.

By clearing away the details obscuring the dhatus, they are transformed into the ultimate dhatu, and one looks with the vision of buddhahood. This is differently presented. At the time of the final purification of individual defilements, the primordial space of the dhatu or luminous buddhahood is seen in its intrinsic luminosity, like the moon appearing by the power of the time of the month. The Praise of Dharmadhatu says:

Just as in the cycle of the moon,
It is seen to grow from moment to moment,
So the ones who dwell upon the bhumis,
Are gradually seen to be increasing.

Just as on the fifteenth day of waxing,
The circle of the moon is round and full,
So at the completion of the bhumis,
Dharmakaya is said to be complete.

e. The path of no more learning:

Reaching the end of practice on these four paths of learning,
Involved with the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment,
Then we reach the final path of no more learning.
Here in non-dwelling nirvana we pass beyond suffering.

When accumulation of the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment on the paths of learning is finally complete, the level of no more learning, the enlightenment of buddhahood manifests. Here the bodily support, according to the ordinary vehicles, is of the bhramin or kshatriya castes of Jambuling. According to the mahayana, it is maintained that by attaining the sambhogakaya realm of Akanishta, the buddha is born with that as a support. It is the same as the support of a sattva of the tenth bhumi.

The support of thought is the four dhyanas. The cause is the four paths of learning of the mahayana. The fruition is establishing limitless beings in enlightenment by the great buddha activity. As for the essence, the inexhaustible body, speech, mind, quality, and action of the level of buddhahood is the sphere of the ornament. As for abandoning, the two obscurations together with their habitual patterns are abandoned. The Vajra Peak says:

The kleshas and likewise birth,

And likewise the obscurations
Of kleshas and knowables,
Completely incompatible,
These classes are overcome.
That is the explanation
Of ultimate buddhahood.

As for the distinguishing characteristics of the realization, one realizes complete perception of dharmakaya. The commentary to the Uttaratantra says:

Bhagavan you have limitless comprehension of dharmakaya
Limitless knowables pervading the space of the dhatu are seen.

As for the qualities, all the limitless world-transcending qualities are perfected. The Precious Mala of the Middle Way says:

By the buddhas, other than that,
In the palace of omniscience,
That vastness is expressed
By saying they have the ten powers.
As for each of these powers
The alaya of beings is already immeasurable.
The immeasurableness of the buddhas,
Is said to be comparable
To the space of all the directions
With its earth, water, air, and fire.
It is said to be just that.

6. The final summary expressing the purpose of the paths and bhumis

Now the final summary tells the purpose of these paths and bhumis.

No buddhas have ever arisen anywhere at all
Without having first gone through these ten bhumis and five paths.
Liberated through many lives in many kalpas,
This is the path where all of them have placed their trust.
Those on the vehicles of either cause or fruition,
Must learn these paths and bhumis and travel over them.

It is impossible that unsurpassable enlightenment should arise without fully completing the paths and bhumis. The Sutra of Buddhas and Beings says:

Those who attained the kalpa's buddhahood
Who became its lord steersmen, all of these Arose by having traversed the paths and bhumis.
Therefore desiring the treasury of the Buddha,
Supported by ultimate buddhahood, strive on these.
Aside from this path, it will not rise from another.

Whether buddhahood is attained over many kalpas, in ten lives, six, and so forth, or very quickly in one life, one must travel according to the paths and the bhumis. That is because the obscurations of these must be purified and their good qualities perfected. These days, when people try to attain buddhahood without depending on the paths and bhumis, the accumulations are not perfected. The obscurations are not purified. Exponents of this manner of maintaining say that without completing the paths and bhumis enlightenment is attained, and that the same blessings manifest in another way. But this would contradict the great learned and accomplished ones of the sutras and tantras, and the great treatises. Therefore, try to train in the genuine paths and bhumis.

D. The dedication of merit

Now as for the dedication of the merit to perfect enlightenment, this true way:

When all beings by this essence, profound and luminous,
Have thoroughly pacified disturbances of mind,
Exhausted by long belief in complexity here in samsara,
May the mind today relieve its weariness.

Cooled by the appearance of the rain of this good presentation of this true, great path, by the quietly falling water of merit flowing into the filled ocean, when the disturbance of the kleshas of beings have been completely pacified, may this nature of mind exhausted by the beginningless complexities of samsara ease its weariness in the hermitage of the natural purity of dharmakaya mahasukha.

May the mirror-like wisdom, the great full lake of dharmata,
In equality of non-thought, free from the stains of extremes,
Reaching the goal of renunciation/realization,
Fulfill without remainder all the hopes of beings.

Those who wander alone in the darkness of ignorance,
Oppressed by suffering in the torments of the three fires
Sightless and separate from the path of liberation,
Not remaining here, may they soon attain nirvana.

Though they have the freedoms and favors without exception,
They are impermanent and essenceless.
Having abandoned all unwholesome evil deeds,
Without exception may they attain enlightenment.

XII The Commentary on Chapter 12: THE LIMBS OF THE PATH OF SKILLFUL MEANS IN ESTABLISHING SAMADHI

Having practiced in that way, we are unified with the ultimate fruition, buddhahood. Now

XII. The chapter on actions of benefit has three sections. These are

- A. The instruction to train in dhyana
- B. The cause of establishing the teaching of the three immovable samadhis
- C. The dedication of merit.

A. The instruction to train in dhyana.

Having explained the extremely profound way of meditation, now the truly established nature of its limbs will be discussed. As just explained:

Thus, in order to unify our meditation,
There is training in the three limbs of unwavering samadhi.

The essence of the path to be perfected, the special dhyana, also has three limbs of union by which it will be perfected.

B. The three immovable samadhis

there are two sections,

1. The brief teaching
2. The extended explanation.

1. The brief teaching

These three limbs are like this:

The first is the procedure⁴⁵⁶ for the one who wants to achieve it.
The second is the means of how we ought to practice.
The third is non-duality, the essence of the practice.

All true samadhi involves these three:

- 1). The individual by whom it is established
- 2). The means for establishing it
- 3). The essence which is established.

2. The extensive explanation

There are three sections

- a. The procedure by which it is established
 - b. The skillful means by which it is established
 - c. The three-fold essence of the practice of non-duality.
- a. The procedure by which it is established

There are five parts of the procedure, for the one who wants to practice.

- 1) the practice for renunciates,

First the individual:

Those who practice this must have renunciation,
Keeping their bodies far from the bustle of civilization;
Keeping their minds far off from the host of complexities;
In such a way, samadhi will quickly be established.

With body and speech disturbed by the bustle of activities, and mind disturbed by a thousand nets of complexities, if one does not even practice shamatha, why speak of samadhi? Therefore, keep the body far from the rat-race, alone in a solitary place like a remote forest. Keep the mind far from the host of complexities. Then within one's being, moistened by shamatha, profound samadhi will be established. The Samadhiraja Sutra says:

Prince, therefore those desiring samadhi should forsake places disturbed by bustling activity, and exert themselves while remaining alone in a solitary place.

It will not be established, while living in a house. The same text says:

Whoever stays inside or outside a house
As for attaining completely pure enlightenment,
Such a buddha has never arisen yet.
They do not exist, and never will.

- 2) That those who are disciplined and have heard much will establish samadhi:

They should have faith and humility as well as modesty.

With care and pure discipline, they should delight in goodness.
Knowing much and desiring little, they are content.
In such a way, samadhi will quickly be established.

By having faith, it will be established. By having faith in the Dharma, one enters and remains, and one's excellent faith will therefore increase more and more. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

For persons who have faith
White dharmas arise by themselves.

With "humility as well as modesty," meditating in samadhi, enthusiastically not giving up, one will produce yogic union. These take care of guarding the mind from disturbance, and so samadhi will be established. The Sutra on Ultimate Samadhi says:

By care, humility, and modesty
Ultimate deep samadhi will be established.

Regarding establishing it by discipline, the former text says:

Having discipline and staying with that,
One will attain the excellent peace of samadhi.

Rejoicing in virtue and having heard much, having few desires and knowing what is enough one will establish samadhi. The Moon Lamp says:

Desiring excellent qualities, and knowing what is enough

Having heard much of the Dharma, but reducing personal baggage,
Staying in solitude, rejoicing in being alone,
By this it is not hard to gain this supreme samadhi.

3) Establishing it by abandoning the five obscurations:

Controlled in mind and body, they love to stay in solitude.
They abandon the love of chatter, and being drowsy or lazy.
Neither wild or regretful, they have little to ask of others.
In such a way, samadhi will quickly be established.

PL Uncontrolled body and mind, wildly discursive, contradict the path of peace. Living in cities and such places swarming with people, one will be distracted, and vipashyana will be interrupted. A place of relationships with many people and dear friends is a place of passion and aggression contradictory to samadhi. Those whose samadhi is damaged by delight in talking will obscure and hinder its arising. They will therefore give birth to much hostility and contention. If these are abandoned, samadhi will naturally develop, and the dharma of the Victorious One will be grasped. The former text says:

Without preoccupations, delighting in solitude
With few acquaintances, pure of sleep and laziness,
Neither depressed or manic, body and mind are controlled.
By that it is not hard to gain supreme samadhi

The Wisdom Mudra says:

One's body far from crowds, completely devoted to peace,
As graceful as a deer, will be the cause of non-dwelling.
Like air within the sky, without desire for things;
One will grasp the Dharma of the Victorious One.

4) Its being established by staying in solitude with few activities:

Without the bustle of cities and people who live in them,
In solitary places with little need of support.
They have no connection with various goals and actions.
In such a way, samadhi will quickly be established.

Those who depend on and frequent cities, the people who are part of them, crowds, and places where people congregate, rather than remaining in solitary places as renunciates, because of the completely distracting objects and many activities of this life, non-dual never establish the samadhi of peace. When we live with few associates, objects and activities, wholesomeness will naturally develop. Samadhi will be established, because there will be many proper attentive apprehensions of the mind. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

Future monks, easy going, not controlling distraction,
Infatuated with property and being reverently served,
Will just get angry with anyone who is disciplined.
Those desiring samadhi should not attend on these.
Rather staying alone, they should put extremes to rest
Living like that they should rejoice in solitude.

With only proper attentions, they will produce transcendence The Spiritual Letter says:

Really trying to see the ultimate absolute,
Becoming accustomed to training in proper kinds of attention--
There is no other Dharma than having such virtues as these.

5) For those having the family of the mahayana it will be established:

Caring little for happiness in this life or the next,
Or to attain nirvana for their own benefit,
Desiring liberation for the sake of other beings,
They are sad with samsara and have renunciation.
In such a way, samadhi will quickly be established.

These remain in peaceful solitude, entrusting themselves to samadhi for the benefit of others. Aspiring to the self-serving peace and bliss of the shravakas and pratyekabuddhas is not the path of holy beings abiding in the great vehicle. They do not wish for the fruition of happiness in this life or the next or for peace as a benefit for oneself. These individuals are sad with samsara, and practice dhyana with an attitude of renunciation, for the sake of the sentient beings of samsara. The True Samadhi says:

Completely not desiring the happiness of samsara,
Free from the wish of seeking solitary peace
For compounded beings one has a feeling of sadness
Because of that, supreme samadhi is established.

None of the joys of this life are desired. In particular, train in diminishing personal baggage by purifying the craving for wealth. The Spiritual Letter says:

Like evil villains, and poison, weapons, foes, and fire
The mind of happiness is expelled because of desire.
Therefore liberate the skandhas from desire.
The Lord of Sages taught that their fruit is like a kimba⁴⁵⁷
Therefore abandon it. By being bound in its chains,
In the prison of samsara these worldly ones are bound

Within, sexual passion is what must chiefly be abandoned. The same text says:

Separate yourself from women with princess bodies.
Do not crave the nine holes of such a stinking vessel,
Like a vessel of everything filthy, covered by skin and ornaments,
See it as something that properly ought to be put aside.

The Objects of Mindfulness says:

Woman produces ruin
In this world and the other.
Do yourself a favor.
Have nothing to do with them

The Bodhisattva Pitaka Sutra says:

Even If one examines a thousand world realms, there is no enemy like my wife.

In brief, the idea is that the most predominant kleshas in our being should be examined and rid of first. All attachment for objects of the six senses should be abandoned. The Spiritual Letter says:

Whoever is stable, for the objects of the six senses
Always unstable and forever moving about,
With the attitude of war, must conquer these enemies.
At first the capable will have to be very brave.

And also:

Gambling and physical pampering.
Lazy good for nothing associates,
Boozing and night-time tomcatting,
And addiction to nasty gossip,
These six should be abandoned.

By grasping our own dharma as supreme, we disparage others, and doubt profound Dharmas. We will grasp the impermanent as permanent, the untrue as true, the erroneous as ultimate, and the suffering of samsara as happiness. These last four errors entirely unite one with samsara, so these are the chief things to abandon. The same text says:

Though we grasp ascetic discipline
Supremely with the body,
The four errors, views, and doubts
Completely united these three
Block the gates to the city
Of ultimate liberation.
This should be well known.

In particular, if there is gain there is joy, and if loss sorrow; and if there is happiness there is joy and if unhappiness sorrow; if one becomes famous there is joy, but if disparaging and unpleasant things are said, there is sorrow; when there is praise, we feel joy, and, when there is blame, sorrow. These eight worldly dharmas should certainly be abandoned. The same text says:

Joy and sorrow,
Loss and gain,
Praise and blame,
And pleasure and pain,

These, by the Worldly-wise
Are called the eight worldly dharma.
Let us produce equanimity
For these non-objects of mind.

In regard to establishing the seven riches the same text says:

Purity and discipline,
Learning and generosity,
Spotless perfect humility,
Modesty, and prajña,
These are the seven riches
As they were taught by the Sage.

Householders and so forth should encourage others to virtue and establish supportive activities. The same text says:

Hurting people and theft,
And sexual peccadilloes,
Desire for drinks and snacks,
Delight in high seats and music
Dances and special garlands--
Abandon these and follow
The discipline of the arhats.

If one has these eight limbs,
Reconciliation,
Desirable activity,
A pleasant godlike body
For men or women is taught.

In brief, meditators dwelling in solitude, by the discipline of their vows restrain the mind from what is associated with evil activity. By the discipline of gathering wholesome dharma, samadhi, liberation, and so forth that were not possessed before are established. Wholesome dharma that were formerly possessed increase. We spend our time day and night on the side of wholesomeness alone. By the discipline of performing benefit for sentient beings, those remaining in samsara are urged to virtue. Those desiring the Dharma who have gone wrong in the ongoing rules of discipline, those whose Dharma was too much for them, should be made to rejoice. Finally, do not injure even birds, beasts, insects, ants and such sentient beings. Giving them food and so forth, speak the name of the Tathagata, proclaim the names of the three jewels, and always think that even these will certainly get enlightened eventually. Always think, "May these be liberated as my retinue," and "Even these may be emanations."

Having thought that, arouse devotion and sacred outlook. Even if it exists now today produce matchless apprehension of separation and impermanence. Not even for an instant being mundane, let the mind spend time only with the wholesome.

b. how this is accomplished by the limbs of the skillful means of practice

There are two sections

- 1) General means of practicing shamatha and vipashyana,
- 2) Individual means of practicing shamatha and vipashyana,

1) the means of practicing shamatha and vipashyana, has three parts.

a) Abandoning and antidotes

Two meanings/benefits:

Then in regard to the limbs of practice,
These five obscurations ought to be abandoned:
Being drowsy, dull, discursive, disconsolate, or doubtful.
Practice the union of shamatha and vipashyana.
Being drowsy and droopy will obscure shamatha.
Discursiveness and depression disrupt vipashyana.
Doubt harms both, incompatible with either one.

Yogacharins have five obscurations of dhyana. Within true shamatha revealing clear luminosity, by being drowsy and droopy, depression is produced. Within the one-pointed lucency of vipashyana, by being discursive or disconsolate, proliferation of thoughts is produced. When there is doubt, neither shamatha nor vipashyana is established. As for drowsiness, or sleepiness, entering into it involuntarily, the mind is gathered up. Dullness is a neutrality where objects are not clearly known. These should be abandoned. The Spiritual Letter says:

Discursive-disconsolate; malicious; dull and drowsy;
Interested in desire; and being doubtful.
These five obscurations are errors about the wholesome.
It should be known that they are plundering thieves.

Discursiveness and disconsolateness are taken as one. Drowsiness and dullness are one. With interest in desire, malice, and doubt there are five.⁴⁵⁸

b) Clearing away hindrances:

These five obscurations can be summarized
Under the headings of drowsiness and discursiveness.
If there is drowsiness, we should try to refresh our practice.
If there is discursiveness, meditate one-pointedly.

Drowsiness and dullness are depressive sinking, so meditate trying to adopt a refreshed and revitalized attitude. If there is discursiveness about other things or people, try to meditate on the nine means of resting.

c) Relying on unifying the antidotes

It is like this:

Vipashyana without shamatha is discursive complexity.
Without vipashyana, shamatha will go nowhere.
It is the highest path when these two are combined.
This is the antidote for the two obscurations.

Prajña unmoistened by shamatha is only verbal understanding. Shamatha uncompleted by vipashyana, is neutral and cannot be expected to elevate one above the seeds of samsara. Therefore, try to unify them. The Spiritual Letter says:

Without any prajña, samadhi does not exist.
Without samadhi, also there is no prajña.
Where there are both, the black ocean of samsara,
Will have be searched for like the tracks of cattle.

2) Individual means of practicing shamatha and vipashyana,

Of the two individual explanations of shamatha and vipashyana,

a) shamatha,

There are four sections

i) The cause of its being established,

Here first:

When body, speech, and mind, and intellect are at ease,
Then it can be said that shamatha is established.
There is equanimity with the natures of all dharmas,
The chief ancillary is that all conceptions are pacified.
In samsaric style, the mind is grasping a single object.

The complete non-thought of samadhi is established by putting the three gates completely at ease. By putting the body at ease, the nadis are put at ease. By putting the nadis at ease, prana is put at ease. By putting prana at ease the red and white essential elements are at ease, naturally collecting in the petals of the four chakras and so forth. Then the mental resting of shamatha is naturally established. This is because the supports of mind, the elemental essences, motionlessly collect in one place.

Within this, the nature of mind continually exists in its natural state, even, uninterrupted ungraspable, inexpressible equality that does not come, go, or remain anywhere at all.

The half of this that is the aspect of vividness and transparency is vipashyana. The aspect of being and resting is shamatha. Their non-duality is called their union. Because it always exists in all beings, luminous clarity is easily encountered when there is the remedy of exhaustion through natural motionlessness and so forth. Whatever is done by the yogin, whether emanating or resting, by knowing shamatha/vipashyana where everything is left as it is without fabrication or defilement, there is liberation.

ii) The way of grasping the object

As for the way in which the mind grasps a single object:

One kind has an apparent object and one does not.
Either kind can be external or internal.
In all that makes four ways the object can be grasped.
When there is an apparent object of shamatha,
It will be form and such, the objects of the five senses.
That without form is one-pointed resting in non-thought.
External objects are things like rocks and trees and statues.
Internal ones are like the inverted heart-center lotus

First, as for the way the mind grasps, in shamatha with an apparent object, the mind rests with constant and motionless one-pointedness on form, sound, smell, taste, and touchables, whatever objects there may be. Internally, unsupported by appearance, the mind grasps complete non-thought.

Within the body, on bodies of gods, mantric syllables, or the downward-opening heart lotus and scepters and emblems, the chakras and so forth, or by meditating on light and so forth, the shamatha of the five complexities arises in shamatha which is predominantly bliss.

Externally, if one grasps rocks, trees, images of bodily forms, and so forth without distraction, also the clear and luminous half of shamatha will arise. Here because predominating complexities are grasped as external, their proliferations are grasped as internal. By the diminishing of thoughts, if they are grasped as internal, by drowsiness predominating, they will be grasped as external. Moreover, by the mind having first grasped something with characteristics, afterwards the state without characteristics will arise.

Those who do not know this, if their minds grasp bodily forms and so forth, go into complexity, so when they say they are resting in a state without complexity of nothing whatsoever, they miss the point. This is the speech of those with little experience.

Here though one's mind seems to be steadily on/directed toward something, at the time of first being directed toward that, a thought precedes it. Then, not remaining on the appearance of that object, the mind without emanating and gathering is substanceless, pure, and vivid, like an autumn sky free from clouds does not rest there and cannot possibly do so.

In a state without appearance, even if the mind grasps, further damage will not occur. If there are such faults, one will not be harmed by drowsiness or discursiveness and cannot possibly be. In brief, not entering into the appearance of objects, with a mind resting free from emanation and gathering is called dhyana. Whatever the mind grasps, whether with or without appearance, by realization of bliss and the experiences of luminosity, and non-thought, the ornament, the great non-fixation free from extremes, must arise. If it doesn't arise, there are faults. If it does arise, the samadhi of genuine dhyana in which upaya and prajña are non-dual will arise within us.

iii) The limbs of means:

In brief:

To rest the mind one-pointedly on a single object
Is the means by which shamatha will be established.

The object on which one wants to rest is one pointedly grasped by the mind. Then by the nine means of resting the mind, it should be stabilized.

On that object the mind should

- (1) rest and
- (2) continually rest.

If it emanates outward, the mind should be

- (3) brought back to resting.

As one becomes more and more assiduous, there is

- (4) thoroughly resting.

When that has produced joy, there is

- (5) taming,
- (6) pacification of the faults of distraction.

When sleepiness, dullness and so forth have been cleared away, there is

- (7) complete pacification.

Non-emanation of other produces

- (8) one-pointedness.

By not struggling with that, there is

- (9) resting in equanimity.

The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

Resting the mind, continually resting, bringing back to resting, taming, pacifying, complete pacifying, one-pointedness, and resting in equanimity.

iv. The means of practice:

When one-pointed shamatha has arisen by means of this,
By reason of its stabilization and spreading outward,
The wisdom of vipashyana will proliferate.
It is important to gain the benefit of this
That it should be mixed with everything we do.

Relying on this, in freshness of both body and mind,
We should meditate as is described before.
It will quickly be established by doing this.

It is not achieved merely by the condition of the mind's having achieved one-pointedness, since that is not suitable for mixing with vipashyana. At that time one-pointedness is mixed with vipashyana, clear seeing of illusion and so forth. Also shamatha is mixed with emanation and gathering and so forth. If this is not done, after the mind has been distracted by emanated objects, by meditating as before, attaining self-control over the object on which one wants to rest, and the period for which one wants to rest, and the way in which one wants to rest, the power of resting and disengaging will arise. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

By that, having made that increase,
By that increase having gone far,

The main practice of resting will thus truly be attained.

b) Vipashyana

There are eight sections

i. The principal feature and the subsidiary aspects that are like its retinue.

Having trained in shamatha:

For whoever wants the clear seeing of vipashyana
Within the limpid clarity of the luminous mind,
Discriminating awareness is the principal aspect.
Being and resting within the equality of non-thought Exist in the form of a retinue surrounding that.

At the time of shamatha, within luminous mind, the clear state of looking at the nature of dharmas is the principal feature, like the ruler. The luminous aspect of the mind of non-thought, not emanating, exists as the retinue or the ordinary people.

ii) Training in the skill of discriminating vipashyana

Discriminating vipashyana:

Here there are the two aspects of dharmin and dharmata.
The dharmin is viewed like the eight examples of illusion.
As for dharmata, the way that we should train
Is that phenomena are the emptiness of space.
By resting within suchness, wisdom will arise.

From stabilized meditation, examine in detail the essence of these external appearances, the dependent arising of the dharmin, appearing as dream, illusion, and so forth. Meditate within that as long as is desired. The Ten Circles of Kshitigarbha Sutra says:

All these dharmas are like
An illusion or a mirage.
A dream or trick of the eyes,
An echo or emanation
Like colored scarves of a dancer
These should be realized.
I bow down to this
As an excellent field of merit.

Looking at it like that, rest without mental struggle in dharmata, the naturally existing unborn, like space. The Precious Treasury of the Unborn says:

Not realizing anything, also not thinking anything,
Create nothing artificial; let the nature be.
That is the precious treasury known as the unborn.
All the victorious ones of the three times have gone there.

Meditating in that way, within the realization that all objects are like illusion, do not enter into fixation. Within realization of the nature like space, arises the wisdom of unobstructed objects of appearance, the natural wisdom of simplicity, emptiness/luminosity. The All-Creating King says:

Kye! As for me enlightenment, the doer of all, the king,
I am a perfect mirror that looks at all the dharmas.
All that rises is natureless in luminosity,
It is taught that by not looking there is the luminous nature.
Within the realm of suchness, which is the unborn, Realize the great seeing, without any objects to look at.

iii) The benefit of training in drowsiness and discursiveness as play

In the pond of this vipashyana meditation:

In relying on this, we should train on the various dharmas as play,
Viewing them purely as non-dual illusion and emptiness.
When there is proliferation, we should compose the mind
Within the equality that is found in shamatha.
At this time in luminosity like the sky
We see in simplicity the empty, luminous essence.
This frees us from the two-fold clouds of the obscurations.

Sometimes there rises the luminosity like an ocean.
Within its clarity, what arises is liberated.
It is important to gain the benefit of this,
And that it should be mixed with everything we do.
Thus vipashyana will quickly be established.

In the pond of vipashyana, the unborn, proliferate many dharmas of denying, affirming and so forth. Train in them as a play of vividly insubstantial illusion, passing the pass into non-dual illusion. If thoughts emanate, meditate as before in shamatha. Relying on that state, meditate on the eleven apprehensions below.⁴⁵⁹ Moreover, examine the conceptions of independent arising and so forth. If because of these there is emanation, meditate in shamatha and do not analyze. If by this there are conceptualizing thoughts, put the mind in a state of non-thought that does not flicker with conceptual analysis. To prolong this, contemplate the reason for completely grasping the mind. Contemplate the reason of shamatha, not moving the mind from resting. Contemplate the reason for vipashyana, the half of luminous clarity. Contemplate the reason for non-dually mixing luminosity and emptiness in union. Contemplate the reason for equanimity, the natureless equality of all dharmas. The Middle length Prajñāparamita says:

- 1 Apprehend with thoughts and analytic discrimination;
- 2 Without thoughts, apprehend with just analytic discrimination
- 3 Apprehend with neither thought nor analytic discrimination.
- 4 Apprehend shamatha.
- 5 Apprehend vipashyana.
- 6 Apprehend their unity.
- 7 Apprehend the reason for completely grasping the mind.
- 8 Apprehend the reason for shamatha.

- 9 Apprehend the reason for vipashyana.
- 10 Apprehend the reason for their union.
- 11 Apprehend the reason for equanimity.

That is the meaning. If the mind emanates, tame it. If it becomes drowsy, refresh it. By training in the skill of uniting shamatha and vipashyana, the ocean and waves arise like luminosity that has become space. The object that is the mind's reference points rest without fixation in luminosity/emptiness. This is unharmed by the waves of flickering thoughts that are self-liberated at the very time of their arising as our own nature. Like clouds and the sky, as the imputations of vipashyana becoming space, the luminous nature of mind is seen, changeless, free from stains of artificiality, naked luminosity/emptiness. Even if mind exists, it exists within dharmata. Confidence is attained that it is primordially pure of existence and non-existence. By manifestation arising as the play of dharmata, whatever appears is known as the play of wisdom. This is the time when conditioned appearances are liberated as naturally arisen wisdom. By seeing the essence of one's own mind as trikaya, one is liberated from the dharmas of characteristics of effort and establishing. The All-Creating King says:

Kye ho, listen to me now O mahasattva!
 As for dharmakaya, it is bodhicitta.
 As for Bodhicitta, it is dharmakaya.
 Not even an atom was fabricated by anyone.
 Therefore, there is neither buddhahood nor mind.

As for Sambhogakaya, it is bodhicitta.
 Bodhicitta likewise is sambhogakaya.
 All the different forms arising from the mind
 Are not anything else other than sambhogakaya itself.

As for Nirmanakaya, it is bodhicitta.
 Bodhicitta likewise is nirmanakaya.
 There is no other producer of benefit for beings.
 All of the buddhas throughout the three divisions of time
 Are not anything else than bodhicitta itself.

Previously, the buddhas abiding in the past
 Saw self-realization of unfabricated mind.
 At this time the buddhas dwelling in the present
 Are the realization of unfabricated mind.

Now they do benefits for others, sentient beings.
 In time to come for buddhas arising in the future,
 This naturally existing nature of the mind
 Is not destined to have its former fabrications,

Now the mind of samadhi has no fabrications,
 Having remained to the end on the path of non-fabrication

iv) Having trained in both, as for inseparably uniting them

Thus having trained individually in shamatha and vipashyana, inseparably unite these two so that awareness and emanation rest in equality/equanimity:

In the union of shamatha and vipashyana
 It is equal whether awareness rests or proliferates.
 Both are primarily the wisdom of non-thought.
 The encompassing style of this unification is its freedom
 From all the complexities of existence and non-existence.]
 Both within the principal wisdom of non-thought

Are the retinue of undisturbed simplicity.

As for "union," when the excellent essence of luminosity/emptiness arises, emanation and resting are not contradictory. The main point is wisdom that does not grasp apparent objects, the freedom from confusion of non-thought. The nature of awareness that does not move from this state exists as a retinue. Though the principle thing is always the non-dual nature of mind, at the time of meditating in shamatha/vipashyana this is easy to realize. Therefore, it possesses those means of non-distraction as a retinue or aspect. Nagarjuna says:

When grasping and fixation
Go into non-duality,
Not different from the nature,
They are said to be in union.

At that time, by the subsiding of incidental complexities, the nature of mind, goes into the ground, like water poured into water. There is no division in their equal taste. The Dohakosha says:

The mind of the natural state,
For the yogin in unity,
Should be known to be
Like water poured into water.

v) The non-duality/dual non-existence of arising and liberation⁴⁶⁰

At the time of abiding in that union, concepts:

Because we rest in the state of letting things be as they are,
By their very arising things are liberated.
Therefore we are resting within equality,
Unifying shamatha and vipashyana.
Bliss, luminosity, and non-thought will then arise.
Appearance and emptiness are the spontaneous presence
Of upaya and prajña, developing and completion.

Like waves being pacified within water, whatever thoughts arise, instantly having gone into natural arising as they are, rise and are liberated at the same time, this is vipashyana, clear seeing of liberation by arising. This accumulation of merit with appearance is the spontaneous presence of the developing stage.

Self-pacified intrinsic self-awareness⁴⁶¹, abiding with luminous clarity, is shamatha. It is the perfection of the accumulation of wisdom which is without appearance. Their unified nature primordially abides as spontaneous presence of mind. The All-Creating King says:

Knowing this, abide undistracted in the real,
Do not make any effort or train the mind in antidotes.
Do not postulate objects or rest in mindfulness.
Whatever arises then will be the meaning itself.
So enter into my world--be the doer of all.

vi) Meditation to train in the skills and to dispel.

By meditating in this union undefiled by fabrication:

Moreover we should train in the individual skills
Both of shamatha and of vipashyana
As antidotes for discursiveness and drowsiness.
And if drowsiness and discursiveness increase,
We should meditate in order to dispel them

In addition to vipashyana, one should meditate on shamatha. By meditating in vipashyana when there is drowsiness and shamatha when there is discursiveness, there will be liberation from these faults.

vii) The explanation of what is gained:

When there is the benefit, like a clear and cloudless sky,
Looking into total space with the sun at one's back,
Simple awareness of emptiness/luminosity rises.

At the time of a cloudless sky, when faults have been put behind, look with the outlook of the ushnisha. The luminosity/emptiness that indeed arises at that instant is the wisdom of union. The Prajñāparamita-samgatha says:

Examine the pure space which is the meaning of this.

viii) How the outer, inner, and secret luminosities arise.

At that time:

Outer space is pure, but only an example,
Of the greater inner space of the nature, dharmata.
The secret space is the heart of luminosity.
Know realization as being composed of these three spaces.

When we look at the example of external space, the meaning, self-awareness actually arises. As for the arising of the realization of secret wisdom, this is what all the instructions of the ultimate meaning are really teaching. The Dohakosha says:

However, the sayings of the guru should be viewed as one.

Also:

Entering into the essence of the sayings of the guru
Is like seeing a treasure placed in the palm of your hand.

The All-Creating King says:

If one wants to realize what this truly means,
Mix with the example, the purity of the sky.

The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

As for producing the yogic union of the perfection of prajña, union with space is produced.

The Dohakosha says:

The nature of mind should be grasped as being like space.
The nature of space should be grasped as being mind.

The example is the luminous, empty, unobstructed outer space of the sky. Awareness at this time too is luminous, empty, unobstructed wisdom. That is inner space.

That empty, luminous, simple wisdom arises co-emergently with the experiences of bliss, luminosity and non-thought. By that all dharmas are self-liberated into the characteristic of space. This liberation of all fixations of things and characteristics is the secret space of the great luminosity. At that time, there are the ten signs of smoke and so forth,

- 1) smoke
- 2) mirage
- 3) firefly
- 4) lamp
- 5) blazing
- 6) moon
- 7) sun
- 8) Rahu
- 9) cha shas or mchog gi cha
- 10) bindu seeing.

and the appearance of the five lights [bindus of the five buddha family colors]. By the entering of prana and mind into the central channel, space is completely illuminated. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

From the nature without conception and perception,⁴⁶²
Come the varied phenomena of the mandalas of light.
These several luminosities that shine in the center of space,
By expressing variety, have never risen at all.

Signs of true and stable samadhi arise within one, even if one does not want them.

c. The practice of non-duality,

From the eight limbs,

- 1) The great perfection beyond accepting and rejecting,

Third meanings:

The limbs of the essence are establishing non-duality.
This is the great perfection, where all is of equal taste.
Accepting and rejecting are things that should not be done.
Cast away attachment to any objective reference.
Attachments to the grasper are the formations of samsara.
Without fixated objects, as it is in space,
There is no bondage and also there is no liberation.

The essential nature is beyond effort and establishing and accepting and rejecting, like space. Realizing this is the view. Not being distracted from this is meditation. Therefore, having become aware that this meditation is beyond existence and non-existence, accepting and rejecting, and hope and fear, attain stability by meditating in this samadhi. Since here there is no thought of improvement, why speak of any other meditation. The All-creating King says:

Since desiring bliss is the sickness of desire,
By not desiring bliss, bliss will be received.
By establishing buddhahood, there is no establishment.
The nature that need not be sought is spontaneously present.
Do not conceptualize, and the nature need not be sought.

Also:

Kye mahasattva,
If you wish to establish the nature of your own mind,
As it is self-established when you are without desire,
Do not establish the equanimity of non-thought.

Rest in the sphere of the nature that does not accept and reject.
Naturally rest in the state of natural motionlessness.

As for mind, the essence of it is suchness.
All of the dharmas, likewise, are established as suchness.
Do not fabricate within the state of suchness.
Do not establish anything other than the essence.
If it is sought, the buddha-space will not be found.

It was already made, it need not be made now.
It was already established. That need not be done again.
Meditate in non-thought. Don't realize anything.

If fixation and attachment exist, one will not be liberated from samsara. The Song of the Oral Instructions of the inexhaustible Treasury says:

If the mind of yoga is drunk
With the poisons of hope and fear,
Co-emergent wisdom
Will be bound in place
Having no reference point,
We will be beyond bondage
As well as liberation.

The same text says:

The ultimate vajra mind
Has neither hope nor fear.

Even going to hell,
We will not suffer there.
Even in fruition,
There is no more to gain.

Having abandoned benefit
And harm by pleasure and pain,
By good and evil actions,
These will not grow and diminish.

Wanting a better Buddha,
Besides this non-duality
The realization of wisdom,
One should be called a fool.

2) The teaching of the meaning of this by example

As for the extensive explanation of this nature of dharmata beyond accepting and rejecting

For example:

Like various reflections and the surface of a mirror,
Such are the various dharmas and the state of emptiness.

As reflections are not something other than the surface of a mirror, all dharmas should be known as emptiness. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

In a pure and luminous mirror,
As reflected natures appear,

All dharmas are reflections
To be truly viewed as unborn.

3) The example of assertion and denial

Just like various clouds within the space of the sky,
Such are various affirmations and negations
As they are found within the space of the nature of mind.

Accumulating and dissipating moment by moment, clouds do not move from the space of the sky. Similarly, whatever affirmations and denials arise within the space of the mind do not move from the space of the nature of mind. The Newly-strung Mala of Oral Instructions says:

All clouds are within the sky.
All thoughts are in dharmata.

4) The example of realized experience:

Just like various rivers in the expanse of the ocean,
Is realized experience in the space of meditation.

As tributary streams are one in the ocean, experiences of realization are of one taste with the meditator. The same text says:

Within the limitless ocean of precious qualities,
All the various waters of experience
Flow together and then they are naturally motionless.
A stable mind is characterized by wish-fulfillment

5) The example of samsara and nirvana:

Like various illusions and the space of emanation;
Such are the variety of samsara and nirvana
Emanating within the space of dharmata.

Illusions are natureless from the time they appear. Just so, be aware that samsara and nirvana do not move from dharmata. The Sutra Requested by Bhadra says:

Dharmas, in the nature of illusion,
Are taught as emptiness of any essence.

The Dohakosha says:

That which is samsara is that which is nirvana

6) The example of mind and the nature of mind:

Like the space of the ten directions that is without a ground,
Is the state that views eternally liberated dharmas.
As water pours into water without duality,
So mind and the nature of mind cannot be separated.

The space of the sky has no different natures; so all dharmas are of non-dual nature. The All-Creating King says:

Just as the sky is inseparable,
All dharmas are inseparable.

When water is mixed with water, they are not two. When thoughts that arise within the space of the nature of mind dissolve back into the ground, these also are not two. The Golden Mala says:

As water dissolving in water is not two,
So it is with mind and the nature of mind.

7. The example of thought and non-thought:

Just like various dreams within the state of sleep,
Such is the state of the action that does not accept or reject.
Just like an ocean and the waves within its waters,
Such is equality of discursiveness and non-thought.

Dreams do not move from sleep. So all that is accepted and rejected is of one taste in non-duality, the same text says:

Dreams are luminosity in the Space of sleep.
Dharmas are luminosity non-dual from emptiness.

Waves are made of water. They are not something other than water. Thoughts and non-thought are the same. The Dohakosha says:

So long as there are emanations of mind,
So long there is the nature of lord Buddha.
Can there be otherness of water and waves?

8. The example of hope and fear:

Just as we are happy with a successful business,
There are neither hope or fear within fruition.
Know the monolithic state of the great perfection
To be the all-encompassing space of dharmata.

When we successfully take care of business, the mind is in a relaxed and comfortable state without hope or fear. Just so, having gained conviction that buddhahood is one's own mind, one is relaxed and comfortable within that. The same text says:

If a mad elephant should get its mind together,
It will stop coming and going, and start resting at its ease.
Thus for realization, there is nothing else to look for.

If this state of the nature of mind, self-arising wisdom without accepting and rejecting, is fully complete, there is liberation from perception of the characteristics of action and seeking. The All-Creating King says:

This path has no completion of anything at all Perfect as one, perfect as two, perfect as all,
It is therefore the bliss of the perfection of action.

It is perfect as one as perfect bodhicitta.
It is perfect as two as perfect actions of mind.
It is perfect as all as perfection in its fullness.

By this teaching of the unity of perfection,
One will dwell in realization of buddhahood.
By the reality of this perfection of everything,
Everything is really made to be complete.

Whoever so abides within this established action
Whether this body is that of a god or human being,
Is enlightened in dharmata, benefiting beings,
With effortless non-establishing, dwells in perfect bliss.

C. The dedication of merit

Now the merit of these sayings is dedicated:

Thus by the single taste of difference as non-dual,
All beings are liberated from self as well as other,
From grasping subject as well as fixations of the object.
Exhausted here within the confusion of samsara
By the perception and conception that "this is it,"
May mind this very day relieve its weariness.

This supremely wondrous merit, vast and non-dual, is like immaculate space. May those in the realms of beings, exhausted in samsara by the confusion that grasps duality, though they have become far-distanced from this, as a hundred light rays of merit are emanated by the bhumis and divine realms, ease their weariness in the pleasure grove of the Buddha Bhagavat, built of flowers.

Realms of the gods adorn the sky above the earth,
Arising on red supporting feet of spotless light,
To these seven levels of noble ones may all beings cross.
May they have the vast wealth of the Buddha's treasury.
In their mountain peaks and forests may they be delighted with lands of herbs adorned with flowers and flowing water.
Because of having passed through this life successfully,
May liberation and its qualities be established.
As the moon, only beautified by being wreathed in clouds,
Makes white kumut lotuses stretch into space and bloom,
By this may the "good light rabbit"⁴⁶³ of peace be grasped.
For beings without remainder, may there be the ground of life.

XIII. The Commentary on the Thirteenth Chapter: THE FRUITION, THE GREAT SELF-EXISTENCE

Now that becoming a vessel of tantra through the vehicles of external cause has been properly discussed, finally after the action of the direct cause has been completed, there is the fruition, the path of the luminous vajra essence.

This thirteenth chapter is about the manifestations of the fruition, the kayas and wisdoms.

The overall topic has four divisions:

- A. Establishment of the kayas and wisdoms,
- B. The explanation of the kayas and wisdoms.
- C. The final summary of how these arise from space and subside into space.
- D. The dedication of merit.

- A. Establishment of the kayas and wisdoms,

By reaching the end of the path the kayas and wisdoms are established. The details of the ground and path have been presented. Now the fruition established by them will be discussed. As just explained:

Thus having reached the goals of both upaya and prajña,
The kayas and wisdoms and buddha activity self-exist.

When the virtues of the path are complete, enlightenment or buddhahood is attained. Free from all defilements of the dhatu, the luminous nature of mind, the sun after all obscuring clouds have faded away, is the kayas and wisdoms. These are neither acquired nor separated. "Attaining them" is manifestation of their self-existing power. The Uttaratantra says:

Here the "luminous nature" is like the sun and space,
Separate from the dolorous host of obscuring clouds,
Incidental obscurations of kleshas and knowables.

Spotless buddhahood possessing all good qualities,
The eternal enduring swastika of perfect buddhahood.
This is attained by depending on discriminating wisdom.

At this time, within the space of the benefit for oneself, ultimate dharmakaya, by attaining trikaya with neither acquiring nor separation, realization of buddhahood without other, exists as a support. The same text says:

Without beginning, middle, end, or discrimination,
Without a second or third, or defiling discursive thoughts,
By realizing dharmadhatu, which is the nature of things,
This is what is seen by the yoga of meditation.

More radiant than a million palaces of the gods,
Having unthinkable qualities, matchless and supreme;
As for this spotless space of the tathagatas,
It has abandoned all faults, and all their habitual patterns.

Within that space appears dharmakaya. From that sambhogakaya is produced, always abiding with neither increase or decrease like the moon in space, but intermittently appearing from the viewpoint of those who are to be tamed. From that comes nirmanakaya, the ground of emanation. The same text says:

Apparent variety, kaya of light rays of Holy Dharma,
Strives to establish the benefit of freeing sentient beings.
Its deeds are like a king of wish-fulfilling gems.
Variety is real, but the nature of it is not.

The Madhyamakavatara says:

The kaya of peace is luminous like a wish-fulfilling tree.
Like a wish-fulfilling gem, it is inconceivable.
Till beings are liberated, it is always there
To benefit the world, appearing as simplicity.

This is realized only by the buddhas. It does not appear to those who are to be tamed. The three kayas of the space of the dhatu are of one taste with the solitary space of dharmakaya. Within that, they exist as the subtle wisdom of that space. From the blessing of that and from the aspirations of those who are to be tamed, appear the two rupakayas. The pure buddha activity of wisdom arises as the appearance of an external other. These are like the moon in the sky and the moon in water. These days, when some proclaim trikaya as totally one, it follows that all the buddha qualities of the space of the dhatu would also be appearances for those who are to be tamed. That is because the rupakayas, of one nature with these, appear for those who are to be tamed. Having maintained that, that is how the pure realm of the buddha and so forth have to be elucidated. Therefore, knowing these two as separate is very important.

Attaining the two ultimates, dharmakaya and rupakaya, is becoming the Buddha Bhagavat himself. Relating this buddhahood to the perfections of the mahayana, at the end of the tenth bhumi, after all defilements have been abandoned, one becomes enlightened in Akanishta. Sambhogakaya, the appearances of a bodhisattva of the tenth bhumi, appear. Such a teacher produces many emanations within the realm of sentient beings, taming whatever needs to be tamed.

Sometimes mantrayana says the same thing. In the Great Net of Illusion, buddhahood, the inexhaustible sphere of ornament of the Tathagata's body, speech, and mind, does not appear in the realization of others. If it does appear, they too are buddhas. From buddhahood, by the appearance of the great emanation, and the various emanations, benefits are produced for sentient beings.

The great emanation is sambhogakaya, as it appears to the bodhisattvas of the tenth bhumi. The various emanations are the supreme nirmanakaya and so forth, which appear to and benefit sentient beings.

Both these approaches maintain that buddhahood is attained in the perfect place, Akanishta. The Gandavyuha Sutra says:

In the enlightenment
Of perfect buddhahood,
The one to be enlightened
In highest Akanishta
Becomes a perfect buddha;
And in the desire realm,
The deeds of a buddha are done.

The Secret Moon Bindu Tantra says:

In the supreme delightful place called Akanishta,
There the actual buddha gains enlightenment.

The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

As for the understanding of his not acting within the world and such inconceivable things, this is called "ornament" because the ground and essence are not conceptualized.

The place about which these inconceivable things are said is the world-realm-ocean. It exists in the palm of the hand of the tathagata Vairochana Great Full Ocean. The place where the bhagavan Vairochana and his retinue dwell is the buddha field of Akanishta. This is sambhogakaya. All fragmentary things existing within that are nirmanakaya. Where do they exist? Because all incidental stains have been abandoned, they are within the inseparable space and wisdom where Buddhism is attained. That is Akanishta. Its oneness is unbroken. Dharmas are like a dream coming into the one situation of sleep. The Praise of Dharmadhatu says:

Equal with The highest place of the ultimate Lord
And equal with Akanishta, completely beautiful,
The unity of the three awarenesses,
Mixing together as one, is said to be its nature.

The Embodiment of the Vehicles says:

Because of being without ego-grasping,
A difference of places does not exist.
After having experienced this formerly,
By labeling they are differentiated.

"Shakyamuni went there just after attaining enlightenment." Don't think that way. The Tantra of the Display of Wisdom says:

At the pure time without beginning and end,
I am enlightened fully and completely.

At this time of the Saha realm of endurance where lives are about a hundred years, it is taught regarding the time of the Buddha's enlightenment that first he was primordially enlightened in pure Akanishta, and then he appeared as the Buddha in Jambuling. The Sutra of the Manifestation of Enlightenment of Vairochana says:

Within the realms of desire and formlessness,
You Buddha did not gain complete awakening.
In Akanishta in the realm of form,
Free from desire, you were enlightened there.

Having abandoned all the other pure lands
One will enjoy the one called Akanishta.
The actual Buddha was enlightened there.
An emanation was enlightened here.

He appeared equally in all the Saha realms and their arrangements. This is like one moon in the sky appearing in a hundred times ten million vessels at the same time. Just this is the characteristic. He manifested at the same time in the limitless sky of the twelve individual abodes of sentient beings,⁴⁶⁴ and so forth, and there he did benefit for many different sentient beings. That is how the enlightened one appears from the viewpoint of those to be tamed.

Since the nature of the Bhagavan is beyond the three realms, he does not dwell in the form realm, with habitual patterns of confused appearance of those to be tamed. He is beyond all habitual patterns. He always dwells in the pure self-appearance of Akanishta beyond the three realms, the immeasurable display of the palace of wisdom. Regarding Gandavyuha, and the arising of the fields of the formless, desire, and form realms, the true meaning Avatamsaka Sutra says:

The formless, desire and form realms.
Are not perceived like that.
Beyond place is Buddha's power
In the Gandavyuha mandala.

Also:

It is stable, dense,⁴⁶⁵ and uncompounded.

How is enlightenment attained? After we are free from all defilements, it is attained. What is excluded or separated? Nothing at all. The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Without distinctions of earlier and later,
Without the stains of any defilements
Suchness is maintained to be buddhahood.

All incidental extremes are abandoned. The same text says:

Where the seeds of the obscurations of the kleshas and knowables have always been possessed for a long time, they will always be utterly overcome by this vast abandonment. Attainment of these supremely virtuous transformed white dharmas is buddhahood. The great object, completely pure non-thought, totally, supremely pure, is attained by the path of wisdom.

At that time, it is said that the kleshas are transformed, and that with the power of the nature as cause, becoming the mere appearance of virtues, they are transformed into the fruition, the buddha qualities. It is not maintained that the impure becomes pure. That the cause or essence of evil deeds, the kleshas, becomes completely pure is not possible. Depending on the power of separating separable defilements, the buddha qualities become directly visible. If this is called "transformation," the five poisons may be said to be transformed into the five wisdoms. Alaya is transformed into the wisdom of dharmadhatu. Alayavijñāna is transformed into the mirror-like wisdom etc.. The Sutra of Entering into Trikaya says:

The subsiding of alayavijñāna into space is the mirror-like wisdom. The subsiding of the consciousnesses of the five gates into space is the all-accomplishing wisdom.

At that time, external appearance is transformed into the buddha fields. The inner skandhas are transformed into the bodies of the deities. By the secret eight consciousnesses being transformed into wisdom, one is always enlightened. As for the causal gotra, within the primordial dhatu primordially possessing the buddha qualities, that gotra is a second thing. The Uttaratantra says:

Primordial kaya is the first of these.
The second, later, comes from the other two.

Svabhavikakaya is the spotless nature of the other three kayas. Dharmakaya is the ultimate source of the powers of buddhahood and so forth. Sambhogakaya is replete with the major and minor marks. Nirmanakaya performs limitless benefits for beings. These four are taught. Their good qualities are sixty-four. The Uttaratantra commentary says:

The Tathagata's ten powers and four fearlessnesses, and the eighteen distinct dharmas of a buddha, and the thirty-two marks of a great being are collected into one, making sixty-four.

Some sutras say that trikaya is one with its wisdoms. The Holy Golden Light says:

All the tathagatas possess trikaya. These are dharmakaya, sambhogakaya, and nirmanakaya. Dharmakaya is the existence just of true wisdom itself. Second kayas are just imputations. Dharmakaya is truth. it is the ground of the secondary kayas. Why so? Aside from the suchness of dharmas and the wisdom of complete non-thought, no buddhadharma exists.

How does the wisdom of suchness while it is complete non-thought attain mastery of buddha activity?

The Buddha said, "For example, it is like the sun and moon being reflected in water or a mirror, although these are impermanent. The wisdom of suchness too, by the force of aspiration, performs benefits for impermanent beings.

Nirmanakaya's skandhas are nirvana with residue. Sambhogakaya is nirvana without residue. Dharmakaya is non-dwelling nirvana.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

If we categorize the kayas of the buddhas,
There is the kaya of the nature of perfect enjoyment
And also nirmanakaya, the first supporting the second

Also:

Three pure kayas compose the body of buddhahood
And so the three pure kayas should be known.
The self-existing objects of the meaning
Are taught to be together with their supported.⁴⁶⁶

The Uttaratantra and Abhisamayalankara, as said before, teach four kayas. The Uttaratantra says:

Since it is pure by nature
Dharmadhatu is luminous;

Imponderable and innumerable,
Beyond the scope of thought.
The matchless ultimate purity
Along with its qualities
Is the true svabhavikakaya

Also:

The first is dharmakaya.
Forms exist as space.
In this first the later exist.

Some in the secret mantra say that the mahasukhakaya is a fourth with these great three.
The Two Examinations says:

In completely knowing trikaya,
It is the sphere of great bliss.

The Net of Miracles of Manjushri presents five kayas:

The kaya of the buddhas has five natures
These are the five of all-pervading wisdom.

The mere totality of all these kinds and qualities, is in reality without difference. All dharmas are included in the level of buddhahood through the single essence of the merely individual.

B. The explanation of the kayas and wisdoms

There are three sections:

1. How peace is attained;
2. How within space and wisdom without adding or taking away there abides luminosity;
3. The extensive explanation of the divisions.

1. How peace is attained

Now, with the presentation of the Great Miracle, from the way of attaining peace and the divisions of the kayas, there is a brief explanation of the first.

At the time of the pure, ultimate wisdom of the path, it is gathered together as the continuity of the three realms to be abandoned. These realms have appearances of grasping and fixation, of the nature of conceptual examination and analytic discernment:

By mind and mental contents together with alaya,
Entering into dharmadhatu, the time of the fourth,
Space and wisdom are non-dual and of one taste.
Possession of the two purities pacifies complexity.

Motion producing mind and mental contents, included under the aspects of grasping and fixation, is at the level of the three realms. The Two Truths of the Essence of Wisdom says:

Mind and mental contents are the three realms.
These thoughts are phenomena of imputation.

The eight consciousnesses and alaya are pacified and dissolve in the luminous nature of mind, naturally pure dharmadhatu. That ground of primordial space and wisdom and the things to be dissolved are non-dually mixed. Their one taste is ultimate dharmakaya possessing the two purities. The two complete purities are:

- 1). Purity of the primordially undefiled nature
- 2). Purity from incidental stains.

The Spiritual Letter of the Drop of Amrita says:

Like water poured into water
And oil extracted by oil,
Are the suchness of knowables
Without all complexity.

With wisdom the knower of that Inseparably mixed with it,
This is called dharmakaya,
The nature of all the buddhas.

Whenever there is a gap in the continuous entering of mental contents, there is the one taste of the great wisdom. The Prajñāparamita-samgatha says:

Having burned away the dry firewood of knowables,
Is peace, the dharmakaya of the victorious ones.
Then there is no birth and there is no cessation;
Cessation of mind produces perception of the kayas.

2. How luminosity dwells within space and wisdom without adding or taking away.

At that time, dharmakaya, free from the extremes of complexity, manifests as the great peace, in completely unborn luminosity:

Completely unborn, within the essence of luminosity,
This is like the new moon, subsided into space.
The lotus of subtle wisdom remains in the space of the sky.
With no conceptualization, peace has been obtained,

This is the pure ultimate. When we reach the luminous state of peace, the space of the dhatu, within that sky is the new moon of wisdom, the inner luminosity of omniscience. This is the support, or basis of arising, of the buddha qualities. At this point, aside from that, the phenomena or appearances of sambhogakaya do not exist externally from the viewpoint of those who are to be tamed. This is the time of solitary dharmakaya, transcending the defilements of the four extremes. The new moon is in the sky, but its luminosity is invisible to others. So the profound and subtle wisdom of dharmakaya is gathered into space. The Appearance of Wisdom⁴⁶⁷ says:

Gathered into space
Though it is invisible,
It is not non-existent,
Because of being subtle.

The former play of dharmas,
Like the invisible moon,
Is gathered into peace,
Subtle and profound.

Within the extended explanations of the divisions are the changeless vajrakaya the kaya of manifest enlightenment, the peaceful dharmakaya, sambhogakaya, and the kaya of emanation of everything whatever.

3. The extensive explanations of the divisions

Now from the five sections

a. the changeless vajrakaya

First there is the changeless vajrakaya beyond the complex objects of thought and expression:

Conceptionless dharmata is changeless throughout the three times.
This, in its aspect of primordial purity,
Has been expressed by the name "the changeless vajrakaya."
In this ultimate dharmata the space of the ground is exhausted.

The changeless nature of the ground, primordially luminous dharmadhatu, the final destination of the buddhas, is called the unchanging vajrakaya. The Net of Wisdom says:

The purity of space is called the vajrakaya.
Beyond thought, it is changeless and indestructible.

b. The kaya of the manifestation of enlightenment⁴⁶⁸

The kaya of the manifestation of enlightenment is the essence of ultimate renunciation/realization:

Because the nature has become completely pure
Of the two obscurations, which are merely incidental,
Reaching the ocean of omniscience about all dharmas,
Dealing with the perfection of power and so on,
That is called the kaya of manifesting enlightenment.
This is the ground of arising of the buddhas' exclusive qualities.

At the time of the ultimate luminous nature of mind, the aspect possessing the two purities has the qualities of realization. These are the ten powers, four fearlessnesses, eighteen exclusive dharmas of the buddhas, the great compassion, the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment, and so forth as discussed before. This aspect possessing the power of supreme knowledge and kindness is the kaya of the manifestation of enlightenment. It is the ground of arising of all the exclusive qualities. The Net of Wisdom says:

To separate all stains,
It undergoes purification,

By blossoming qualities
Expanding into perfection,

By their non-dual mixing
Becoming a perfect union,

Thus it is called the kaya
Of manifesting enlightenment.

The Seventeen Refuges says:

Because it is purified of ignorance and sleep,
Because the mind expands into all knowables,
Buddhahood will blossom like the petals of a lotus.

The Uttaratantra says:

Buddhahood is completely inseparable.

Yet purified dharmas are fully discriminated.
Wisdom is like the sun, and space is like
The dualistic marks that are left behind
They are made luminous inseparable aspects,
It is like the pervasive river Ganges, being beyond the sand grains in its bed;
Buddhahood is possession of all dharmas.

The nature of buddhahood is unestablished.
As for the universal and incidental,
Obscurations of kleshas and knowables,
Are said to be like clouds floating in the sky

The cause of freedom from the two obscurations
Is the two-fold wisdom of buddhahood
Non-thought and its post-meditation are called wisdom
These are called wisdom.

c. The peaceful dharmakaya,

There are four sections

1) The Brief Teaching

In the state of space beyond extremes, abides very subtle wisdom, the essence of the kayas and wisdoms. The peaceful dharmakaya is the mere aspect of the moon subsiding into the space of the sky:

Because this mind does not enter into knowable objects,
There is also no perception of a knowing mind who grasps them.
This inner space of the dhatu is like the subsided new moon.
As it has dissolved, there is nothing that it obscures.
As the essence and ground of arising of omniscience,
Since this is the source of omniscient rupakaya,
And the treasury of qualities for others,
This ultimate pacification, the very subtlest wisdom
Is that which has been called the peaceful dharmakaya.

The element or dhatu, the space which is the nature of mind, is inseparably mixed with wisdom. As the host of complexities are fully pacified, it is like the time of the new moon. Therefore unobstructed omniscience is said not to be "foggy." The wisdom of inner clarity/luminosity, the aspect of meditation, produces the wisdom of outer luminosity, the essence of proliferation. Since object and perceiver are not fixated as two, and since it has the special wisdom of non-thought, this is called the peaceful dharmakaya. The Guru of Miracle says:

The very subtle wisdom, the inner luminosity,
The perceptionless ground of arising, is known as dharmakaya.

The Uttaratantra says:

Pure, complete non-thought,
This is the realm of yogins,
Since the essence of dharmadhatu
Is pure, it is luminous.

Total emptiness cannot be dharmakaya, because it is not insight-wisdom. When dharmata is maintained to be dharmakaya, that refers to the vajrakaya, as already explained.

2) Its being beyond the four extremes, because it does not enter into objects

The three kayas:

These are never found among external objects;
Yet being very subtle, they are not nothingness.
They are beyond the four extremes, existence and so forth,
Such as the views of eternalism and nihilism,
As prajñāparamita unexpressed by speech or thought.
This empty nature where all conceptions are pacified
Is realized by no one except the victorious ones.

They are unthinking. These three kayas, abiding as luminosity in space, support the arising of external luminosity. They are not eternal, because they are not objects of perception or thought. They are not nothingness, because they are individual and personal wisdom. They do not have the extremes of both or neither because neither eternalism and nihilism are established, and those extremes are refuted. Since they are the grounds of arising, to the eyes of the buddha sons dwelling on the bhūmis and the host of sentient beings the form kayas appear. They hear the audible speech of the Dharma, smell the fragrance of discipline of the noble ones, experience the taste of Dharma, and touch the bliss of samādhi. By the prajñā of examination and analysis, they ponder such dharmas, and produce their causes of arising; but those other than the buddhas do not realize the wisdom of inner luminosity in which these manifestations arise from that place that is like the moon subsiding into space. The Uttaratantra says:

Undefined, pervasive, having the dharmas of fearlessness,
Steady, peaceful, eternal, this is changeless existence.
The sky-like ultimate state which is the Tathagata
Is the cause of experiencing the objects of the six senses:

Viewing objects of form and hearing good discussion,
Hearing pure sound, and of the tathagata discipline
Smelling the fragrance of purity, the high holy taste of Dharma, Experiencing those, and caressed by the touch of samādhi.

As the profound, the way which is that of one's own essence,
Is the cause of realization, if there is subtle thought
Producing absolute bliss, which is the tathagata,
These are separate from the sky-like reason.

Also:

The nature the true support of objects
Possess the qualities inconceivable and so forth.
The object of the wisdom of omniscience,
And is not the object of the three buddha knowledges.
For those who have attained the body of wisdom,
The inconceivable will be realized.

3) Also:

Though in this utterly unborn palace of dharmadhātu,
Dwell eternally all the⁴⁶⁹ buddhas of the three times,
They all are dharmata, and do not see each other.
This is called dwelling in the profoundly peaceful nature.
It consists of the single space of realization
Which is known as the vision of all the victorious ones,
As space in a jar will be the same as what it was.

At the time of inner luminosity, in the field of dharmata, the teacher Samantabhadra, dwelling in the palace of the simplicity of dharmadhatu, is one with the realization of all the buddhas of the three or four times. Mixed like the previous and subsequent space in a vase, at this time of primordial inseparability, abiding in conceptionless, perceptionless dharmata, having become of one taste, the buddhas do not see each other's nature--that itself. That is because they abide eternally in self-existing transcendence of seer and seen. The Secret Tree says:

Free from one and many,
Free from center or limit,
Within this state of suchness
Not even the buddhas are seen;
Only non-existent appearance
Of naturally present wisdom.

4) As for the assembly of dharmakaya wisdoms:

This is dharmata, the goal of the prajña of emptiness,
The accumulation of wisdom and also the stage of fulfillment.

Completing the accumulation of wisdom is the same as the stage of perfecting ultimate prajña. By meditating in emptiness, obscurations of the nature of mind are cleared away. Then the space of dharmakaya without center or limit completely manifests. The Precious Mala says:

The King of dharmakaya,
Briefly, takes his birth
From accumulation of wisdom.

That is the explanation.

d. Sambhogakaya,

1) The brief teaching

Now as for the teaching of the fourth kaya the spontaneously present sambhogakaya, the space-like dhatu of inner luminosity:

From this comes the self-experience of sambhogakaya,
Having the five perfections, those of time and place,
Along with those of teacher, Dharma, and retinue.

From within the space of inner luminosity, dharmata, comes the appearance of sambhogakaya possessing the five certainties, the self-appearance of external luminosity. The teachers are the regents, the principal ones of the five families. As empty form, the appearances of buddhahood are not the same as others. The palaces and so forth of these fields are the fundamental luminosity of self-experience. If such things are examined, none of their individuating characteristics exist. The Stages of the Path of Miracle says:

The self-experience
Of self-perfected insight
Is fields, and palaces,
With their thrones, and ornaments.
Many rays of light appear.

2) The extensive explanation

There are nine sections dealing with the final summary, the appearance, place, time, teacher, Dharma, and retinue, and that they are not seen even by those on the tenth bhumi, but only are realized by the buddhas,

a) The perfect place.

There are three sections

i. The essence,

First:

The place is luminosity, the field of gandavyuha.
Brilliantly shining it is dense with five colored light
Like radiant rainbows that completely fill the sky,
Pervading space above, below, and in all directions.

The beautiful palace has four gates with four pediments.
And corniced five-colored walls, with jeweled garlands and pendants,

The beautiful eaves, are adorned with balustrades and rain-spouts.
These are the adornments of the sacred hall.

Self-experience of the pure field of bliss, luminous Gandavyuha, appears at the time of the self-luminous wisdom of the fundamental ground of the five lights in the heart center. In the whole of space, above, below, and in the cardinal and intermediate directions, are auspiciously presented radiant spheres of light, the appearances of the fence and tent, their translucent colors brilliant with the five lights, like the sun shining in a mirror.

In the center, under the precious wisdom-palace, is the fundamental wheel of wisdom, and above it, filling the whole of space, looking like a cube roofed by a round vase is the shrine hall.

The storied roof is adorned by a brilliant upper roof of precious substances ornamented with a half vajra. The tops of the five colored walls join precious yellow cornices. Hanging outside the eaves on the beam-ends are jewel and pearl garlands and pendants with sun and moon tips, hanging down on the outside. Above the eaves is a balustrade of beautiful white stupas. The four gates and gateways, in the four directions, adorn four rises. The four-stage pediments and the ledges are adorned with a fence of five colors. The Secret Essence says:

In the place of Akanishta, without center or limit, in the groundless measureless luminous sphere of wisdom, is the brilliantly blazing precious wisdom-palace, uninterrupted in the vastness of the ten directions. Because it blossoms with immeasurable good qualities, it is square. It is beautified by precious rises of excellent wisdom. The pinnacle is all the mandalas of all the buddhas of the ten directions and four times. This single essence without individuation includes all wisdom within it.

The ornaments of the palace are jewel and silk ribbons, parasols, yak tails, garlands of bells, canopies, victory banners and so forth, filling space. The goddesses of the five desirables emanate clouds of offerings. Swirling light rays pervade everything inside and out. The center and four directions have their individual colors. The corresponding ornaments are of variegated colors. Its appearance is like looking at something of uncertain size. Its size and scope are immeasurable, filling the whole of space. Yet it seems no bigger the opened husk of a sesame seed. Ornamenting the palace are fine, thick, silk⁴⁷⁰ precious ribbons, parasols, canopies, victory banners, and so forth, ornaments filling the whole of space. The piled clouds of offerings by the offering goddesses of the five desirables are self-arising and fill the ten directions. In the center of the palace, with the colors of the wisdoms of the directions, dark blue and so forth, many only the size of an opening sesame seed, they pervade all the limits of space.

Since the measure is uncertain, whoever looks on it, though it appears only that big, its limits cannot be seen. With swirling light rays like a magical display, its appearance is natureless. The Secret Essence says:

The various precious wisdom garlands, tassels, ornaments of the palace, and various forms, sounds, smells, tastes, and touchables, pile up by themselves in the ten directions. Space is filled by inconceivable non-obscuring luminous ornaments.

Everywhere inside the palace are seats and thrones ornamented with lions, elephants, horses, peacocks, shang shang birds, suns, moons, and lotuses. They appear as symbols of many kinds of good qualities. The same text says:

Fearlessness is the lion thrones. Power is the elephant thrones. Miracle is the horse thrones. Empowerment is the peacock thrones. Non-obstruction is the thrones floating in the air. The moon and sun mandalas are natural luminosity. Non-obscuration is the lotus and jewel seats.

b) The perfect time

Second:

The time is uncertain, that of the perfect and changeless ground.
This is the time of Samantabhadra, without the three times.
This is the great encompassment of dharmata,
Within it everything is equal in perfection.
This itself is the nature of primordial purity.

The perfect time is the inconceivable simplicity of dharmata, without the changes of the three times. This is the time of Samantabhadra, the nature of the great perfection. The Telling the Marks says:

This is the place of realization that the three times are timeless.

c) The perfect teacher

The perfect teacher is the kaya of the nature of space and of the luminosity of wisdom. Dwelling there:

The teachers, blazing with all the major and minor marks,
Are the five bhagavans: Vairochana, and Akshobhya,
Ratnasambhava, Amitabha, and Amoghasiddhi,
Each in union with their consorts, embracing each other.
There are Akashadhatvishvari and Vajramamaki,
Buddhalochana, Pandaravasini, Samayatara.
They are complete with the customary ornaments.
They are emanating rays of colored light,
These are blue and white; yellow, red, and green.
Below are the peaceful aspects, above the wrathful ones,
These are the five Shri-Herukas, the glorious blood-drinkers,
The Buddha, Vajra, Ratna, Padma and Karma Herukas.
Again there are five sets of five, twenty-five in all.
They are in union with the five khrodheshvaris.
Words cannot describe any details such as these.

The principal ones of the forty-two peaceful buddhas are the principal father and mother deities of the five families. They are in union and also dwell in the lower ground displaying the nine styles. The Fierce Lighting of Miracle says:

All the excellent bodies
Of each of these deities
Possess the nine-fold styles.
Smooth, supple, and caressing,
Flexibly pliant, and youthful.

Radiant, brilliant, massive Brightly shining, and sacred.

They blaze with the major and minor marks. In the ground above are the wrathful ones of the five families also with nine styles. What are these? The Very Important says:

Graceful, heroic, repulsive
Laughing, fierce, and terrible,
Compassionate, awesome, and peaceful,
They assume these poses
Of the nine moods of dance.

Regarding the mandala, the former text says:

In the great place of the great charnel grounds
In the middle of raging tumultuous waves of rakta,
On a blazing Mount Meru composed of skeletons,
In the midst of a blaze of all-consuming flames,
Is the blazing palace of the charnel grounds.

Its size and vastness are endless and limitless,
Its luminous light is from neither inside nor out.
A blazing four-spoked wheel supports a blazing cube.
The palace is adorned with its four radiant gateways.
The courtyards inside and out are blazingly brilliant.

Adorned by suns and moons, as well as snakes, and skulls
By shaggy bulls and buffaloes, and claws of tigers and bears,
Are seats of arrogant Indra, Bhrama, and Ishvara.
In the center of all this is great Yamantaka,

That and so forth is taught. A variant says:

As for fierce tigers and bears,
On pairs of them are the seats
Of luminous Indra and Bhrama.
The great seats are also luminous.

This manifests very clearly. The peaceful and wrathful mandalas, pervading as far as the limits of space, are inconceivable and inexpressible.

The major and minor marks are the essence of sambhogakaya. What are they? First as for the thirty-two major marks, the Uttaratantra says:

The feet are perfectly level,
With the mark of dharmachakras.
The feet are very wide,
But joined to modest ankles;

Long fingers, and long toes,
Are connected by a web
The skin is soft and youthful.
There are seven protuberances.

Calves like the antelope eneya,
The secret organs retracted
In a sheath like an elephant.

A torso like a lion,

With a wide unbroken space
Between the shoulder blades,
Broad and rounded shoulders.

Soft, well-rounded arms,
Have no unevenness.

The arms are very long

The body, haloed in light,
Has a neck like a spotless conch,
And cheeks like the king of beasts

Forty teeth in equal pairs⁴⁷¹ are white and well-aligned.
The canines are very white.

The tongue is very long,
Of inconceivable length,
With a perfect sense of taste.

A voice like the kalavinka,⁴⁷²
Or the melody of Bhrama.
The beautiful blue-lotus eyes
Have fine lashes like a bull;

The very handsome face,
has a spotless circle of hair,
Growing between the brows.
On the head is a mound,
That is pure and delicate.

Skin of a golden color
Is superior to other beings.
Fine, soft body hairs,
One growing out of each pore,
Toward the top of the body,
And curling to the right,

With spotless hair like sapphire,
The proportions are like the form
Of a perfect banyan tree.

He who is always good
The incomparable great Sage
Has a body that is firm
With the strength of Narayana.

These blazing thirty-two marks,
Are beyond the scope of thought.
These were taught by the Teacher
As the marks of a Lord of Beings.

As for the eighty minor marks, the Abhisamayalankara says:

The Sage's nails are coppery,
Glossy, and highly arched;
The fingers round, long,⁴⁷³ and tapering.

The calves have veins free from knots
Which are inconspicuous.
The ankles are inconspicuous.
The feet are of equal form.

With lion and elephant actions,
He walks with the stride of a bull,
He circles to the right.
He goes very gracefully.
He is mindful, and composed.

As if polished, with balanced details,
The body is pure and smooth.
The marks are completely perfect.
The body is large and good.
He walks with even paces

As for the two eyes,
They are pure and freshly youthful.
The body is unblemished,
big and very firm.

The limbs are very supple
The sight pure and unobscured.
The waist round and symmetrical
Not stretched out or protruding
The belly not hanging down.

The navel is very deep,
It coils to the right.
If looked at overall,
The form is very attractive,

His behavior is pure and his body
Is unblemished by any moles.
the hands, soft like cotton wool,
Have lines that are lustrous and deep.

The face is not too long
The tongue is supple and slender,
The lips are very red.
His voice is like awesome thunder;
But the speech is soft and gentle.

The teeth are round and sharp,
As well as white, and equal.
The calves are fine and the nose
Is tall and supremely pure.

The eyes are wide and the lashes
Attractive like lotus petals.
The eyebrows are long and soft,
Glossy, with equal hairs.

The hands are big and long,
and symmetrically balanced.
He has abandoned faults.

The forehead is broad and long
The head is large and imposing.
The hair is like a black bee,
Attractive, soft, and not bristly,
Not rough, and very good smelling.

He ravishes the mind.
With glorious knots of eternity,
He is adorned with swastikas.
That is the explanation
Of the excellent minor marks.

d) The perfect dharma

Fourth, the dharma is the nature of the great perfection:

The dharma is the nature of the great perfection,
Whose universal essence is inexpressible.

e) The perfect retinue,

1) The peaceful retinue.

Fifth:

Their retinues are self-experience, not other than themselves.
Here are the eight male sattvas, and the eight female sattvas.
Four male gate-keepers⁴⁷⁴ and also four females are below.
Among the forty-two that are of a peaceful nature,
As six appear to others, they are nirmanakayas.⁴⁷⁵
Two are dharmakaya because they remain in space.⁴⁷⁶
Thirty-four are sambhogakaya self-experience.
Of which the specific retinue numbers twenty-four

In the field of self-appearance of sambhogakaya, the principal deity and retinue appear. Since there are neither good nor bad, they spontaneously arise as the play of a single wisdom. The Ocean of Miracle says:

Self-appearance is an included aspect
Of the mind of the victorious ones.
There is the first buddha conqueror of the bhūmis,
The mahasattvas, and the great conquerors.

Here of the forty-two peaceful deities:

Samantabhadra and Samantabhadri, the two teachers of the inner luminosity of dharmakaya remain in the space of the dhatu, and do not appear here.

The six sages of the six realms do not appear because they are included in the appearances of those to be tamed.

The principal five bhagavans are the five central ones, with their five consorts making ten altogether.

There are also the sixteen bodhisattvas, eight male and eight female, plus the four male and female gate-keepers. Together there are twenty-four.

When the principal ones are Vairocana and his consort, the other eight deities and consorts of the four families plus the above twenty-four make thirty-two. These, are the self-appearances of the retinue.

2) The wrathful retinue,

Similarly as above:

Eight wrathful tramen deities are the wrathful retinue,
These are Kaurima, Simha and the other six,
The twenty-eight lords and the four gate guardians.⁴⁷⁷

From among the fifty-eight wrathful deities,
Forty-eight comprise the particular retinue.
With fierce devouring fangs, they hold blazing scepters.
Their brilliant dance-displays are unendurable.

The chief deity and consort were already discussed. The retinue is forty-eight plus the buddha heruka and his consort. If some are counted twice, the retinue is fifty-six. All the self-appearances of the retinue are terrifying, awesomely brilliant, abiding in the middle of space. The great loppon says:

Charming, heroic, and fearsome,
Laughing, cunning, and fierce,
Compassionate, awesome, and peaceful,
These manners are displayed.

I prostrate to these the fifty-eight blood-drinkers.

They are as taught there.

f) Self appearance and other-appearance⁴⁷⁸

According to the presentations of the mandalas of the peaceful and wrathful deities in the Net of Miracle:

The self-appearance fields comprising sambhogakaya
Are as many as the number of body-mandalas.
As many peaceful and wrathful deities as appear
Are from the viewpoint of others so that they can be tamed.
All are gathered under the head of nirmanakaya.
They are not sambhogakaya's self-experience.

The body mandalas of Guhyasamaja, Hevajra, Chakrasamvara, and so forth, as many as are taught in the annutara tantras, are self-appearances of sambhogakaya and not other-appearances. Some say that the complexities of the mandalas of wrathful ones for the purpose of taming obstructing spirits and agents of perversion, are nirmanakayas rather than part of the mandala of the field of Akanishta. Since they are the projected self-appearance mandalas of these obstructing spirits, they are like dreams.
As for the final summary of these,

g) The final summary,

The display of the great appearance of self-appearances of sambhogakaya is the field of the five perfections:

All these five perfections are only our projections.
For this reason they are neither good nor bad.
All of them emanate bright and brilliant rays
They shimmer and lucidly stream, brilliantly sparkling
This is what is realized by the leaders of beings.
They see them one by one, and then express their praises.

The principal and retinue deities of the buddha fields, appearing as the external luminosity of wisdom, are neither good nor bad. Though the principal deities and their retinues may appear, like good and bad dreams in one continuum, they are not really either good nor bad. Since they are real as internally existing realization, the display of the fields, palaces, lights, the principal and retinue deities and so forth, are therefore included within the single continuum of unobscured buddhahood.

Moreover these abide as the brilliant mind of complete non-thought, and the silence of the great freedom from speech and expression, and the resplendent clarity of the kaya of the great brilliance. These are therefore the self-appearances of the mandalas of the eye that purely sees external appearance. Since every one of these are seen by all the buddhas without obscuration, each of them praises their good qualities.

h) How these are not seen even by the pure ones of the tenth bhumi

These appearances are obscured even for the tenth bhumi:

But even pure students do not have the power to see
All of the array of these pleasant buddha fields.

Even the bodhisattvas from the first through the tenth bhumi do not see the sambhogakaya self-appearances of buddhahood. This is because they are still not free of all obscurations. They are not able to see these realms, and the buddha qualities and buddha activity and so forth, limitlessly filling the whole of space. This is because, except for the qualities of their own bhumi, they have not attained the pure mental eye that sees all good qualities. The Uttaratantra says:

The realm of buddhahood and the buddhas' enlightenment
The buddha qualities and buddha activities,
Are unthinkable even to the purest sentient beings.
This is a realm that belongs only to the leaders.

Also:

Since it is not the pure realm, it is part of the absolute.⁴⁷⁹
Since it is not conceptual, it therefore transcends example.
Since it is not within mind, there is no craving in peace. Even the noble ones cannot comprehend the conquerors.

Also:

Mindless wisdom the great compassion and such perfect qualities
Of the victorious ones are inconceivable.
The ultimate manner of these self-arising ones
By even those fortunate ones who have attained the empowerment
Of the great Sage this is not fully understood.

i) This is realized only by the buddhas

Well who does realize it?:

Self-appearance as empty form is inconceivable
It is the self-experience of the victorious ones.

When the prana enters into the central channel, for yogins nothing else is seen but empty reflections of self-appearance. Though even bodhisattvas do not see the fields that appear to the buddhas, for the buddhas they continuously appear. That is because they are the intrinsically and spontaneously present appearances of the space of the dhatu. The Secret Essence says:

Within that same bindu of wisdom
Are its appearances.
Inconceivable and ultimate.
The limitless pure fields
Of the ten directions
And the four states of time.

The causeless palaces
Are the circle of ornament
And the music of the feast.
These inconceivable mandalas
When they have all been seen,
There is perfect delight.

The meaning of the vast teachings
Arising at that time
Is the self-appearances
Of this harmonious wisdom.

The bindu of wisdom is the pure sight of the buddha eye. The Telling the Marks says:

The single spotless eye of wisdom

As for the appearance of the "bindu of wisdom" itself, the fields of self-appearance are of luminously radiant rainbow light.

As for "inconceivable," such appearances appear only to other buddhas. The unimaginable "ultimate" is measureless. The "ten directions" are the east and so forth. The perfect self-appearances of the "four times" are those of the buddhas of the past, future, and present, and the uncertain time of the buddhas dwelling in Akanishta. "The limitless pure fields" are the buddha fields of self-appearance. The buddhas see one another there.⁴⁸⁰

The "causeless palaces" and so forth are the fields of luminous self-appearance. As for "the meaning of the vast teachings," the meaning spoken only by that same inexpressible speech is understood. As for "harmonious wisdom," the principal deity and retinue have one realization and one essence which are inseparably in harmony.

As for "self-appearance," though they appear to the eyes of these same buddhas, they do not appear to others, the bodhisattvas and so forth. That is their characteristic.

e. Nirmanakaya

1) The brief teaching

The fifth kaya, nirmanakaya, leads the buddha sons, noble ones and so on, to the land of peace. Therefore, it is called the teacher who is the precious guide. Moreover, from the sambhogakaya reflections appearing to excellent students and the various emanations appearing to ordinary ones, the first appears having the five certainties of Akanishta and so forth. The second, are fabrications to benefit ordinary beings, shravakas, and pratyekabuddhas. From where do these two kinds of emanations arise? The field of self-appearance of sambhogakaya:

Coming from within this into the world of students,
Here are the different kinds of teachers that appear:
The self-existing⁴⁸¹ taming, and various nirmanakayas?⁴⁸²
These three are producers of benefit for beings.

From the state of self-appearance, again proliferating bodies benefit for sentient beings. Here there are self-existing, taming, and various nirmanakayas.⁴⁸³

2) The extended explanation of the three kinds of nirmanakayas, the self-existing, taming, and various nirmanakayas.

a) The self-existing nirmanakaya

Here there are also distinctions of place and teacher, wisdom, Dharma and retinue, and time; as well as what is to be trained in, and a real field. of these six as for

i) the place and teacher

The teacher of sambhogakaya is the reflection appearing to bodhisattvas. Like the self-appearances of sambhogakaya, these are not solid or real, like reflections in a mirror. From the explanation of the way of the five perfections, the teacher as self-arising nirmanakaya:

The teachers of the self-existing nirmanakaya
Are the forms of the various buddhas of the five families,
Such as Vairochana, Akshobhya, and the rest.
And their five fields, Akanishtha, Abhirati
Shrimat, Sukhavati, and Karmaśiddhi
Their major and minor marks are blazing with rays of light.
By their rising in countless peaceful and wrathful forms
The two benefits for beings are spontaneously performed.

The pure bodhisattvas also attain the five kayas and five wisdoms. Depending on their having purified the five kleshas, the teachers of the five families, the fields, the dharma, and the retinue and so forth appear.

In the center, in Akanishtha, is the teacher Vairochana.

In the east in Abhirati, the realm of true joy, is Vajrasattva.⁴⁸⁴

In the south in Shrimat, endowed with splendor, is Ratnasambhava.

In the west in Sukhavati,⁴⁸⁵ the realm of great bliss, is Amitabha. In the north is Karmaśiddhi and Amoghasiddhi, their bodies blazing with the major and minor marks like the moon in water appearing as in the self-appearing sambhogakaya. The Uttaratantra says:

Like the form of the moon in a cloudless sky,
Autumn rain-clouds in lakes are visible,
Like that are the form of the Lord the host of buddha sons
Are visible in the mandala of complete wakefulness

As to how, the Abhisamayalankara says:

The thirty-two major marks
And eighty minor marks,
Because of completely enjoying
The wealth of mahayana,
Are therefore designated
The Sage's enjoyment body.⁴⁸⁶

As for how from inner luminosity, the self-appearing sambhogakaya, a reflection like the moon in space, appears to the bodhisattvas, a second sambhogakaya satisfies the bodhisattvas. The nirmanakaya[s] supported within completely pure space are called far and near. The Uttaratantra says:

These are the thirty-two qualities
Which satisfy when seen
They depend on the two Kayas,
Sambhoga- and nirmanakaya.

For those near and far from these.
In seeing this, there are two aspects,

In the world and the Conquerors' mandala.
Like the moon in the sky and the water.

The "two aspects" are the sambhogakaya of pure space seen on the level of buddhahood, and the reflected sambhogakaya seen by the bodhisattvas. Subsequently the supreme nirmanakaya ornamented with similar major and minor marks is joined to the sight of individual beings etc..

ii) Wisdom

1)) The short teaching

The sambhogakaya appearing to the bodhisattvas has the five natures of the five wisdoms:

Each self-existing teacher has all of the five wisdoms.
This occurs by having the other four as a retinue.
The five are the Dharmadhatu and the Mirror-like Wisdoms,
Those of equality, and discriminating awareness,
And finally the wisdom that is all-accomplishing.
They are all of one taste, comprising a single state.

For the five teachers there are five sets of the five wisdoms. Twenty-five are possessed in all. They do not move from the continuity of the single nature. Thus Vairocana chiefly possesses the dharmadhatu wisdom, Akshobhya the mirror-like wisdom, Ratnasambhava the wisdom of equality, Amitabha the discriminating awareness wisdom, and Amoghasiddhi the all-accomplishing wisdom; but each possesses the other four wisdoms as a retinue.

2)) The extended explanation,

From the five sections

a)) The dharmadhatu wisdom

What are these wisdoms? As for the first:

By pacifying ignorance into space, there is simple, space-like wisdom. The Bodhisattvabhumi Sutra says

Dharmadhatu wisdom is utterly motionless,
Beyond complex extremes of grasping and fixation.

As for the dharmadhatu wisdom, for example, if everything has gone into space, though it exists in some sense, it is inexpressible. Everything is of one taste with no variety. Similarly in the dharmadhatu wisdom, all knowables exist inexpressibly without variety, in one taste.

b)) The mirror-like wisdom

The second wisdom:

Mirror-like wisdom is the source of luminous emptiness.
As such it is the great source of all the later wisdoms.

Alayavijñāna is the ground of arising and proliferation of all the other consciousnesses. The wisdom of subsiding into space is the ground of arising of the remaining three. It is like the surface of a pure mirror, without defilements of grasping and fixation. The same text says:

As for the mirror-like wisdom, for example, although reflections of things appear in the surface of a mirror; those things do not exist there. This is effortless, and such things are have no conditional formations at all.

Similarly, though the various reflections of omniscience arise within the mirror-like wisdom, they do not exist, are effortless, and are unconditioned.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

The mirror-like wisdom is completely immovable.
Equality, discriminating, and all-accomplishing.
The three wisdoms that come later all depend on it.

c)) The wisdom of equality

Third:

Within the equality wisdom all the dharmas are equal.
Here samsara and nirvana are non-dual.
This is the equality of the great perfection.

By pride being pacified into space, the equality of self and other is known, and samsara and nirvana are non-dual. The same sutra source says:

In the wisdom of equality, all dharmas enter into markless equality, so that pleasure and pain are of one taste. Therefore, they are established as equality/equanimity.

The former says:

The wisdom of equality as found in sentient beings,
Is maintained to be the purity of meditation
As for non-dwelling, remaining in a state of peace,
This is maintained to be the wisdom of equality.

d)) Discriminating wisdom

Fourth:

For discriminating wisdom objects are distinct.
The visions of nature and extent are completely pure.

By the subsiding of passion into space, discriminating awareness wisdom knows the empty nature of knowables as it is, and knows the extent of all the essences of various appearances, along with their causes and effects. The sutras say:

As for discriminating awareness wisdom, for example, in the realm of the world islands, continents, the sun, the moon, and so forth are discriminated. Similarly, discriminating awareness wisdom truly discriminates all the world transcending perfections with their causes and effects; and the shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

As for the wisdom of discriminating awareness,
Perceptions of all knowables are not obstructed at all.
The occurrence of various samadhis and dharanis
Are like nothing else than having found a treasure.

As for this, within the mandala of samsara,
Because it teaches all the connections of everything,
Every kind of doubt is totally cut through.

There is a great descent of the excellent rain of Dharma.

e)) All accomplishing wisdom

Fifth:

All accomplishing wisdom is perfect buddha activity.
It is not obstructed by knowing everything all the time.

By the subsiding of envy into space, as for the wisdom that unremittingly acts to accomplish benefit for sentient beings, the former text says:

As for the wisdom that is all-accomplishing,
In all the variety of all the different realms
By immeasurable emanations beyond the scope of thought
It accomplishes all the goals of sentient beings.

iii) The Dharma and retinue

Fourth:

Beings on the ten bhumis are the retinue of students.
The dharma is samadhi, saturated with light.
When mind is cleansed of the obscurations of these levels,
Miserliness and the rest, the victorious ones are seen.
When we can see the distinction of the purity of these teachers
And ourselves as we are now, that purifies obscuration.
Thus we establish ourselves within prabhasvara.
This is accomplished as if our wonderful reflection
Had been shown to us within a perfect mirror.

The perfect retinue are the bodhisattvas of the ten bhumis. The Small Commentary says:

The bodhisattvas dwelling on the great bhumis have the joy of enjoyment of the mahayana dharma and of faultlessness. Therefore there is the body of enjoyment, the sambhogakaya of the Buddha Bhagavat.

Moreover, the perfect dharma is the mahayana made visible by emanating rays of light. As by looking in a mirror one removes dirt from one's face, those bodhisattvas by looking at the teacher of sambhogakaya, see their own obscurations, and then gradually purify avarice and so forth. Having looked at the teacher and having seen the teacher's superiority and the superiority of purity to impurity, again they are blessed. Dharmas marked by the symbols of understanding arise within them, and by emanating rays of light, they clear away obscurations. The Secret Essence says:

In the highest place of Akanishta,
Kaya has the mode of Vairochana.
None of the bodhisattva retinues
Ever speak with speech so excellent.

By kaya Dharmas are taught with gentleness.
As if shown within a perfect mirror.
The evil color of things is cleared away,
Once the retinue thus has looked at kaya,

The bottomless obscurations of enlightenment
Appear in kaya as if in a mirror.
Then the ten bhumis are gradually purified.
True unsurpassable buddhahood is attained.

iv) The time

Fifth:

The time continues until all beings are liberated.
The field of sambhogakaya always presents itself.

The inexhaustible wheel of the ornament lasts for as long as there are bodhisattvas dwelling on the ten bhūmis who have not attained enlightenment. It always continuously remains. The Madhyamakavatara says:

Until beings are liberated, it is always there...

The Uttaratantra says:

The Lord of Dharma has overcome the Mara of Death.
Since there is no nature, he is always the world's protector.

5) Distinguishing what is to be purified by the field and teacher,

From the two sections distinguishing

a)) Vairocana:

Students certainly have the nature of the five families.
Thus, when their powerful ignorance has been removed,
The field is Akanishta and the teacher Vairocana.
The Dharma is dharmadhatu wisdom, completely pure.

As the defilements of the five kleshas are purified by stages in bodhisattvas, the first-appearing of the five teachers and Dharmas, at the time of abandoning the defilement of ignorance, is Vairocana, with the Dharma of dharmadhatu wisdom, which is heard in Akanishta.

b)) Those of the other four families:

Just so by removing aggression, there is the field of Akshobhya.
By removal of pride there is the field of Ratnasambhava.
By removing desire, there is the field of Amitabha.
By removing jealousy, the field of Amoghasiddhi.

For aggression the Dharma of the mirror-like wisdom of Akshobhya is taught, for pride, the wisdom of equality of Ratnasambhava, for passion, the discriminating awareness wisdom of Amitabha. Jealousy is purified by showing the all-accomplishing wisdom of Amoghasiddhi.

For those on the ten bhūmis, it is taught that there are five transformations of the five Dharmas of the five families. At the time of the path of seeing, the ignorance of imputed false conceptions is transformed into the dharmadhatu wisdom. Attaining the first bhūmi, "supremely joyful," one sees Vairocana.

On the lesser three paths of meditation, transforming pride into the wisdom of equanimity, one sees Ratnasambhava.

On the middle three, transforming all kinds of passion into discriminating awareness wisdom, one sees Amitabha.

On the precious eighth bhūmi, the seeds of aggression, the pain of conceptualization, and alayavijñāna are transformed into the mirror-like wisdom so that one attains complete non-thought and sees Akshobhya.

On the ninth and tenth bhūmis, purifying the seeds of jealousy, the fields of the five gates are purified by the four modes of genuine individual awareness.⁴⁸⁷ Perfect buddha activity produces benefit for sentient beings, the all-accomplishing wisdom is attained, and seeing Amoghasiddhi, one is empowered by great light rays. This is perfection of the great deeds of the buddhas. The Manifestation of Miracle says:

By mastery of the pure levels,
The five teachers, and their five dharmas
One perfects the five wisdoms
And goes to enlightenment.

The commentary describes what this is like:

6) The real field,

From the three sections

a)) By the distinction between teacher and retinue there is half-emanation

By other appearance of the fields of the five families and the appearance of the teacher, how benefit is produced for the bodhisattvas:

Since regarding a teacher in the realm of sambhogakaya
The retinue and such are other than the teacher,
For this reason, not everything is sambhogakaya.
This half emanation is self-existing nirmanakaya.
This appears for sentient beings who are purified.
But for the noble ones who are dwelling on the bhumis,
Those who are to be tamed are not other than themselves.
So it is called a half-emanated nirmanakaya

The genuine field of sambhogakaya, by the perfection of being without good and bad, is always changeless. The reflected sambhogakaya appearing to the bodhisattvas, showing the major and minor marks and so forth, appears to be other than the field and retinue and so forth. Therefore it is included within the appearances of the ten bhumis, and is called a "half-emanation." This is taught in the tantra The Wedding of the Sun and Moon and so forth.

It is also called half-emanation because the field does not appear to be other for the bodhisattvas of the ten bhumis. Though sambhogakaya appears, since it is not other than self-appearance,⁴⁸⁸ its reflection is a half-appearing simulacrum, and so it is called half-emanation. By emanating with the nature of self-appearance, it is also called a naturally-existing nirmanakaya.

b)) The four peaceful fields

These fields are alike in their delightful palaces.
They are built on the seven precious substances.
They emanate rays of light to all of the directions.
Countless buddha-sons are born from lotus flowers.
Everything that is desired falls like rain.
Throughout the four times the sound of dharma rings like sleigh-bells.⁴⁸⁹
These are the emanations of a peaceful nature.

In the fields of the five families, on ground of the seven precious substances, divine palaces, brilliant with rays of light are adorned with garlands of jewels. From bells in tala⁴⁹⁰ trees dharma sounds of emptiness, marklessness, and so forth, unheard before, arise by themselves and pacify harmful kleshas. As pools of water adorned with the eight virtues⁴⁹¹ emanate like the play of fountains, the torments of the kleshas are cleared away. A rain of all that anyone could desire falls from the sky and so forth. The power and enlightenment of the buddhas is adorned by the immeasurable display arising because of the wondrously arisen virtuous roots of the bodhisattvas.

This display of good qualities of the undisturbed fields, Sukhavati and so forth, is extensively explained in the sutras. These are nothing but the appearances of their own virtuous minds, and so those maintaining the conception that they are other are impure. If they try to cross over to somewhere else, they will never get there. As from virtuous habitual patterns good dreams arise, the self-appearances of the bodhisattvas, accord with the half-emanation of the buddhas. The Secret Essence says:

A wishing-fulfilling tree or wishing gem,
And arising of everything that is desired
These do not exist substantially,
But supported by the merit of one's mind.

The wondrous miracle, wondrous marvelous Dharma.
From another existence does not come.
From prajña in dependence on upaya,
These arise like a fetus in the body.

c)) The celestial field

As the peaceful self-arising nirmanakaya appears to the bodhisattvas dwelling on the bhumis:

Likewise there are countless wrathful mandalas,
Celestial realms that emanate heaps of clouds of dakinis.
These are the buddha field of the glorious five herukas.
They are fully apparent to those in the secret mantra.
Nowadays this is called the celestial realm of bliss.
It is highly praised by the learned and accomplished.

The self-appearance of inner luminosity arises as the luminous mandalas of the wrathful ones of the five families. This is like the reflection of the moon appearing here. For individuals dwelling on the level of a vidyadhara of secret mantra with power over life and for the insight holders of mahamudra, the five poisons are abandoned. Because of that, from the self-arising appearance of the five kayas and five wisdoms, when ignorance is tamed, the mandala of the wrathful one of the tathagata family, the Buddha heruka, appears in Akanishta. Having traveled there, dakas, dakinis, and lords of yogins who have the same fortune as other vidyadharas enjoy the feast within the great waves of the view and action of the mantrayana.

Similarly, in the vajra field there is a display of the mandala and field of the Vajra Heruka, in the ratna field of the Ratna Heruka, in the padma field of the Padma Heruka, and in the karma field of the Karma Heruka.

The sounds of the dakinis practicing in the celestial realm, mantrikas of the earthly realm, the beings of the fields, and so forth are classed with those of the assembly of Vajrayogini, producing the support of sound emptiness.

In the field of the moment of death, the wrathful ones invite with heaps of clouds of parasols, victory banners, and music. As these are seen by the vidyadhara gurus, they are drawn in. The arrayed five places of the vidyadharas are called the celestial realms of great bliss. Of equal fortune with those who have attained the same field by the bodhisattva-bhumis, each has realization of the dharma, teacher, retinue, view, and accomplishment of samadhi, from which no other is conceivable. The Precious Ocean says:

As it appears to those who are dwelling on the bhumis,
The fields of wrathful ones appear to vidyadharas,
With all the great feast of good qualities of the celestial realm.
One is ornamented by the marks of accomplishment.
The signs and marks of attaining the siddhis all appear.

As vidyadharas training on this very path, the vajra gurus dwell. So it is proclaimed.

b) The nirmanakayas who are tamers of beings,

There are seven sections.

Second, there is the teaching of the Sages of how being-taming nirmanakayas appear in accord with individual realms of beings. As for their appearance as teachers who benefit beings, as said above, from the six places of the sambhogakaya of Akanishta, emanate six rays of light to the places of the six kinds of beings. At their tips are letter garlands which perform benefits by appearing as the teachers of the individual wheels. What is so-known is

i) the field of sambhogakaya:

From this come nirmanakayas who are the tamers of beings.
They dwell in each of the lokas, appearing as their teachers.
There are Indra, Aravala, Shakyamuni and Senge Rabten
Jvalamukhadeva and Awa Langosé.
Each of these six sages purify the minds
Of beings of one of the lokas, throughout the ten directions.

From sambhogakaya light rays, circular garlands of syllables emanate as teachers in the places of the six kinds of beings. In the place of the gods, are divine sages, lord Indra and so forth. In the place of the asuras is Aravala. In the place of human beings are the Great Sage Shakyamuni and so forth. In the place of the animals are Senge Rabten and so forth. In the place of the pretas is Jvalamukhadeva and so forth. In the place of the hell beings is Awalangmogo and so forth.

These individual tamers are self-existing, accomplishing benefits for beings without motion and effort. This is the blessing of the great compassion. It arises from the cause of the increasing white virtue of beings.

The Dharma appears in a three-fold way, like water, the moon's reflection, and the disk of the moon. As the moon has the power of producing reflections, the moon of sambhogakaya has a power of making emanations arise from the viewpoint of those to be tamed. As water in a vessel has a power of holding reflections, those to be tamed have the merit of an emanation appearing. When these two come together, as the moon effortlessly arises in the water, the reflection emanated from the moon of the teacher arises when there are those to be tamed, and never at an untimely moment. The Hundred Actions says:

In the ocean where water dragons live,
Waves may rise at an inappropriate time.
The Buddha's coming to sons who are to be tamed,
Never comes at an inappropriate time.

In the four directions, above, and below; in the six divisions of space of the world realm including its borders above and below, to as many of the six kinds of beings as exist, by their own karma, these emanations are shown. They appear to those above in the celestial realms, to human beings and animals in the middle, and to hell beings and pretas below. To these beings who experience various joys and sorrows, benefiting as many as there may be, countless inconceivable and immeasurable sages appear. The Secret Essence says:

Then from all the tathagatas, as the blessing of the great compassion, come the so-called insight beings, the six sages. They came forth from the body, speech, and mind vajras of the Tathagata. Having come forth, by the power of karma, above, below and everywhere in the ten directions of the six worlds in each limitless three-fold thousand world realm, the bhagavans, the great sages benefit beings in each world by the four kinds of taming.

The four tamings are:

- 1) Taming by great merit of the body
- 2) Taming through speech by the dharmas of various vehicles
- 3) Taming through mind by the great higher perceptions
- 4) Taming through inconceivable buddha activity.

The buddha qualities are all pervading and not separately counted.

In the first, there is taming by the twelve deeds and so forth. The Uttaratantra says:

By the great compassion
He knows the world as it is.
Having seen all the world,
Not moving from dharmakaya,
By various emanations
Manifesting in birth,
He emanates from Tushita;
Meditates, and being born,
Is skilled in the arts and sciences,
Enjoys his harem of queens,
Renounces, performing austerities,
Goes to essential enlightenment,
Overcomes hosts of maras,
Attains complete perfection,
Turns the wheel of dharma,
And passes into Nirvana.
In as many worlds as there are
These are shown in those impure fields.

As for his taming by speech, The Secret Essence says:

By his power of taming, as antidotes to the eighty four thousand kinds of conceptualizations and kleshas, he teaches the vehicles of gods and human beings, the shravaka yana, the pratyekabuddha yana, the bodhisattva yana, and the unsurpassable vehicle. Eighty-four thousand Dharmas have been taught, are taught, and will be taught.

Like Shakyamuni, turning the wheel of dharma in different realms of samsara, the melodious speech of Dharma has sixty limbs, with a teaching according with the interest and openness which each one has. As such teachings are given at one time to limitless different sentient beings, the eighty-four thousand gates of Dharma and so on are simultaneously heard like an echo. The sound and words of the apparent speech of nirmanakaya are without individuating characteristics. They are self-appearances of the minds of those to be tamed and blessings of the Buddha. The Uttaratantra says:

Just as reverberation of an echo
Arises in the apprehension of others,
And without discursive willing, it is effortless,
And does not really exist inside or out;

So the speech of the Tathagata,
Arises from the apprehension of another,
And without discursive willing, it is effortless,
And does not really exist inside or out.

This same speech, in the ears of those to be tamed, achieves the sixty limbs of melodiousness.⁴⁹² The Embodiment of the Intention says:

The roots are like this:

- 1). Like Bhrama
- 2). Like the sound of cymbals
- 3). Like songs and dances
- 4). Like the bird kalapingka

- 5). Like the music of thunder
- 6). Like an echo

Lord of Lanka. The limbs are like this:

- 1). Producing recognizable perception
- 2). Without disharmony
- 3). Worthy of listening
- 4). Memorable
- 5). Impenetrable, very profound
- 6). Interesting to hear
- 7). Completely undisturbing
- 8). Pleasant and interesting to the ear
- 9). Completely without clashing
- 10). Supremely clear

Arising for each of the array of gates, these and their limbs arise entirely perfect.

The six roots combine with each of the ten limbs, making sixty altogether. As for the ten natures of these sixty, the same text says:

Lord of Lanka, what is its natures? they are like this:

- 1). A great slow melody
- 2). All pervading
- 3). Quickly understandable
- 4). Cutting off doubts
- 5). Equal in its single vision
- 6). Ephemeral manifestation
- 7). Entering everywhere
- 8). Producing yearning
- 9). Specially acting
- 10). Taming everything

Each of the ten natures multiplied by the six roots makes sixty. The sixty multiplied among themselves become the thousand limbs of melody, called the ocean of limbs of melody. Thus the reflected emanations of the supreme Buddha are seen. As on a background of vaidurya, or lapis lazuli, the reflection of Indra appears, so the mental appearances of the pure karma of beings appear. The Uttaratantra says:

Just as on a ground of polished vaidurya
The reflection of the king of the gods appears,
So on the polished ground of the mind of beings,
The reflection of⁴⁹³ the Lord of Sages rises.

The reflection for beings has no rising, setting, or disturbance. Disturbance gets in by the power of one's own mind. As for taming by mind, the Secret Essence says:

Knowing all and everything in the four modes of time,
Knowing all the continua of the minds of all,
By the miraculous eye seeing all phenomena,
By the miraculous ear, hearing all phenomena,
By miraculous awareness, experiencing them all...

The undefiled experience of Samantabhadra, the great, completely perfect six higher perceptions are like that.

These are the six higher perceptions:

- 1). The vision of the divine eye
- 2). The divine ear
- 3). Non-obscuration
- 4). Knowing the thoughts of others
- 5). By knowing the four times and remembering many lives, remembering former existences
- 6). Displaying whatever miracle will tame beings.

By these stages, all minds are accepted and known. Then by performing benefits they are tamed. As for taming by buddha activity, the Secret Essence says:

His form being everywhere is inconceivable.
 His mind being everywhere is inconceivable.
 His face being everywhere is inconceivable.
 His speech being everywhere is inconceivable.

There are countless such inconceivable appearances in the ten directions.

Each of the details of body, speech, and mind also has an inconceivable assembly, pervading the ten directions of the buddha field doing benefits. Moreover, by body, speech, and mind real, substantial benefits are produced and all these buddha activities, within all things and continua are explained as different.

ii) Emanations and further emanations

Thus the six sages in the six realms of beings which have been discussed are the number of the principal ones:

These six chief emanations have countless sub-emanations.
 These are even found in each of the realms of the gods,
 From the Bhrama and Ishvara realms right up to Akanishta.
 They appear as teachers in every one of them.

The six sages are included among the six kind of beings, existing in the realization of those to be tamed. The six names, lord Indra among the gods and so forth, are mere examples. They are emanations from space, and by these emanations, from the viewpoint of sentient beings, countless further emanations perform benefits. Even in the realm of the gods from the four great kings up to Akanishta, the principal ones of the god realms perform taming.

iii) Taming whatever needs to be tamed:

They also appear wherever humans are tamable
 Manifesting as shravakas and pratyekabuddhas,
 As bodhisattvas or kings, they then tame human beings.

Among the asuras are also such different kinds of teachers.
 Among the animals they may appear as birds to birds,
 Or else they may appear like lions, the king of beasts.
 The different kinds of teachers transcend the scope of thought.
 Likewise among the pretas and also the beings of hell
 They appear in forms that are appropriate.

In the human world too there is not only one. There is taming by innumerable kshatriyas, bhramins, women, and so forth. The single Buddha emanates shravakas, pratyekabuddhas, kings, and so forth, who similarly perform benefits.

Similarly, produced among animals, they tame them. For taming wild animals, they appear as lions and so forth. Among hell beings and pretas, it is similar. Wherever there are sentient beings, benefits are performed by the Buddha's emanations. The Avatamsaka Sutra says:

Kye! Son of noble family, as for the emanations of the Buddha, whatever sort of beings are to be tamed, these immeasurable ones perform benefits by that sort of form, color, and name. It is like this: In the realm of the Divine Lord, having emanated as the Divine Lord, the path of the ten commandments of virtuous action are genuinely transmitted.

Similarly, for those who are to be tamed by renunciates, bhramins, pretas, or hell beings, he emanates those forms and benefits them.

iv) How benefits are performed by wisdom,

From the two sections

a)) How individual benefits are performed:

Each of these tamers of beings possesses two kinds of wisdom,
These are the wisdom of nature and wisdom of extent.
Knowing dharmata and distinctly knowing dharma,
They produce the two benefits for those who are to be tamed.

As for the wisdoms of the tamers of beings and the supreme emanation, depending on dharmata there is the wisdom of nature, and depending on the dharmin there is the wisdom of extent.

b)) The way of knowing:

The wisdom of nature sees emptiness as reality.
It teaches beings the meaning of total pacification.
The wisdom of extent knows minds and their various powers.
Distinctly knowing these, it shows limitless styles of Dharma.

Having come to know the empty essence of dharmata, they teach sentient beings the Dharma of unborn nature. The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

Kye! Sentient beings come here. All dharmas are by nature unborn.
Because I shall teach you the Dharma of how the kleshas are, you shall discriminate emptiness.

Seeing all the nature, powers, and propensities of those who are to be tamed by their wisdom of extent, they teach the Dharma in accord with that. The same text says:

Having fully seen the natures of sentient beings, to sentient beings, all of whom have the kleshas, to tame their kleshas, I teach the Dharma.

v) The way of appearing to impure beings

Thus these emanations by the six sages are appearances for impure sentient beings:

These are the teachers that appear to impure beings.
Their realm is the six-fold world of the beings of the six lokas.
The teacher will match the projections of those who are to be tamed.
The various vehicles of the Dharma are not fixed.
The time will equal a kalpa of the beings who are to be taught.

The place of nirmanakaya is any place where sentient beings appear. The teacher appears in accord with those appearances. Because of differing mental conceptions of sentient beings and because of the different powers and senses, the Dharma is taught with various assemblies of vehicle, teacher, place and retinue. The All-Creating King says:

As for the fields of taming of nirmanakaya,
In Jambuling there are a hundred million or more.
In all of them the compassion of self-arising wisdom
Tames the six kinds of continua of sentient beings.

Also:

As for teaching the antidote to passion,
Twenty one thousand vinayas have been taught.
As for teaching the antidote to aggression,
Twenty-one thousand sutras have been taught.
As for teaching the antidote to ignorance,
Twenty-one thousand abhidharmas were taught.
As antidotes equally taming the three poisons,
For equalizing all the three pitakas
There are twenty-one thousand different teachings.
In general there are eighty-four thousand teachings.
All were taught as antidotes to the three poisons.

vi) How impure appearances arise

As just explained:

Thus within the six worlds of beings of the six lokas,
Caused by good and evil karma and its patterns,
There are various phenomenal ups and downs and joys and sorrows.
The six teachers too are only beings' mental projections,
Just like buddhas and beings that may appear in our dreams.
Though their essence is pure, phenomenal details are not.
So apparent variety will arise as the play of compassion.

By the karma and habitual patterns of beings, by virtue we whirl about in the higher realms and by non-virtue in the lower realms. We experience various joys and sorrows like appearances in a dream. The Buddha blessings that wake us from this sleep appear from one's own good karma. These beneficial buddha-emanations, the Sage, the Buddha Bhagavat, and so forth, are also like a dream. The non-establishment of benefits by such self-appearances of beings is like that of emanations who appear to proliferate in a dream. The Edifice of the Three Jewels says:

By me, for all dream-like sentient beings,
Having emanated like a dream,
The Dharma like a dream is taught to them.
The essenceless one is non-dual in its nature.
To be understood as natureless,
It is insubstantial emptiness.

The Middle Length Prajñāparamita says:

Subhuti, all dharmas are like a dream, like an illusion. Nirvana too is like a dream, like an illusion.

The vessel and essence of confused appearance are false. Any buddhas and beings appearing within it are also false. They do not exist. They appear while they do not exist. They are like buddhas and beings in a dream. Though their essence is the primordial purity of buddhahood, when samsara and nirvana appear like a dream, the sentient beings of the six realms and the teachers who tame them appear as these bad appearances. But as they appear, they are non-dual with the primordial purity of the single space of the dhātu. The Sutra of the Non-arising of All Dharmas

says:

Without any Buddha there are no Dharma and sangha.
Whoever really knows that is competent.
The nature of sentient beings is taught to be buddhahood.
But the nature of buddhahood is all sentient beings.
Sentient beings and enlightenment are not two.
Whoever really knows that is excellent.

For sentient beings, seen by the compassion of the Buddha, tamer and tamed are distinguished and benefits performed. When wrong conceptions and their habitual patterns have been purified, the space of peace has been gained.

However, by the great kindness of wisdom, when sentient beings have been clearly and distinctly seen, those who are confused by futilely grasping at ego become intended objects of compassion. As they are led by upaya and by the primordial power of effortless spontaneous deeds, benefits are performed. The Secret Essence says:

Imputations of wrong conception are purified.
Since they are not other from the space of wisdom,
When they are distinguished by the great compassion, the six realms with their places, times, and beings appear.

vii) How these also possess limitless compassion

These six emanated great nirmanakayas:

These are the limitless emanations of compassion.
Such buddha activity lasts as long as samsara.

From the space of the dhatu, from the blessing of the immeasurable compassion of the essence of wisdom, self-appearing emanations benefit sentient beings. A nature of those to be tamed, upayas and antidotes of taming, and a time when these occur are nowhere to be found. The benefits of taming arise effortlessly, like the appearance of the moon in water. The Uttaratantra says:

As for the natures of those to be tamed, the means of taming,
And trainings that are suited to those different natures;
Going in timely manner to the realms where they live
The all pervading Lord spontaneously enters.

Beings of the lower realms are established in the higher realms. Those in the higher realms are kept from harm and distress. By benefit, they are established in liberation. Those who do not dwell on the path are made to enter it. Those who dwell on it are connected with higher virtues. They are established in the ten bhūmis and then in buddhahood.

In brief, the nature of sentient beings is instantly turned to happiness. Then gradually, according to their individual fortune in the three enlightenments, they are led out of samsara and established in liberation. Real and mental buddha activity protecting them from suffering for as long as samsara is not emptied. The Abhisamayalankara says:

As long as samsara lasts,
This activity is maintained
To continue uninterrupted.

The aspects are taught by nine examples.

As increase arises when Indra is seen, after the Buddha has been seen, the pure mind aspires and practices the two accumulations.

As the sound of the divine drum motivates us away from carelessness and clears away fear, the sound of the drum of Dharma clears away the carelessness and fear of samsara.

Like a cloud, by the falling rain of Dharma, the wholesomeness of one's continuum increases.

As Bhrama appears in the place of the gods without moving from his place, while not moving from dharmakaya, rupakaya benefits beings.

Like the sun, the lotus of students bloom and darkness is dispelled.

Like a jewel, by complete non-thought, benefit for others is performed.

Like an echo, though one melody is heard as sixty, from the time it performs benefit, its sound and words do not exist.

Like the sky having a nature without complexity, by revelation of the basis of arising, dharmakaya, benefit is produced.

Like the earth increasing harvests, it produces the benefit of increasing all the harvests of virtue of sentient beings. The Uttaratantra says:

Like Indra, a drum, a cloud, like Bhrama, or the sun
Or like a precious king of wish-fulfilling gems
Like an echo, the sky, or the earth, as long as samsara lasts,
For the family of yogins, the effortless helpers of others,
The teachers manifest like the lord of gods in a jewel.

In well admonishing, they are like a drum.
The clouds of the wisdom and kindness of the universal lords
Pervade limitless beings to the pinnacle of samsara,
Immaculate like Bhrama, not moving from their place.
They teach by the appearance of many emanations.
Like the sun, their light of wisdom radiates everywhere,
With a pure and precious wish-fulfilling gem-like mind,
The speech of the victorious ones, like an echo, is letterless.
Their bodies are like space, pervasive, formless, eternal.
Like earth, for all the medicines of the white Dharma of beings
They are always the ground, the ground of buddhahood.

c) The various nirmanakayas

i) How the created nirmanakayas produce benefit for beings

The three nirmanakayas,⁴⁹⁴ produce benefit by materially appearing. By the blessing of the Buddha, they have been emanated, by taming beings and so forth, thus they are emanations. Though that is explained, from the time of emanation to tame beings and by wisdom performing benefits, their space-like buddha activity is perfected:

From this compassion rise the various nirmanakayas.
They appear in the form of mindless material things.
There are paintings and reliefs, and various natural forms
There are different writings and different objects of worship.
Lotuses, wish-fulfilling trees, and pleasant parks,
There are wonderful palaces and pleasure groves.
There are also caravansaries, ships and bridges.
Lamps and jewels, food and clothing, vehicles.
Such material things appear doing many benefits.

As for the particulars of how objects emanated by the Buddha benefit beings in the world, there are paintings, reliefs, self-appearing images of body, speech, and mind, writings, deities, stupas, and so forth. Anyone who even sees them is moved with powerful faith and longing, and the seeds of liberation are planted. Following these examples, with this constant support, there is an increase of virtue within the continua of sentient beings, and so buddha emanations accumulate. The *Neckpin of Mantra*⁴⁹⁵ says:

Now they remain at the time of the dark age,
In the forms of artifacts and letters
Thinking it is I have faith in them.

The Mahayanasutralankara says:

Created, born, and great enlightenment
By the one who is all, the teacher of enlightenment,
As for these nirmanakayas of the Buddha,
they are the great means of liberation.

The created phenomenal appearances of the "created" nirmanakayas have just been explained. As for "born," any being who really benefits other sentient beings is a nirmanakaya of bodily emanation. In a time of famine, it might be a big fish. At the time of sickness, small gentle living creatures and so on. In Rakshasi Ling the king of horses Balaha and so forth emanated, and performed benefits.

The supreme emanation displays the twelve deeds of a buddha.⁴⁹⁶ Similarly, there are emanations of lotuses and wish-fulfilling trees, and pleasure groves, palaces, and gardens for renunciates. When a merchant is wandering in a desert plain, a city is emanated. On great waters, boats, ships, and bridges are emanated. Those capable in actions of the great secret upaya, might emanate a path in a forest for a single night, and emanating lamps and the like for a wandering merchant, they might show the path.

At a time of famine, by emanating jewels, a rain of food and so forth falls. Emanated chariots, elephants, and other mounts are established only for whatever sentient beings can be benefited. This is taught in the Edifice of the Three Jewels and other sutras. In particular, the Sutra of Entering the Sphere of Inconceivable Wisdom says:

Manjushri, if someone will be tamed by seeing the color of the body of the tathagata as golden, the gold color appears.

If someone needs pleasure groves, jewels, medicine, vidya mantra, and many other things to be tamed, the forms and colors of those appear. That is extensively taught.

ii) The spontaneous arising of temporal and ultimate true goodness

Thus appearing:

Having temporarily served as happy and pleasant places,
They finally connect us with the path of peace.
These various emanations produce spontaneous benefits.

By that play of emanations, temporally individual sentient beings' minds are gladdened and by made happy by virtues of body and speech. Then by the wealth of ultimate buddhahood, the various nirmanakayas also spontaneously produce that supremely great benefit. The Uttaratantra says:

These appearances are utterly
Non-conceptual and immovable.
Indeed upon that ground
The great benefit is at hand

C. How these arise from space and dissolve into space, the final summary

The final summary of how the actions and deeds of these kayas arise from space and dissolve into space, depending on the Buddha:

If there are no students, the teacher subsides into space.
Sambhogakaya experience dissolves into dharmakaya.

If there is no vessel there to hold the water,
The moon reflected in water disappears into space,
And by the power of time the moon will do the same,
The full moon, whose face is without increase and decrease,
if there are students to see it, gradually appears.
Thus it is that fruition is spontaneous.

Without a vessel of water, the reflection of the moon in water is self-dissolved. Just so, without the water vessel of students, the reflected moon of the Buddha appearing from their viewpoint, the self-appearance of sambhogakaya, dissolves into dharmakaya and is gathered back into the space of wisdom. That is what is being said.

At that time, individual and personal wisdom itself, rests in meditative equipoise as subtle wisdom. Again, if students exist, without movement or effort, instantly the external luminosity of sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya simultaneously arise from non-thought, producing benefits as before.

In madhyamaka this is called producing benefits through appearance for others due to former aspirations. The Uttaratantra and so forth say that though in post-meditation benefits are performed, there is no moving from the essence of meditation. The Uttaratantra says:

Non-thought and its post-meditation
Are both maintained to be wisdom.

Also:

The style of bodhisattvas,
In their post-meditation
And in freeing sentient beings,
In the world is like the tathagatas'.

Like an atom and the earth,
Like an ocean and an ox-track,
Between buddhas and bodhisattvas
The difference is like that.

D. The dedication of merit

Now the merit is dedicated for virtuous sentient beings. As explained:

Therefore by the nature of this, the highest peace,
May all beings encounter the luminous space of mind.
Having been exhausted by the defilement
That grasps at the extremes of samsara and nirvana,
May the mind today relieve its weariness.

By the merit of the suchness of the essence may all beings, grasping the end of samsara and nirvana, by the immeasurable merit of omniscience, refresh the wearied nature of mind on the level of mastery.

Making pure white kumut lotuses bloom,
Like the white form of the moon of an autumn night,
The highest virtue clears away tormenting kleshas.
May disturbed beings' minds be pacified.

In the ocean of kleshas, their heads wreathed about by suffering,
There formerly floated the swans of all our faults,
Now dried by a thousand lights of mental merit.
Now let the Conqueror's wealth be fully seen.

The wind of wisdom scatters in all directions,
Dark clouds of incidental obscuration.
May their flight be fully stabilized.
May the luminous sun of enlightenment be seen.

XIV: Chapter Fourteen: Conclusion and Final Summary

From the five sections of the final summary, as for the extensive dedication of merit of these auspicious teachings, having resolved all the details of words and meaning, now on completing the shastra, as for the dedication of merit to benefit others, first an explanation of the title is composed. This auspicious presentation of words and meaning explains the meaning of the ultimate fruition:

From the great clouds of merit of this good explanation,
By many feasts of rain whose nature is that of peace,
Increase the goodness and happiness of beings of the three levels.
May the wealth-feast of the Victorious One be self-existing.

In the totally vast and spotless space of mind, among great heaping clouds of auspicious explanation, may a thousand thunders resound with the prajñas of hearing, contemplating, and meditating.

From sending forth the flashing lightning of this auspicious garland of scripture, reasoning, and oral instructions, by the falling feast of cooling rain of peace and happiness, in the minds of the beings of the desire, form, and formless realms, may the seeds of the virtuous essence of the dhatu of dharmas be moistened. By fulfilling their power of growing ever greater, by the great qualities and activity of the enlightenment of buddhahood, may they perfect mastery of the inexhaustible wheel of ornament of body, speech, and mind.

As for the reason why this should be composed

As for telling the manner of composition,

As for the time:

These days, by impure eyes of ordinary minds,
The separate paths of the mantra and paramita traditions
Are grasped as contradictory, and cannot be combined.
Therefore they have a partial eye for both of them.

When the former learned and accomplished ones had departed, because the long-standing traditions were disturbed with people's own conceptual ideas, they became unclear. By completely fixating the individual paths of the great tantras of mantrayana and the paramita tradition, having not heard much, only stirred up by bad thoughts of sophistry, fools arrogant about their learning grasped them as contradictory. Therefore, even those of profound realization have not been able to gather them into one. By devoting themselves to belittling the mere words of these fools, they came to have the eye of partiality.

As to how the ground, path, and fruition of sutra and tantra is briefly taught

Having seen this, the traditions

This deep and excellent sense of the cause and fruition vehicles
Having gathered together the means of accomplishing this,
Was composed at Ogyen Ling, high on Mount Gangri Thökar,
By the arising of Drime Özer, spotless rays of light.

In this shastra, the true meaning of the vehicles of cause and fruition, with their ground, path, and fruition; the meaning of the ground, path, and fruition of the fruition vehicles of secret mantra; and whatever words arise from the elders of the traditions of sutra, tantra, scripture, realization, and oral instructions, with their profound genuine meanings, are gathered into one as the suchness of the holy guru.

At the practice place of Ugyen Dzong on the throat of Gangri Thökar, this was accurately presented. That mountain's temple of auspicious rocks is a source of the increase of virtue. With the rise of the mountain ornamented by former snows and covered by a white garment of moonlight, by the power of the season, these days, the peak is more beautiful than a mere range of rock. On the mountainsides are fields of medicinal herbs and clean waters flow there. The flowers and fragrant herbs in the wide southern direction, set off by green juniper forests, shine like the throat of a peacock. The practice-supporting forest citadel where these are seen, by Padma's self-arising blessing is called Ugyen Dzong. This shastra, teaching the single essential meaning is a precious treasury proper to receive on the head. The Uttaratantra says:

Thus with faith in scripture, and with reasoning,
Depending on those alone to purify myself,
So that those with a mind of perfect devotion and virtue,
May be truly accepted, this text was composed and taught.

As by lamps, lightning, a jewel, or by the sun and moon,
Things are brought to view for those possessing eyes,
Likewise, the great meaning, is to be fully explained
Depending on the producer of brilliant illumination.

Whatever is closely connected to all-accomplishing Dharma,
Teaching removing kleshas and craving from the three realms,
And that which also teaches the benefits of peace;
That is the speech of the Sage. The reverse is something else.

If, having a mind completely free from wandering,
Whatever one expounds is solely in accord
With that which has been taught by the Victorious One,
And also harmonizes with the path of liberation,
Then, as is done with the words of the Buddha, the Sage himself,
That should be received with respect upon the head.

That is well said.

So that merit may increase, as for composing adornments of auspicious verses

Thus, having followed scripture and reasoning, by rightly seeing and comprehending, setting out a great full ocean of wondrously arisen auspicious explanation:

By this merit may the sentient beings of samsara,
All attain the highest level of total peace,
By the kayas and wisdoms, with nothing added or taken away,
In all the times and directions, may auspiciousness be produced.

This is the ornament of auspicious verses. By the excellent merit of composing this vast and profound shastra, for all beings included in the three realms, six lokas, and three levels, having attained Samantabhadra, the level of peace, without struggle and effort, by the kayas and wisdoms, to which nothing is ever added and nothing taken away, in all places, times, and situations may a hundred thousand million billion immeasurable, inconceivable auspicious light rays emanate everywhere. That is what is being said.

Adorned by excellent virtue, supreme miraculous rising, more supreme than the level of the celestial realms,

May the mandala of light of direct and good instruction, consecrate the path of the space of mind.

For limitless beings may the level of perfect peace arise unsurpassably and quite without example.

Having established this torch of wisdom for all the beings abiding on the three levels, these days I am joined to it.

This way of dharma is ultimately profound and vast like the seat of a water dragon lineage-holder throne.

The thousand light rays of good explanation emanate everywhere, like the brilliant immensity of the seven-horsed sun.

It is like an excellent wish-fulfilling gem, perfecting limitless hopes of all that is desired,

Having various wish-bestowing displays of music, like the level of mastery of the tathagata.

In these great clouds of holy essence nothing was ever excluded and nothing ever will be.

Having done benefit, now becoming goodness and happiness, since this goes on forever are unified into one.

The cool lake of wisdom which formerly was not filled like the great full lake of Indra, has auspicious limitless increase.

This is a divination mirror for the sutras and tantras;
A treasury of Scriptures, reason, and oral instructions;
The essence of the sun, illuminating enlightenment.
This is a lamp dispelling the darkness of ignorance.
Later fortunate generations who want enlightenment,
Should always sincerely treasure these words of explanation.
The essence of sutra, tantra, and oral instructions is here,
The heaped up clouds of profundity that are the lineage blessings.

The bird of my mind, within the vast sky that is the essence,
Spreads wide vast wings of upaya and prajña, word and sense.
Soaring higher and higher to the city of great liberation.
Thinking to cross to the shore of peace without an atom,
Glorious Padma, born from the ocean of wisdom and kindness,
Where he lived afterwards, having a thousand spotless light rays,
Illuminating all beings, mental darkness is overcome.
It abides as primordial, unobscured space of the endless sky.
At night, when the shining space of peace is to be seen,
Following the wordless speech of this musical drum
A Meru of butter-lamps are that Buddha's victory-banners.
The breath of that great confirmation too is glorious Padma.

Merely remembering its marks one is free from the fear of samsara.
Abiding in its blessings, one does not grasp marks of things.
Hearing the teachings of non-dual Dharma, one has union
Entering into the patience of the unborn state.
By its virtue one will always be protected,
Becoming a source of nourishment for other sentient beings.

Possessing the excellent virtues of the glorious teachings,
The purity of complete liberation is explained.
Immeasurable victorious ones former and later ways,
Deep meaning of the vehicle of cause and effect,
Transporting the mountain of scripture, reason, and oral instructions
In the great tradition of the chariot of true meaning.
This is the depth of meaning that made great minds rejoice.

From the time of former generations of white dharma
Emanating from the wondrous accumulation of virtue,
For good students encouraged by the prince, the Buddha,

From their viewpoint, I have written this account.
Ringed by a fence of snow mountains, in their midst,
Relying upon the former holy dharmarajahs,
In the ultimate place of Padma, the self-arising king,
For later generations I arranged this helpful Dharma.

By this merit may I and all beings now enter; the ship of the luminous essence.
Instantly freed from the ocean of obscurations; so very hard to cross,
May we arrive at the level of the Victorious One; the land of the precious essence.
Having completely cleared the degenerations; samsara and nirvana,
May I thereby come in contact with virtues; of the perfect buddha.
May beings by my merit need no effort; for total liberation.
May they possess the perfect wealth of the Conqueror; without any practice at all.
Effortlessly crossing the ocean of samsara; as I have said
Samsara's instant primordial emptiness; may it fill the city of peace.

By the virtue of all these situations, in this world realm,
With the limitless wealth of the heavens of the gods,
By merely wishing, may happiness perfectly be established.
May the world grasp the appearances of the excellent path.
May no one see the vicious afflictions of suffering.
By their own ultimate virtue may they be ever-nourished.
May they at last attain the place of boundless light,
Higher than the god realm, pervasive Akanishta.
Establishing benefit and what accords with Dharma,
Free from inappropriate objects of attention
May they quickly become attendants of that kind protector.
Because all my undertakings are successful,
May the host of sentient beings be free from samsara,
By limitless effort, never resting for a moment,
May the three realms be led to the Lord of perfect peace.
May all beings be happy with my happiness,
And may I carry the burden of pain of sentient beings.
Until these beings are completely emptied from the world,
May I be made a leader and a guide for them.
The snake of samsara has poisoned the always unhappy land,
As from the hellish heat of a terrible fire-pit,
Led into the pleasant shade of a sandal-grove
In the lotus garden of training of the Victorious One,
May sentient beings abandoning effort, fully rest.
Impermanence and impurity, pain, and ego-grasping--
May beings forever struggling because of these four errors, be accustomed to the level of the Victorious One.
May all the supreme assembly of virtues be perfected.

Bees fly and hover around the flowers in a forest.
By the voice of peacock their anthers are stirred and vibrate. Peaceful samadhi by that is completed and fulfilled.
With its life may this body be moved to such a place

By cool water, many fruit trees having cool shade,
Among vines and trees, medicinal herbs and rocky mountains,
Alone, abandoning every kind of mental creation,
May they attain the amrita of freedom, enlightenment.

Trees, moving with the wind, shade and move the flowers.
Abundant leaves are like a rain of heavenly substances.
For the meditator, enjoying peace without enemies,

May samadhi not go stale in the unconditioned light.

Around fragrant lotuses, bees and the music of bees; and flocks of singing birds,
In this pleasant and solitary forest retreat; other chatter is pacified.
Business and personal contacts are not to be seen; alone the mind stays in peace,
Resting in glorious radiance, clear, and brilliant; may this life be successful.

Thus by increasing this well-taught Dharma of peace; and pure thoughts of aspiration,
This clear lake, pervades samsara, as the fruition; of a feast of joy and happiness,
Adorning divine celestial realms above the earth; the lower ones emptied with joy.
Going on the path of the highest perfect goodness; may buddhahood be established.

This kind of Dharma is vast, all-pervading like space; fulfilling all hopes,
Supporting sentient beings like the earth; a great and succoring ship
Liberates us from the ocean of samsara; with its excellent captain,
The torment dissolving rain of Dharma falls; like water of amrita;
In the space of mind the dharani clouds have a pleasant sound; like a the drum of Indra.
May the land of liberation appear; clearing the darkness of ignorance
Becoming as famous as the sun and moon; may auspiciousness be produced.

Accepted by the glorious teacher of Uddiyana Padmasambhava, and having heard much of the profound teachings of the tathagata, rich in the wealth of the mahayana, the yogin Drime Özer completed this treatise in the red rock genuine goodness sky fortress, whose five Tibetan mountain peaks, adorned by many treasure troves, are swarming with the nature of the dakinis. Ge'oGe'o

GLOSSARY

TIBETAN GLOSSARY

Entries are listed in English alphabetical order of their Wylie transliteration forms. Eg. sku, kaya, will be found under S, and not under its main letter, K.

'bras bu: Effect, result, fruition (the kayas and wisdoms etc.) —lam du byed pa: Making the fruition one's path. —theg: The last three of the nine yantras in which the fruition itself becomes the working basis. Vs. rgyu mtshan theg pa in which the result is produced causally by purification, practice, etc.

'bud: See bud.

'byed pa med pa: Without distinction, of dualistic conceptions etc. —thugs rje, impartial, distinctionless compassion. It is there for all beings equally, regardless of their state of virtue, understanding etc, as rain falls on the just and unjust alike.

'byor ba'i bkod: Rich display.

'byung ba lnga: 'sa, chu, rlung, me, nam mkha'; earth, water, air, fire, and space. In their coarse form as substantial existents, they are obstacles to enlightenment. In their subtle form, they are phenomenal principles that respond to the will of the yogin. Thus they are known as the consorts of the five bhagavāns. In their subtlest form, they are not different from insight-bodhicitta itself.

'dre ba: mix. Eg. things are seen clearly without being mixed up in ji snyed ye shes, qv.

'du ba: 1 Gather, assemble, accumulate, collect, join, meet. (active sense). 2 Be united or included (of changeless entities). 3 To embody (of deities etc).

'du bral med: Without gathering or separation, without adding or taking away.

'du byed: the fourth skandha, formations, habitual tendencies, karmic formations.

'du ma byas: Uncompounded, unconditioned. Not produced by combining dharmas through cause and effect.

'du shes: Perception, [conception] discernment, ideation, inclination, the third skandha.

'dul ba: the teachings of monastic discipline, such as the 250 rules for monks and 350 for nuns. One of the 3 pitakas or baskets, of the teachings, sde gsum. Vinaya, [monastic] discipline, conversion, cultivation, taming. 'dul byed, is the tamer or teacher and 'dul bya, the tamed or disciple.

'dus pa: See 'du ba.

'dzin: See gzung 'dzin.

'gag med: 1 Unobstructed, unlimited by or free from..., able to manifest. 2 Unceasing.

'gag: 1 Pith, crucial or principle point. Cf. gnad. 2 To cease.

'gogs pa gnyis of discriminating awareness 1 without complexity resting in natureless meaning in which defilements are like the sky.

'gro ba: 1 Sentient being = sems can. 2 Animal. 3 To go.

'gro ba'i lam: Path of one's travels, path of beings.

'gyu ba: movement, moving thoughts, discursive [vibration], thinking. Has the connotation of unsteady flickering like lightning, tongues of flame, or reflections on water. All distracting mental activities including perceptions, feelings, and the undercurrent of subconscious gossip are included. phro: Flickering emanations of the moving, more or less equal to, mam rtog, discursive thoughts; erratic, mental activity.

'jam dpal: Mañjushri bodhisattva of knowledge.

'jog pa: 1 Put, place. 2 Leave, abandon. 3 Postulate, assert. 4 Classify, pigeonhole. 5 Rest the mind in meditation.

'khor ba: Sa.msara; confused, cyclic, transmigratory existence; to whirl or spin; rotate.

'khrul pa: Confusion, deception, mistake, frenzy, madness, bewilderment.

'od gsal: Luminosity, luminous clarity. The glory of the vision of the pure bhumis from the eighth upward, in which the two obscurations are removed. non-objectivized manifestation within the great emptiness. Its full blown form is the buddhas' vision of things as they are, corresponding to ji snyed ye shes or kun mkhyen ye shes. All schools of the mahayana accept its existence.

Therefore, it is a mistake to understand emptiness in a way that excludes such vision.

'od: Light, radiance.

'og min: Akanishtha, = gandavyuha, the highest realm, pure land, or buddha field, that of the vision of enlightenment. It is on the level of sambhogakaya, and said to be inhabited by mahasattvas, (who alone can apprehend it.) It was at first the name for the highest of the realms of the gods.

'phags pa bden bzhi: Four noble truths. 1 All is suffering, sdug bsngal. 2 The origin, kun 'byung, of suffering, ego grasping etc. 3 'gag pa, Cessation of suffering. 4 The path, lam, leading to the end of suffering.

'phags pa nor bdun, faith discipline, generosity, learning, decency, modesty, prajna.

'phags pa nor bdun, faith discipline, generosity, learning, decency, modesty, prajna.

'phags pa: Arya: Changeless, without transition or change. Cf. pho ba, the yoga of transference of consciousness.

a nu: Anu yoga, the eighth yana. See theg pa dgu.

a ti: Ati yoga, the great perfection, the ninth yana. See theg pa dgu.

a'dod pa lnga: desirable qualities of the 5 senses.

a'jigs chen bzhi: old age, illness, death, deterioration.

a'khor lo bsgyur ba'i rgyal po. Universal monarch, especially Dharma kings.

bag chags: vasanas Habitual tendency or pattern, karmic propensity or seed. In yogacara philosophy karma is stored as bag chags, in kun 'gzhi, alaya, a formless and neutral basic consciousness. These mature into such manifestations as being born in a physical body, having particular mental propensities or character, seeing the world in terms of saṃsāric confusion, experiencing the karmic result of previous good and evil deeds, etc.

bar do: Intermediate state in cyclical existence, especially those experienced between death and rebirth, according to texts like the bar do thos grol, the Tibetan Book of the Dead. These are the 'chi ka'i bardo, the bardo of the moment of death, where the radiance of dharmata is experienced; the chos nyid bar do, bardo of dharmata, where visions of peaceful and wrathful wisdom-deities etc. are experienced; and the srid pa bar do, the bardo of becoming or rebirth.

bar snang: Space. (The literal words could mean appearance in the middle but seldom do.)

bar: The middle, middle way between opposites, eg. inner mind and external appearance. It may become an object of fixation, and it is said that the wise do not dwell in the middle either.

bcom ldan 'das lnga: the five bhagavans, peaceful deities or sambhogakaya buddhas, Akshobhya, Ratnasambhava, Amitabha, Amoghasiddhi, Varoचना. They are said to appear in the visions of the chos nyid bardo, and also figure in many tantric visualization practices. They represent the enlightened forms of the five skandhas, form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness and five kleshas anger, pride, desire, jealousy, and ignoring. They manifest as the five wisdoms, mirror-like, equality, discriminating, all-accomplishing, and dharmadhatu wisdoms. Locana, Mamaki, Pandaravāsini, Tara, and Akashadhatvishvari are their consorts, representing the pure form of water, earth, fire, air, and space.

bcom ldan 'das: bhagava[n][t], blessed one, the Buddha.

bcos ma (n) pa (v): Fabricated, artificial, created, cranked up, created purposely, fake, unnatural, pretended.

bdag: Self, ego, atman (false and delusive) master, sovereign. —nyid = bdag or sometimes = essence, ngo bo or similar words. — pa chen po: great being, mahatma, universal mind of enlightenment or buddhahood, as symbolized by Samantabhadra etc. By becoming enlightened one attains this. There is no conflict with emptiness. This self is empty in essence like any other.

bde ba chen [po'i sku]: Mahasukha[kaya], the body of great bliss, referring to the intrinsic and inseparable bliss of enlightenment, bde ba, which is closer to well-being and equanimity than physical pleasure.

bde bar gshegs pa: Sugata, epithet of buddha, the blissfully gone one, due to experience of mahasukha.

bde gshegs snying po: Sugatagarbha, sugata essence, buddha nature, the ultimate, changeless reality from which temporary phenomena arise and to which they return. v. Uttaratantra etc.

GLOSSARY

Because of its existence as our real nature, we are of the “enlightened family” and can attain enlightenment. Sometimes sugatagarbha refers to that potential of Buddha nature.

bden gnyis: the relative and absolute, kun rdzob and don dam: The two truths are usually said to be emptiness and appearance, in the third turning they are also presented as appearances being or not being like things as they are.

bdud rtsi: amrita. The intoxicating nectar of the gods, which conveys long life, bliss, and spiritual accomplishment. The literal words mean “devil juice.”
bkod pa, (n or v): Arrange[ment], display, order, setup, array.

bdud: Mara, demonic or obstructing forces, either personified or seen as psychological or karmic propensities. Mara is the king of such demons or forces, as the Devil is in the west. There are many divisions (see text), especially the four maras: The klesha and skandha maras (personifications of those); mṛtyu mara, personifying death, rigidity, darkness, depression and such life-destroying forces; and the deva, putra (son of deity) mara concerned with the seductions of pleasure, power, and various ego-building experiences.

bla ma: guru. Teacher who embodies, displays, and transmits the sacred reality of enlightenment, also teaching the path by which it may be obtained and so forth. In tantric teachings like ati it is generally held that even though enlightenment is our true nature, it would be extremely difficult to realize this without the guru. Therefore great respect is in order for those rare persons who can properly perform this function. At the same time one must transcend devotional conceptions about the guru as separate to attain realization. Over-conceptualized devotion can actually be a hindrance.

blang 'dor: Accepting and rejecting, receiving and abandoning, taking and discarding.

blo: (Conceptual) mind, intellect, cognition, awareness, plan; —zangs, good intelligence —'das, beyond conceptual or saṃsāric mind, beyond thought or intellect.

bram ze: brahman, hindu priestly caste.

brgya byin: king of the 33 gods in Hinduism brtag pa: Vitarka. Investigate, inquire, examine; —s: Pf. of rtog: Think conceptualize. Applied and focused thought approaching and determining the nature of its object. Cf. dpyod pa.

brtags pa gnyis pa: Condensed text from the cycle of the Hevajra Tantra.

bsam gtan bzhi: the dhyana “trances” have five factors concets, analysis/scrutiny, joy, well-being and equanimity [rtog pa, dpyod pa, dga'a ba, bde ba, btang snyoms]. Accounts vary. In each successive dhyana one drops out until the 4th has equanimity alone. These states also correspond to heaven realms where the gods have corresponding realizations. See Ch. 4.

bsam gtan: Dhyana, state of meditation. In particular, the nine dhyanas, four with form and five formless concentrations. See snyom 'jug.

bsgom pa: Meditate, action of meditation. See text for divisions. V. shamatha, vipashyana.

bshugs: That which has been entered into and within which one dwells. What presents itself. To consist of, constitute.

bskal pa: In Hindu-Buddhist cosmology a great kalpa consists of 4 to 80 (depending on the source) small kalpas of about eight million years. During this period the world evolves, develops, deteriorates and finally is completely destroyed in fire. It is said we live in a sub-period called the good kalpa because many buddhas appear in it.

bskyang: p. of skyong: Protect, guard, maintain, preserve, care for, nurture, govern, enjoy. Dhārmā protector deities are chos skyong.

bskyed rim: Developing stage. One performs various liturgies involving visualization of deities, making praises and offerings to them, reciting their essence mantras, and so forth. The deities are more aspects of enlightened mind than disembodied, personal entities external to and more powerful than oneself. But they are sometimes experienced as personlike beings. Eventually one hopes to see the phenomenal world as embodying various aspects of the pure environment and inhabitants of the mandalas of deities.

bskyed: Generate, cultivate, create, produce, visualize, develop.

bsnyen sgrub bzhi: 1 bsnyen: Propitiate, approach. Ritual service involves reciting mantra and one pointed devotion to the deity. 2 nye bshyen: Complete propitiation, close approach. One invokes the descent of the deities' blessing, eg. transforming body, speech, and mind into the essence of the three vajra syllables. 3 sgrub pa: Practice, sadhana, accomplishment. One visualizes that accomplishment is absorbed from the sugatas into the deity and thence into oneself. 4 grub chen: great practice. (Sometimes las 'gyur: changing the karma.) One realizes primordial purity so that body speech and mind are one with the deity.

bsod nams bsngo: all good deeds including practice accumulate merit or good karma. When ego thinks it owns good karma it is easily defiled, so it is best to give or dedicate it to beings and the path.

bstan pa'i dbye ba bcu gnyis: General/sutras, verse summaries, prophecies, verse teachings, exhortations, biographical tales, narratives of former examples, conditional declarations, extensive teachings, narratives of former births, resolutions, narratives of miracles.

btang bshag med: Without taking or leaving: Intransitive or participle of 'bud, _____, revealed, occurred. It just happens. bud pa, dispense with. bud, transitive: strip, lay bare, reveal, set free, expel, slander, blow (conch, on fire etc.), endeavor.

bya ba grub pa'i ye shes: All-accomplishing wisdom, the karma family wisdom. The speed, struggle, and poverty mentality of jealousy is transmuted by realization that real achievement is effortless and self-existing. As with Vajrakīlaya (indestructible dagger) practice, the power of realization cuts through the confusion of obstacles.

bya rgyud: Kriya tantra. See theg pa dgu.

bya rtsol: Effort, action and effort.

byams pa: the next buddha, not residing in the Tushita Heaven.

byang chub lnga: The five manifestations of enlightenment are 1. Sitting on a sun and moon seat, 2. One's body completely manifests the body of the deity, 3. One's speech manifests the seed syllables, 4. Mind manifests the attributes of the deity's scepter, eg. Vajrayogini's trident and skull cup, 5. Jñānasattvas descend.

byang chub sems dpa': Bodhisattva. One who has reached at least the path of seeing of the five paths, but not yet attained complete buddhahood. With the buddhas they are called noble ones or aryas, phags pa. There are usually said to be ten levels, or bhūmis of the bodhisattva path, on each of which a certain perfection or paramita is emphasized, though up to fifteen are sometimes mentioned. —theg pa. The bodhisattvayana practices the paramitas in the context of the understanding, and later the vision, of emptiness. see theg pa dgu.

byang chub sems: Bodhicitta, enlightened mind. In the mahayana there are the bodhicitta of aspiring to enlightenment, and that of actually entering into it. There are relative bodhicitta, concerned with compassion and the details of practicing the paramitas etc. and absolute bodhicitta, the ultimate nature of things. Bodhicitta is presented in ati as the absolute mind of enlightenment. It is more or less equivalent to rig pa, insight, and sugatagarbha, when they are used to refer to the fruition.

byang chub yan lag gsum bcu so gnyis see chapter 6. these include the four objects of mindfulness, four correct trainings, four kegs of miracles, five faculties, five powers, seven branches of enlightenment, eightfold noble path.

byang chub: Bodhi, enlightenment. byang: purified of obscurations and chub = perfected in enlightenment.

bye brag pa: Either the vaisheṣikas among the six hindu schools, or the vaibhaṣikas among the śrāvaka schools. The eighteen schools more or less followed these tenets. Stcherbatsky's The Central Conception of Buddhism is one of many sources. They define the relative as the composite, and hold that the absolute is physical atoms and the momentary dharmas of mind. They also hold that these absolutes are linked by various truly existing causes and conditions. They hold that the three times, space, etc. are established as substances. They hold that partless atoms aggregate into gross objects, and that partless moments of consciousness directly perceive their objects. They hold that effects in some sense pre-exist in their causes.

bying rgod: Drowsiness and wildness, sinking into dullness and the arising of uncontrollable discursiveness, as obstacles experienced in meditation. They are said to be defenses of ego against fundamental space in which it does not exist.

byis pa: 1 Immature persons, children. 2 Disparaging: childish fools.

byung po: Ghost, generic name for 'dre, gdon (döns) and bgegs (geks) etc. Demon, evil spirit, esp. of the preta realm of the six lokas.

cha med: Nothing whatsoever, partless, without aspects.

cha phra: Infinitesimal, subtle [parts].

chad lta: Nihilistic view. Those who hold that nothing truly exists or who are skeptics holding that we cannot know what exists are nihilists. But this fault is most often ascribed to those who hold that there is no moral order of karmic cause and effect, so that the various good and bad events in the world arise only by chance. Thus many scientists would be nihilists from the buddhist viewpoint.

chings su bcings ba: bcings ba: The ties that bind. Summing up, stabilizing, tying together, putting in order, presenting the main point, and so forth are all relevant. cf. 'gag bsdam. There is a sense of how to do things right practically so that all the loose ends are tied up and things are done properly. Then the main points are brought together and stabilized. being ba can mean bondage as opposed to liberation. chings, : Frame, outline, feature, main point, bond, fetter. Cf. gag bsdam, mdo chings.

cho 'phrul rkang pa bzhi: 1 Contemplation, ting 'dzin. 2 Consecration or blessing, byin rlabs. 3 Empowerment, dbang bskur. 4 Offering, mchod pa. ES.

cho 'phrul: Magical display, apparition, illusion, trick, creation, power, miracle, magical attack.

cho ga nram pa lnga: The five aspects of sadhana: Visualization, recitation, offering, praise, and blessing.

chos can: That which possesses the various qualities of individual dharmas as opposed to the single nature of dharmas, emptiness, dharmata. The subject of a logical reasoning. Sometimes the phenomenal in general.

chos dbyings: Dharmadhātu. Space, source, or realm of phenomena. Absolute reality, the Dharma = enlightened mind, bodhicitta etc.. In the eighteen dhatus of hinayana, as presented by the Abhidharmakosha, dharmadhātu is the object, viśaya, , yul, of the mental sense. In this sense there are as many dharmadhatus as there are sentient beings.

chos kyi 'khor lo 'khor: The three turnings of the wheel of Dharma. The first was at the deer park in Varanasi with hinayana teachings of truly existing dharmas, the four noble truths, and eightfold path; the second at the vulture peak taught emptiness of true existence; the third in the indefinite realms taught the changeless, eternal, ultimate nature, absolute bodhicitta or sugatagarbha.

chos nyid: Used in the Abhidharmakosha etc to mean absolute reality or realities, the real nature of something. It is sometimes used in this text in such a sense. The Tibetan schools all accept emptiness as the absolute reality, so the terms are more or less synonymous. In ati this is the great emptiness beyond emptiness and non-emptiness, things as they are beyond concept, their ultimate being or nature.

chos sku: Dharmakaya. See sku gsum.

chos skyongs: Dharma protector, dharmapalas, various generally wrathful deities, who protect the teachings, attack those who pervert them for reasons of ego etc. In general when basic sanity begins to slip, the phenomenal world gives gentle messages, like you can't find your car keys. If that fails, you might drive your car into a tree. That is called a manifestation of the protectors. Mahakala, Vairati, Ekajati etc, are examples.

chos: 1 dharma, phenomenon, thing, existent, ultimate constituent of existence, that which is suitable to be known by the mind, mental object. 2 Dharma (capitalized): The Buddhadharmā, the teachings of buddhism. 3 Religion in general. 4 quality, property. 5 Right, duty, moral law. 6 Scripture or doctrine. 7 Truth, order, law. 8 Principle, topic. 9 Meaning, value. 10 In ati the vision of realization is the end of the buddhadharma, and this is called "the Dharma." If the guru transmits this vision to someone, it is called "giving the Dharma."

dag pa gnyis: rang bzhin dag, glo bur dag. Purity of nature and purity of pure experience from the incidental. The two purities result from removing the veils of conflicting emotions, the kleshas, and of primitive beliefs about reality that obscure omniscient wisdom.

dag pa gsum: There are various lists of three purities. In the bodhisattva path there is threefold purity (=emptiness) of actor, action, and object. In mahayoga there are purity of the outer world, inner contents, and the continuity of the mind stream. ~~snod, bcud, rgyud. The list referred to in the text, during a discussion of kriya is probably this:~~ 1 lha dag dkyil 'khor, the mandala of the pure deity 2 rdzas dang longs spyod dag, pure substance = longs spyod, enjoyment or abundance 3 sangs rgyas don dag ting nge 'dzin the samadhi of the pure meaning of buddhahood. [ES lists sangs dang ting nge 'dzin, purity of mantra and samadhi for 3] It is worth noting that ES's source specifically refers to kriya and ours is more a mahayoga feast commentary.

dag pa'i sa: The three pure bodhisattva bhumis, the eighth, ninth, and tenth. They are so called because only on these levels do luminosity, pure appearance, wisdom, the ornament, gandavyuha, Akaniṣṭha, etc., manifest. Bodhisattvas of these levels are to some extent like the buddhas in seeing things as they are. Those on a lower level have direct cognition of emptiness in meditation. But they have not yet removed the obscurations of primitive beliefs about reality that veil pure appearance.

dag snang: Pure appearance, sacred outlook (VCTR, who wanted to that here everything appears has a sense of overwhelming sacred value). Enlightened vision of the relative = luminosity possessing the two purities etc. Ultimately = the kayas and wisdoms.

dam bca': Thesis, promise, oath, claim, idea. "Dam" here = firm, stable.

dam tshig sems dpa': Samayasattva. Of the two sattvas of visualization practice, samayasattva generally refers to one's visualization of the deity, or of oneself as the deity. One then visualizes that real wisdom descends as jhanasattva, which generally has the same external form as samayasattva.

dam tshig srung ba: To keep, guard, or maintain samaya. It is sometimes said that this is almost impossible for someone who is not enlightened. For buddhas it is self-existing and effortless.

dam tshig: In the lower vehicles vow. In tantra, samaya vow. There are many particular samayas such as performing certain practices, respecting and obeying the vajra master, and so forth. These will vary in detail with different practices. Samaya in general means maintaining sacred outlook, or enlightened vision.

dbang bzhi vase (5 buddha families, water, crown, vajra, bell, and name), secret (inner feelings and phenomena are the mandala), prajñajñana (bliss of union), suchness (the nature).

dbang drug: The six indriyas, or sense organs, the six senses, the five usual senses plus the mental sense; ES: six tantric empowerments of yōga, but he does not list them.

dbang lga: 1 The five senses. 2 The five powers: faith, perseverance, mindfulness, samadhi, and prajña.

dbang po chen po "the great Lord," a Hindu creator god.

dbang po: Hindu god, of the three Bhrama, Vishnu, and Shiva he is associated with destruction and ascetic yoga, and with the dance of existence. He is also much associated with Hindu tantra.

dbang: 1 Empowerment (= dbang bskur, abhi sheka) Typically a ceremony introducing students the ritual and mandala of a particular deity. One can also be empowered as a teacher or with a certain state of being. 2 Power. 3 Senses or their faculties (= dbang po, usually as conditioned experiences to be transcended. 4 Mental acuity or capacity. 5 Ruler.

dbu ma: 1 The middle way. 2 The central channel visualized in tantric yoga. 3 The madhyamaka philosophy of emptiness established by Nagarjuna. Nagarjuna claimed to establish logically the teachings of the prajñaparamita sūtras that absolute reality is empty of true existence of what conventional concepts impute to it, of any real nature and so forth. Interdependent arising of all conventional things is one way of establishing this. The prasangika school dbu ma thal gyur, emphasizes that reality transcends concepts, even that of emptiness. Therefore, insofar as possible, it makes no attempt to establish doctrines of its own, but limits itself to showing the inadequacies in the doctrines of others. Ati is highly influenced by the prasangika viewpoint, which it presupposes. Reasoned arguments do not appear in this text, because they have been resolved previously. Therefore, one who wishes to study ati should first have personally resolved the meaning of emptiness as presented by madhyamaka. Then it is possible to go on to realize how emptiness manifests in experience as non-dual emptiness/luminosity.

Ati to some degree also accepts the notion of svatantrika madhyamaka: without distinction, division, classification, or exclusion.

dbyings kyi snying po: Garbha of space = sugatagarbha. Sometimes = dharmadhatu, sometimes the seed, potentiality, or "genes" of dharmadhatu, which makes it possible for sentient beings to attain it, as in the Uttaratantra.

dbyings las mi g.yo: Not departing from space, going beyond it in the sense of becoming something with a truly existent different nature, not of one taste with it, non-empty, something dual in relation to insight.

dbyings: Field, dhatu, realms, [basic] space, expanse, totality continuum, source. dbyings su, can mean spontaneously. dbyings su dag, can mean spontaneous or fundamental purity. Basic nature, eg. wetness can be called the dbyings of water.

de bzhin gshegs pa'i snying po: Tathagata [garbha] [womb of the] thus-gone. tathagata = buddha qua one who courses in suchness = emptiness = things as they are. Tathagatagarbha: the buddha nature or essence. It is like sugatagarbha except the emphasis is on the emptiness rather than the bliss aspect. Sometimes it refers to the buddha nature as potential for enlightenment in all beings, as opposed to full blown enlightenment. Sometimes it means realization of absolute truth = absolute bodhicitta etc.

de bzhin nyid: Suchness, emptiness, things as they are = chos nyid.

ded dpon: Guide. Literally it means a ship captain, as a metaphor of one who can guide people safely on a long journey.

dgag sgrub: Assert or deny; prove or refute in the verbal sphere; hinder or establish in the experiential sphere.

dgnos grub: The relative thun mong or kun rdzob, siddhis are accomplishments such as the six higher perceptions, mngon shes. Absolute siddhi, thun mong ma yin or don dam) = enlightenment.

dgnos po: Thing, conceptualized as something solid and real with a fixed, independent essence. That which has the power to produce an effect, don byed nus pa, is a thing. What does not, like space, is a non-thing. cf. dgnos su, in reality.

dgnos [por] 'dzin: To recognize, either things as they are or in terms of some conceptual reference point falsely fixated as invariant and objective; to grasp as solid or as things having fixated characteristics of essence and effect-producing power. The experiential quality of the world so grasped.

GLOSSARY

597

dgongs pa: Literally intended meaning, and thence by extension vision or realization. KPSR.

dkon mchog bzhi: Buddha Dharma, Sangha, and guru.

dkyil 'khor gsum: body, speech, and mind.

dkyil 'khor: Mandala. Literally, center and border. The mandala of a deity has that deity with customary accoutrements at the center. Around the central deity are the retinue and attendants of the four families other than that of the deity. Around that are the palace, vajra fence, charnel grounds, and other environmental symbols. Altogether they symbolize in detail the particular modes of being, action, and awareness symbolized by the particular deity. Mandala is also used to mean the experience of body, speech, and mind of primordial buddhahood. Such a mandala is not an artificial creation, but a self-existing display for whoever reaches this level. This display of the mandala of the king of dharmata is not chaotic, but is experientially as organized as the experience of a real king's court. By extension almost any perspective or arrangement can be called a mandala.

dmigs gtad: Subjects of attention or contemplation. A fixed reference point in respect to which other things take on meaning.

dmigs pa: Conception, image, object-focus, perceived object, visualization. —med: without any of the above, inconceivable, inexperienceable, unimaginable. —rkven object condition of perception. —med pa'i snying rje: objectless (impartial, egoless) compassion.

dnngos grub thun mong bgyad: magic pills, eye medicine, sword, going in space, invisibility, deathlessness, conquering sickness.

don byed nus pa: Ability to perform a function or produce a result. The defining characteristic of things.

don dam: True, real, absolute, ultimate. rnam grangs— the conceptually describable absolute vs. rnam grangs min pa'i —, which cannot be described but only experienced.

don gnyis: rang don and gzhan don, benefit for self and other.

don grub: Attainment, accomplishment, success. = Siddhartha. KSTR.

don: 1 Meaning, sense, significance. 2 Object, thing. 3 Fact. 4 True, real, ultimate. 5 Topic, subject. 6 Purpose, benefit. 7 Result. 8 Nature. 9 Message.

dpa' bo dbang: The warrior abhi.sheka, = vajra master abhi.sheka.

dpvod pa: Vichara. Sustained analytical thought on objects determined by vitarka, usually with the intent of resolving them in terms of practical judgement. Subconscious gossip on sense impressions, an ongoing indistinct murmur of conceptuality (manojalpa) underlying our experience. Vitarka searches to match sense experiences to conceptual reference points. Vicara attempts to fix them there definitively. Thus, one might use them to decide respectively that sa.msaric objects are impermanent and empty, and should not be relied on by one who hopes for liberation. In hinayana btags pa and dpvod pa, are considered desirable in building concentration that leads one to a more direct cognition of reality in dhyana, meditation. But they drop out in the second dhyana leading to clear lucidity (samprasada.) PPA, appropriate sanskrit index headings. In the Tibetan schools also examination and analysis are considered as preludes to the clarity of direct comprehension. In CYD and LT analysis is almost invariably madhyamaka analysis for the absolute: Memory and understanding, wakefulness.

drag po, Hindu god, of the three Bhrama, Vishnu, and Shiva he is associated with destruction and ascetic yoga, and with the dance of existence. He is also much associated with Hindu tantra.

dran pa: Memory, mindfulness, a term for conditioned sa.msaric consciousness altogether, as used eg. by Saraha.

dri ma gnyis: The two obscurations of kleshas and knowables. KSTR.

dri med: Stainless, spotless, immaculate, undefiled.

dri za: celestial musician spirits said to susbust on smells.

dril ba: Include, essentialize, wrap up, sum up.

dug gsum: The three poisons; chags pa, zhe sdang, gti mug; passion, aggression, and ignorance.

dug lnga: The five poisons = the five kleshas, anger, pride lust, jealousy, and ignoring.

dus med: Timeless, constant.

dus bzhi: The four times: Past, present, future, and the all-inclusive fourth.

dus gsum: The three times, past present and future.

dus: age, kṛitā, treta, dvēpara and kali are four ages of the universe after which the world is destroyed. The first is like a golden age dominated by bhramins (priests). The following ages deteriorate, and are controlled by kshātriyas (rulers/warirs) vaishyas (merchants) and shudras (servants/laborers) gyyang sa: cliff, precipice. — med. as technical term: “there is no great gap,” as between sa.msara and nirvāṇa.

gang chen tsho: great full ocean. AKA [rnam par snang mdzad] gang chen mtsho. The sambhogakaya buddha Vairochana-Immense Ocean: Immense Ocean, the producer of phenomenal appearance. He is the base of arising of the manifestations of the lords of the five buddha families, rigs lnga, and their consorts. Also the buddha field of Vairochana.

gcig chod: All-sufficient.

gdod ma'i dbyings: gdod= Primordial. dbyings= chos kyi dbyings= Space of dharmadhatu, [= The dhatu], as sphere, source, and element of all there is.

gdod nas: Primordially. Sim. thog nas, ye nas.

gdon: Malevolent or demonic spirit, especially of the preta realm, said to bring about disease and accidents for those who lack mindfulness.

glo bur: Temporary, incidental, transient, adventitious, not innate or intrinsic, sudden, abrupt.

glod: Relax, rest, be natural, free, loose, release, let go, set free.

gnad: Main, essential, vital or key point; pith, essence, secret. —kyis: due to. —'gag, put into a single point. lus kyi gnad: teachings of physical practice, hatha yoga etc.

gnas lugs [tshul]: Natural: Antidote, remedy. Eg., the contemplation of disgusting aspects of the body is a hinayana antidote for carnal lust. The path as a whole is the antidote for sa.msara. Emptiness is the antidote for belief in self-nature. Tibetans often think of the bodhisattvayāna as the one that principally employs antidotes. Whereas the first two yānas are said to find nothing good in negative thoughts and emotions and to recommend suppressing them, the bodhisattvayāna compares them to an unpleasant tasting medicine. They may be useful in building resolve for enlightenment, non-attachment, compassion, and other wholesome attitudes. From the viewpoint of all, since buddhahood is self-existing, there is no need for antidotes.

gnas: Place, basis, ground = gzhi, abide, exist, to live, lifetime, remain, endure, be stable, establish oneself, domain, realm. -skabs: Occasion. -gyur: Transformation. -cha: Stability, section of a text, point, topic. -snang: The way things appear and the way things are.

gnýis med: Non-duality, non-existence of either or both. Eg. gzung 'dzin gnyis med, may mean that grasping subject and grasped object are non-dual, not separate states, co-emergent, in union etc; or it may mean that neither of them exists. The former approach is characteristic of the mind-only school, where enlightenment is defined as realization of ultimate mind as one without subject/object duality. The latter is characteristic of madhyamaka, which says that neither mind nor its objects truly exist as independent entities with a nature of their own and so forth. But the same arguments that refute them also refute any truly existing ground such as dharmadhatu that would be beyond mind. So they cannot be said to exist non-dually as that or anything else.

Ati ultimately accepts the madhyamaka viewpoint: Straying, deviation, misunderstanding; place where these can occur -gsum: clinging to bliss, clarity, and non-thought. -bzhi: Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche in LM: Misunderstanding the great primordial emptiness, one labels mind with conceptual negation. This is known as straying into the realm of conceptual shuunyata (emptiness). Not having faith in the ground and fruition of ordinary mind within oneself, one hopes for a new acquisition of the fruition of dharmakaya elsewhere. This is known as straying in regard to the path. Misunderstanding the way of self-liberation, one seeks antidotes elsewhere than in the kleshas themselves. This is known as straying in regard to the antidote. Thinking that all dharms of apparent existence, sa.msara and nirvāṇa, are merely shuunyata, one is stuck in a fixation of nihilism. This is known as straying into labeling."

goms: 1 Proficient, habituated, trained, skillful, adept, having mastered, accustomed, developed. 2 Paces, footsteps.

grol ba: Liberation, freedom, to liberate oneself or another, untying, releasing, escaping from, recovering from illness, to end [a meeting]. to become non-existent [of things] = cease. —bzhi, the four kinds of liberation: shar grol, liberation on arising; gcer [cer] grol direct liberation; rang grol, self-liberation, and ye grol eternal liberation.

grub thob: Siddhi, accomplishment; siddha, the one who has such accomplishment. Absolute siddhi is enlightenment. The relative siddhis involve miraculous displays of power over phenomena, the higher perceptions, mngon shes qv., and the like.

gsal ba: Clear, clearly appearing, clearly explained, luminous. See 'od gsal.

GLOSSARY

599

gtad med: Not solid, shifty, offering no fixed or steady reference point. KPSR. VCTR.

gtan la 'bebs pa: Establish, resolve with certainty, determine, settle, clarify, put in order, usually of doctrines.

gting gsal: Fundamental luminosity, total luminosity, luminous to the depths.

gtong len: tonglen, sending and taking meditation. To reverse attachments one visualizes while one meditates that one is inhaling all the sufferings and undesirable experiences of sentient beings. One visualizes exhaling all that is pleasant and desirable for their benefit. From the ati viewpoint this meditation works because incidental sufferings dissolve in absolute bodhicitta, which then manifests expansively. VCTR.

gtum mo: literally the fierce one. Yoga of inner heat. It purifies prana energies and makes into enter non-dually in the central channel, producing enlightened experience.

gzhan stong: Empty of other. In shentong philosophy it is said: Foundation, ground, basis, object [-ive support] basic nature, = buddha nature (sugatagarbha, the Space of insight), source, subject, — gzhi: the thing which is — (eg. stong gzhi, the thing which is empty.) — grub, established foundation — rten ground and support, foundation = gzhi. — lam bras: ground, path, and fruition: Eg. the ground, one's nature, sugatagarbha, emptiness possessing all the supreme characteristics, is the nature as cause and ground. Therefore, one can practice the path of the buddhadharma in the ways described in this text, and attain the fruition, enlightenment, the manifestation of the kayas and wisdoms and so forth. This text is presented in that order.

gzhi gnas ye shes gsum: ngo bo ka dag gi ye shes, rang bzhin lhun grub kyi ye shes; thugs rje kun khyab kyi ye shes. The three wisdoms abiding in the fundamental nature, the wisdoms of the alpha-pure essence, spontaneously arising nature, and all pervading compassion. These are the wisdoms associated with dharmakaya.

gzhi gnas: 1 Intrinsically present, abiding in the ground, gzhi gnas ye shes gsum qv. 2 Shamatha meditation: One-pointed meditation on an object, most often the breath. It is a means of cutting through conceptualizations and attachments so that one can experience the basic self-existing nature.

gzhi med: Groundless. Things are mere appearance of what does not exist. Cf. med pa gsal snang, stong gzugs, rten med. KPSR.

gzugs brnyan: Reflection. Ordinarily we think of reflections as reflections of something that is not itself a reflection, such as the moon in water, or "reflected" in visual experience. But here all phenomena are "reflections" in that they arise interdependently. The external moon is a considered to be a projected, false conception, with even less reality than the experienced one, and so forth. Whatever arises is experienced as empty, in something like the way we experience the moon in water now, or like the way we experience a dream, when we know we are dreaming.

gzugs sku: Ruupakaya. The two form kayas sambhogakaya and nirmanakaya, constituting the benefit for others. See trikaya.

gzung 'dzin: Usu. Abbr. gzung ba'i yul dang 'dzin pa'i sems: Fixated or grasped object, gzung ba and fixating or grasping mind, dzin pa; illusory, saṃsāric fixations of independent, truly existing subjects and objects. VCTR translated this "grasping and fixation," rather than the more common "subject and object." One reason is that enlightenment in ati is not envisioned, as sometimes in hinayana, as nihilistic cessation of experience of subject and object; nor, as in mind-only, as their becoming one thing. The enlightened object is the kayas, emptiness possessing all the supreme aspects. The enlightened subject is insight-wisdom. They can be said to be inseparable and non-dual, so that this perception is self-insight of itself. But for ati this state is also the great emptiness beyond existence and non-existence, beyond mind and no-mind etc. Ati accepts the madhyamaka claim that no predicates can adequately describe absolute reality. So it is beyond the absolute mind of mind-only. Thus, VCTR used "grasping and fixation" to indicate that enlightenment transcended confused conceptualizations of the perceiver and the perceived. Those who translate gzung 'dzin gnyis med, as [with neither] without the duality of subject and object are in general aware of these considerations, so that in the end there need be no fundamental disagreement. VCTR sometimes used these terms so that they seemed to refer to a simultaneous co-dependence of subject and object, and sometimes spoke of a successive occurrence of the subject-object split, gzung ba, followed by mental grasping, 'dzin pa. Obviously one should not mix the two usages.

It is traditionally said that the shravakas realize the non-existence of —, gzung 'dzin, of the individual ego, and that pratyekabuddhas also realize half-egolessness of dharmas by realizing the non-existence of gzung but not of 'dzin. KPSR explains that this means that there is no individual ego ('dzin) and therefore no objects (gzung) that have a substantial, causal, or any other kind of dependence to it. Pratyekabuddhas are said to realize interdependent arising, according to the twelve links of interdependent arising and so forth. Therefore, they realize that dharmas of the external world do not exist with an independent nature of their own. They view them as aspects of the experience of a perceiver. However such a perceiver is not an individual ego. Such a view is very like mind-only, or perhaps some versions of Sautrantika Abhidharma that anticipate mind-only. cf. BPTP. Bodhisattvas have full realization of emptiness, and therefore do not accept the grasping of dharmas as truly existing any more than those dharmas themselves.

gzung: V. gzung 'dzin.

I. Hinayana:

1 shravaka yana nyan thos, the hearers or disciples. This is the monastic buddhism taught by the nirmanakaya. It emphasizes the four noble truths: Life is full of suffering, this arises from the causal setup of dharma, skandhas etc, which are transient without any enduring self. But given this situation, suffering too depends on a transient setup and cessation is possible. This is achieved by means of the eightfold path, right view, speech, thought, action, livelihood, exertion, mindfulness and samadhi. By learning to be there, doing everything properly and mindfully, one cuts off the suffering arising from the speed, clinging, and desire for self-aggrandizement of ego, and attains enlightenment. One relearns like a baby to sit, eat, and walk like a buddha. Practicing shamatha and vipashyana, zhi gnas and lhag mthong, one learns to have the buddha mind. And yet it is said, the fathers dwell in complete humility.

2 Pratyekabuddha yana, rang rgyal: The basic physical setup has already been determined. Here solitary yogins traditionally unlock the development of mind in sa.msara and nirvana, seeing how the skandhas, phung po, develop. Contemplating a corpse, one reasons backward through birth and craving etc to ignorance, the ultimate cause of life's sufferings. Cutting craving and attachment to externals, the yogin realizes the self sufficiency of one's ultimate nature. Letting this be as buddhahood is maitri, the ultimate kindness to oneself. In ati tradition the account given sounds very like the view of mind-only. It is said that the yogin realizes the emptiness of individual ego and of objects other than mind, but not of mind itself. Pratyekabuddha solitariness betrays a subtle remainder of belief in the independence and separability of self and other, which is basic to ego.

I. Mahayana, theg pa chen po:

3 Bodhisattvayana, byang chub sems dpa'i theg pa: Here madhyamaka emptiness is realized. In ati tradition the emphasis is not nihilistic. Rather the nature of enlightened mind glimpsed in mind-only is seen to have always been universal and unobstructed. The skandhas and so forth which cause suffering are seen to be like mere temporary clouds on the face of the basic nature, sugatagarbha. Therefore, with great joy one enters the path of the bhuumis that goes beyond sa.msara. As self and other do not exist, there is no boundary between maitri and compassion for all sentient beings. Yet this path is not trod by turning away from the phenomenal world, but rather relating to all situations fully as expressions of the ultimate nature. This is like the mindfulness of the eightfold path, but now it is unleashed in emptiness. It manifests as the practice of the ten paramitas, by which finally the proper manifestation of the body, speech, and mind, buddhahood, trikaya, is attained. However there can be a problem here. For example, the elder Vimalakirti was totally devoted to virtue and saving others. He goes among sewer-like dens of thieves and whores and was not corrupted. But the whole human world still looked like a sewer inhabited by perverts and criminals. One may see the absolute and the natural world as pure, and still have no pure vision of the relative altogether and of human society. So even with the vision of sugatagarbha and the paramitas, relative existence is something of a crude joke, a pot of night-soil. Hence the need for vajrayana.

II. Vajrayana, rdo rje theg pa:

A. the outer tantras, phyi rgyud:

4 kriya yoga, kri ya, bya rgyud, the tantra of action): Here we find that within us there is also the sacredness of the vajra world, the sambhogakaya world of pure perception inhabited by deities, who are like kings and queens with their palaces and retinues. Because they have become totally egoless, everything they do is pure, sacred, and immensely powerful. In fact we encounter this world by relating to the guru's world, which invokes this pure aspect of ourselves. At first we may feel rather like stupid, filthy monkeys in relation to this world. We cannot participate as equals, but only as spectators. However, if we surrender ourselves to this as devoted servants, there is a possibility of becoming part of the vajra world. That is the logic of kriya. Meanwhile one can purify oneself and one's basic energies in hopes of becoming a decent vajra-citizen. In kriya this is very literal, with many baths and changes of clothes, white food, etc.

5 Upa, The most basic difference as we progress to upa through the outer tantras is that one begins the relate to the deity as a friend. Oneself is samayasattva, the deity is jnanasattva, the real thing, who is sending his wisdom down on us, and the pretence of being of that nature seems less and less preposterous.

6 yoga: Finally we truly realize that the deity, who represents the nature of the guru's vajra world, also is our own true nature as well. So we can actually become mahasukha princes and princesses of the five families. That is the fruition of the yoga yana. The five skandhas etc. have been transmuted into the perfection of the five wisdoms.

B. The inner tantras:

But even here, there is a subtle reference point of perfection, wisdom-message, divinity and so forth, vs. something imperfect, unwise and so forth that is co-emergently ignored. Hence the further journey of the inner tantras that transcend reference point altogether.

7 Maha: Here there is much more confidence in situations as embodying the continuity of the self-existing fruition mandala. For example, in the eight heruka mandala, bka' brgyad, the herukas are less embodiments of ideas, than means of cutting through such conceptualizations. Yangdag yang dag, the vajra heruka punctures concepts with a scepter like a pin, revealing naked space. The ratna heruka is the King of Death, shi rje, with an owl. Hayagriva and Vajrakilaya, rta mgrin/ rdo rje phur ba, the padma and karma herukas, reveal naked passion and aggression. etc. This yana emphasizes the visualizations of the developing stage, bsked rim.

8 In comparison to this complex network of divine forces, a sort of tibetan cabala, anu, is relatively simplified, in essence one sees everything as the union of primordial space and wisdom, eg, the bliss of union of Samantabhadra and Samantabhadri in their cosmic dance. The complexities of the lower yantras are largely removed. The means for doing this is the practice of the fulfillment stage, and in particular, the yoga of nadi, prana and bindu.

9 Ati is like the punch line, and doesn't make proper sense without the other yantras. All remaining conceptualizations are stripped away so that the fruition becomes completely naked and self existing. As the text says, this is how it is for one who has done all the work. One can say to a superbly trained musician etc, "Just let go and do it," and hope to hear beautiful music. If one gives the same advice to a person without musical training, this result is unlikely. Thus ati traditionally functions as the framework and culmination of the nine yana training, as a means for removing nirvanic neurosis and so on. It is not generally meant as a complete program in its own right. Most distortions of ati come from ignoring this.

ji lta ba'i ye shes: Wisdom of the absolute nature of everything as it is, ie. as the great emptiness.

601

ji snyed pa'i ye shes: Wisdom of extent; ji snyed = as much as there is, whatever kinds, as suitable; omniscient qualitative wisdom of all phenomena as they are, discriminating all details without confusion.

ka dag: Primordial purity, purity from the start.

kha ldog lnga: Blue, white, yellow, red, and green, the colors of the five families and elements.

kham/ 'byung ba bzhi: these are the 5 minus space.

kham bco bgyad: The eighteen kham, dhatus, (classes of dharmas) are the six sense powers, dbang po, indriyas, including the mano-dhatu or, yid kyi dbang po, the faculty of intellect; the six sense-objects, yul, vishaya, including the dharmadhatu, here in its original sense = the realm of non-sensuous, intellectual objects; and the six consciousnesses including the manovijñāna or intellectual sense. The consciousness of touch is called the kaya consciousness, meaning here "of solid bodies." the six senses, their six objects, and the six consciousnesses of those objects. Here "dharma," in a special sense, means intellectual object, and dharmadhatu is the realm of such objects, analogous to the realm of colors, sounds, etc.

kham gsum: Three worlds. 1 The desire realm, the realm of material form. 2 Pure non-material form, the realm of the impure, visions of dreams, and those of the god realms; and the pure ones of meditation, such as visions of the sambhogakaya deities. 3 The formless realm [objectless space, time, consciousness, neither perception nor non-perception.]

kham: 1. Element, dhatu. 2 Disposition of individual personality; the nature of something, sim. rang bzhi; the elements. Eg. the kham of fire is heat. Such natures are partial vs. 3 the basic nature = rigs (gotra) = sugatagarbha, buddha nature. potential or seed; semen.

khang bu brtsegs pa: Literally a cottage or small building. Such buildings are depicted in the symbolic iconography of akani shtha. In fact they are not always small, and might include temples etc. Sometimes khang bu is translated as "mansions." The meaning of that symbolism is the five buddha families.

khong yangs pa: [Innerly] vast or wide open, open minded, to perceive or understand.

khra lam: Vivid, clear, bright, splendid.

khrol khrol: Bright, sparkling (cf. khrol po) (loud or rumbling of musical instruments); insubstantial, unobstructed (cf. khral khrol); LUS: Continuously liberated (cf. _____, bkrol ba).

khyab 'jug Hindu god. Of the three Bhrama, Vishnu and Shiva, responsible for maintaining the universe. He has a number of incarnations such as Krishna, and according to the Hindus, the Buddha.

klong: Space (capitalized in text) expanse, sphere, realm of..., mass, immensity vastness, scope or boundaries. —gyur: attaining perfection or mastery... —chen, immense space or knowledge = dharmadhatu —chen rab 'byams: realization of vast universal Space or knowledge = Longchenpa. —zer, : nail of space. See gzer.

Longchenpa says in LT that klong can be differentiated from dbying as the space of ultimate mind vs. that of the universal ground. VCTR differentiated them by comparing dbying to the vastness of contemplating the horizon from the seashore. Klong is more like skydiving in the middle of the night. He was referring in particular to the black klong experience of the forty-nine day bardo retreat in darkness. Here Space is beyond reference points of vastness and constraint.

klong sde: Longdé. The Collection of Space. See sde gsum.

klu: Naga, water spirit, serpent [deity]. Living in low watery places and caverns, they are often associated with the lower aspects of the human situation, either those which are necessary, but not exalted, or those which are dark, evil and poisonous. Thus they are associated with skin diseases such as leprosy. In this aspect, they are the enemy of garuda. However, they are said to have great wealth, and to have received the wisdom of the prajñāpāramitā from the Buddha, guarding it until Nagarjuna, klu grub, could receive them. Also the nagas protected Buddha from attacks of the maras on the night before his enlightenment.

kri ya [rgyud]: Kriya tantra, = bya rgyud, the fourth yana. see theg pa dgu.

kun btags: False conception, parikalpita, the merely imputed or illusory nature of external reality projected onto mind-only, which has no true existence at all, like space.

kun byed rgyal po: The all-creating (doing, accomplishing) King, title of the main scripture of the Semde. The King = bodhicitta, personified as Samantabhadra dv. His attributes are explained at length in the text. The King also is one's true enlightened nature.

kun gzhi nam gsum: the neutral alaya, alaya of various habitual patterns, alaya of reality.

kun gzhi nam par shes pa: Alayavijñāna: Universal ground- consciousness. See nam shes bgyad.

kun gzhi: Alaya: Universal ground. See nam shes brgyad.

kun mkhyen ye shes: The omniscient wisdom of enlightenment, which sees all phenomena without mixing them up. cf. ji snyed ye shes.

kun rdzob: Relative, conventional, obscured (in the sense of disguised or costumed) truth, as opposed to don dam, absolute truth. Various systems have different views of what constitutes the relative. See bden gnyis. —gnyis, the two aspects of the relative are, [yang] dag pa'i kun rdzob and log pa'i kun rdzob. Sometimes these refer to ordinary right and wrong judgements within the everyday sphere. In this text they differentiate the confused perception of saṃsāra and the perception of enlightenment which sees things as they are. yang dag is sometimes called absolute truth, but the sense is different from, though not in conflict with the absolute truth of emptiness, which it presupposes.

kun tu bzang po [mo]: Samantabhadra [-i] literally means total or universal goodness. In mahayana Samantabhadra is one of the eight main bodhisattvas, an emanation of Vajrasattva. In saḍhanas the environment is purified as pure appearance by the Samantabhadra offerings, in which offerings of desirable things of the five sense objects are visualized like clouds filling the whole of space. In ati Samantabhadra is the first, primordial buddha, who spontaneously achieved understanding of his own nature as universal enlightenment. His consort is Samantabhadri. Usually he is blue, she is white, and they are naked. The text presents this in detail. When Samantabhadra is united with his consort Samantabhadri, she symbolizes the primordial space of the empty essence, dharmadhātu and prajñāparamita. He symbolizes pure arising in that space of entities that do not go beyond its nature. Samantabhadra does not exist as an ego or individual being, but = buddhahood, one's own true nature. Therefore, all who are enlightened are said to be equal to him. The "I" of the Kimjē, who is the all-creating King, is Samantabhadra. He may be considered the essence of all that is sacred. Ati might say that this is the real concern of all religions and their deities. Some have wondered whether Samantabhadra as lha and bdag chen, big mind, the great self, was not like God in the western sense. I think this is true in a sense. Bdag pa chen po is the great mind beyond ego and non-ego, or self and other, and even God and atheism. In theory the via negativa of Dionysius and "God is not a what" of Aquinas are compatible with this. If there are theists who have no problem with God being emptiness and not something removed by a gap from what we really are, so be it.

lag na rdo rje: bodhiattva who is the lord of secret vajra teachings.

lam bgrod: Treading, traversing the path.

lam lnga: The five paths. These will vary somewhat with different systems. 1) Accumulation, tshogs lam: One accumulates merit and wisdom and avoids confusion and evil deeds so that one will escape the lower realms and enlightenment will eventually manifest. The four foundations of mindfulness are practiced and developed in shamatha. This leads to the clear seeing of vipashyana. 2) Preparation (unification), sbyor lam. Developing vipashyana, one develops a deep understanding of the four noble truths, cutting the root of the desire realm. 3) Seeing, mthong lam: The practitioner comes to understand the unsatisfactoriness of all the realms of form, including the god realm. Direct vision of emptiness is seen. This conveys the essence of liberation, and one enters the first bhuumi, supremely joyful. 4) Meditation, sgom lam: Practicing meditation and relating to the phenomenal world through the paramitas, pha rol tu phyin pa, one attains the second through tenth bhumis. This culminates in the vision of luminosity and wisdom. 5) Fulfillment or no more learning, mthar phyin or mi slob. Attaining the vajra-like samadhi the practitioner enters the eleventh bhuumi, prabhāvara, kun tu 'od, the complete luminosity of buddhahood. See JOL.

lam: The practitioner's way to enlightenment as taught by the Buddha, the method of practice, "the path" = the buddhadharma altogether. —khyer, make something into the path, practice, bring something to the path. eg. one can use kleshas as a means of practice in various ways.

las rlung: Karmic energy, karma prana, as opposed to ye shes rlung, the energy of wisdom.

las: 1 From, as, which is, instead of, rather than. 2) Karma.

lha min: jealous gods who are enemies of the gods, one of the six realms of existence, rigs drug lha: Deities, the divine, the level of things that are exalted. Sometimes buddhist scriptures accept the existence of the entire hindu pantheon on deities as the highest sort of temporarily existing beings. The deities of saḍhana, vidams, protectors, buddhas and bodhisattvas (such as Samantabhadra in this text) sometimes seem to be approached as beings having a personal existence, and sometimes as principles of the energies of one's mind and the phenomena of the world. In any case they are ultimately empty of essence. Buddhahood is eternal, but a certain being Samantabhadra was first to realize it. Doing so, he ceased to be merely personal. We too can become what he became. It is not the existence and nonexistence of deities that differentiates Buddhism from "theistic" religions. It is that the whole issue shifts elusively, leaving one nothing to rely on, so that one is just left hanging. The "theism" that Buddhism eschews has less to do with accepting and worshipping deities than trying to fix the reference points of one's universe through conceptual idolatry. This the great theistic religions also decry. Fixating emptiness and nihilism about any divine nature in any sense is part of that "theism".

It has sometimes been noted that Buddhism sometimes makes statements, eg. about Chakrasaṃvara or Samantabhadra, that are indistinguishable from those theistic dogmatists make. But since these perspectives are not fixated, but seen in the context of the great emptiness, they become a commentary on the phenomenological possibilities of religion. Such openness is the very reverse of cultish dogmatism (or should be). Here one can compare what Longchenpa says about the difference between the use of saṃs term terminology to establish metaphysical and spiritual dogmas and the use in ati to go beyond them.

lhag gnas: When a mandala is prepared, first everything has to be blessed and consecrated. Then it becomes a suitable receptacle for the deities. Thus, for example, one may visualize the vase as a palace, and, while one is doing that, the deities are visualized as existing apart [lhag gnas] in the space above. When everything is ready, they are brought down, and everything becomes of the nature of the deities. LUS.

lhag mthong: Vipashyana, clear seeing. Having calmed the mind through shamatha, and in that stillness gained some sense of the self-existing basic nature, the meditator continues with mindfulness on the breath etc., but lets the boundary dissolve into all-inclusive, panoramic awareness in which all phenomena, not just those of mind, are included without accepting and rejecting. This occurs by seeing there is no real step between the two. The sense of boundary is an illusory fabrication that requires maintenance. As one explores the phenomenal world in this way, the connections of interdependence that lead to sa.msara and nirvana become self-evident. This deepens into direct experience of emptiness as one enters the bodhisattva bhūmīs.

lhan [cig] skyes pa'i [ye shes]: Sa.msara and nirvana arise in one's situation simultaneously. Therefore, the solidity of each is annihilated, and the wisdom beyond both spontaneously appears. Very intense, suffering naturally tends to self-liberate into co-emergence, and the attempt to stabilize a nirvana free of sa.msara tends naturally to evoke co-emergent, conceptualization, fixation, ignorance and so forth. —kun btags, co-emergent false conceptions, ; -ma rig pa, co-emergent ignorance.

lhun grub: Self-existing, of the changeless essence. In particular, the self-existing, spontaneously present nature of dharmadhātu, which, from the path viewpoint, arises effortlessly when pure perception is achieved. One of four states of meditation in Semdé according to NN.

lhun mnyam: = lhun grub mnyam pa nyid.. [KSTR]. LUS was often inclined to view lhun as in lhun mtho = monolithic or massive height, in which case it has a sense of something vast and all-pervading.

lhun: 1 = lhun grub. 2 Monolithic, massive. 3 Dignity.

like thunder you can hear but not see: having no real identity, cf. nges med, ngos 'dzin med. It is like a cloud of no fixed shape or a mutter in stadium that seems to be saying something, but it isn't quite clear what. Really, it is not anything in particular. The situation is like a dream where one feels that something crucial is happening, and yet nothing really justifies such a feeling.

log: Eliminate, wrong, perverted: Ita log, wrong view.

longs spyod rdzogs pa'i sku: sambhogakaya. KPSR presents longs spyod literally being activity = bya ba, which includes in particular the realization of extent ji snyed. longs spyod also means enjoyment and in fact, since nothing needs to be accomplished the realization of sambhogakaya is appreciation, and the activity celebration. It is often so glossed. see sku gsum.

lu gu rgyud: See rdo rje lu gu rgyud.

lung bstan: Give instruction, teach, prophesy.

lung ma bstan: 1) It is not taught. (occurs frequently in the Künjé. 2) it comes to nothing. It is also used this way in the "Song of Lodrö Thaye" in The Rain of Wisdom. 3) Neutral, neither wholesome nor harmful, bad or good. Eg. kun gzhi lung ma bstan, the neutral alaya.

lung: 1 Scripture. 2 Passage or quotation from scripture (as in lung gi gter mdzod, The Scriptural Treasury, the name of Longchenpa's commentary on The Precious Treasury of Dharmadhātu. 3 Reading transmission of a text or practice. 4 Precept. 5 Teaching.

lus ngag sems: Body, speech, and mind (non-honorific), vs. sku gsung thugs. These sets of terms can be used to differentiate the body, speech, and mind of the enlightened and unenlightened states.

ma 'dres: Unmixed, unconfused. Eg. in ji snyed ye shes all the different, individual things are clear and distinct. They do not get mixed up with each other or confused. Unadulterated: Wisdom is not mixed = adulterated with sa.msaric fixation and grasping.

ma 'gags: See 'gag med.

ma bskyed: Not purposely produced, developed, or cranked up. Hence, self-existing, natural. Cf. ma bcos.

ma btsal: Literally, "not sought." But things could be unsought for reasons of ignorance. Also, they are often missed just because they are sought too greedily. So the sense is more like not needing to be sought, because they are self-existing.

ma rig pa: Ignorance, as opposed to rig pa, understanding, insight. ma rig pa occurs when rig pa is covered over by incidental defilements.

mchod rten: stupa. Originally a memorial structure containing relics of the Buddha. Later other holy objects and texts were also put in.

mdo sde pa: Sautrantikas, an abhidharma school of the hinayana. The Abhidharmakosha of Vasubandhu, dbyig gnyen, propounds this viewpoint. The logicians, such as Dignaga and Dharmakirti, hold that what has the power to produce an effect, is absolute truth, and that what does not is relative. They deny the, bye brag pa, vaibha.shika, assertions that space and cessation substantially exist, and that there are simultaneous cause and effect. They hold that consciousnesses do not nakedly see their objects but are themselves generated in the image [rang rig]. They deny the self of persons, but accept that there are other truly existing entities. Thus they accept the self of dharmas.

mdo: Confluence, juncture, main point, suutra (a discourse of the Buddha) mdor na: In summary.

med pa gsal snang: This could mean that the appearances themselves do not exist at all, which is the case from the madhyamaka viewpoint. But all informants concur that the idea is that they are there but are empty, of any truly existing object of which they are appearances. They do not exist with a nature of their own.

mer mer: Of appearances: Shimmering (ES), vibrating, flashing. Also a stage of embryonic development. See notes.

mgnon chos: Abhidharma, schools of philosophy such as the hinayana, bye brag pas and mdo sde pas and the mahayana sems tsam pas who believe in various truly existing dharmas (as madhyamaka and ati do not). These dharmas are grouped into classifications such as the 5 skandhas, 18 dhatus, and 12 ayatanas. They are held to arise interdependently through various causes and conditions. To accept such doctrines is to deny the doctrine of emptiness, a key feature of madhyamaka and tantric systems such as ati.

VCTR said that abhidharma still has a place in tantric systems like ati in charting the geography and evolution of sa.msara and enlightenment. When a kind of free floating panic causes the freezing of basic space and we divide it to try and check what went wrong, the seemingly solid, dualistic phenomena of abhidharma appear and proliferate. In enlightenment the same phenomena become manifestations of the five wisdoms and so forth. In ati dharmas are not thought of as truly existing as in hinayana. They are not even truly existing dharmas of mind as in mind-only. For example, this account is given of the evolution of the illusory experience of the five skandhas. The dualistic split and solidification manifest as form zgugs. Levels of basic accepting and rejecting, feeling tshor ba, and instinctual patterns of meaning/response = perception du shes) appear. A whole repertoire of conditioned attitudes and responses builds up to define the emotional and motivational fabric of the world = samskaras, formations, du byed). The discursive thoughts and intellectualizations of consciousness, rnam shes) fill in every gap to create a seemingly solid situation of full blown egohood in an external world of fixed entities. Meditation reverses this evolution, returning phenomena to the state of basic space of dharmadhatu, as described at length in the present text.

mi ma yin: Literally non-men; pretas, such as graveyard ghosts, often malevolent.

mi pham Rinpoche: Mipham, a nineteenth century Nyingma master and member of the nonsectarian ris med, rime, school. He formulated Nyingma doctrines in such a way that it became possible to consider them in a detailed way in relation to the views of other schools. Eg SSN argues that there is no ultimate incompatibility between Nyingma and shentong doctrines and those of the Gelug school, or between the intentions of Nagarjuna explaining the scriptures of the second turning and those of Asa_ga in explaining the scriptures of the third turning. Cf. chos kyi 'khor lo 'khor.

mi rtog pa: Non-thought, non-conceptuality, non-discursiveness. Longchenpa distinguishes the following: 1. The artificial non-thought of one-pointed meditation which does not go beyond sa.msara. 2. The nyams, nyam, of mi rtog which is a sign of some accomplishment, but is not ultimate realization and is a possible object of attachment and straying. 3. Non-thought = self-existing samadhi or wisdom which is an aspect of realization. The essence of the latter is absence of grasping and fixation rather than a mind clear of phenomena. Thus it is possible for a teacher who has stabilized the mind of non-thought to give teachings etc. nondual mind, sugatagarbha, dharmata. It is beyond all complexities and opposites.

mi'am ci class of spirits included with the deva realm. Some are oddly shaped with a horse's head etc.

mkha' 'gro: One who goes in the sky. Usually = dakini. In one instance in this text = bird. Sometimes general for gods or those who have attained godlike powers. Usually female tantric deities of the five families who guard, serve, present, and embody the tantric teachings, and are the consorts of the Herukas, the male tantric deities. They seem to have evolved from a mischievous and sometimes malevolent class of forest spirits. On the whole they are wrathful or semi-wrathful, symbolizing compassion, emptiness, prajna, the basic fertile space from which everything arises, the unity of desire and space, and the tricky and playful aspect of phenomena. The higher ones, give basic inspiration to seek enlightenment or cut through perversions of the teachings. Some of the lower ones are said to be on the level of local deities or spirits, ghosts, and demons.

mkha' mnyam: The equality of space, as limitless as space.

mnga' bdag: Master, sovereign, lord.

mngon par dga' ba: Abhirati, the eastern buddha field of Ak.shobhya.

GLOSSARY

605

mn̄gon shes: abhijñā. Relative siddhis. The five — : 1. seeing at a distance. 2. Hearing at a distance. 3. Reading others' minds. 4. Remembering past lives. 5. Manifesting miracles. the six —, : Includes the ability to destroy defilements. This last is said to occur on attaining the state of an arhat.

mnyam bzhag: Meditation. (vs. rjes thob, post-meditation) In particular it often refers to the direct intuition of emptiness in the formless meditation of the noble ones, vs. their illusion-like apprehension of appearances in post-meditation.

mnyam nyid: 1. Equality, (especially in terms of the essence, emptiness). 2. Equanimity, as the state of mind of someone realizing 1 mnyam pa chen po: The great equality.

mtha' brgyad: The Muulamadhyamakakarika says:

That which arises interdependently
Is without cessation and has no birth.
It is neither eternal or nothingness.
It is without any coming and any going.
It is not different, nor is it a unity.
Pacifying complexity, it is taught as peace.
To the perfected buddhas who have said this,
To those holy ones I make prostration.

mtha' bzhi med: Without the four extremes. A predicate does not apply, not apply, both, or neither. Eg. to say that for all dharmas true existence is empty is to say that in absolute truth all dharmas do not truly exist, not truly exist, both, or neither. According to madhyamaka, if any of these assertions is maintained, a contradictory consequence can be derived.

mtha' la = mtha geig tu: Completely, without qualification [by its opposite].

mtha': Extreme. A one-sided, rigidly conceptualized viewpoint that confuses features of concepts with those of reality. Concepts are useful in various kinds of practical situations, but to think they have an absolute validity independent of the situations in which they are used, invariably leads to mistakes, according to madhyamaka. The four and eight extremes are kinds of extremes that should be avoided. Thus, if one understands the conventions and limits of words, one can use them to talk about the world and the teachings without falling into extremes. Mipham says SSN. "Not every assertion of existence asserts the extreme of existence. Not every assertion of non-existence asserts the extreme of non-existence... etc."

mtho rjs: those excluding the lower realms, ngan 'gro, where enlightenment is possible, especially the human and god realms. sometimes = mtho ris, the celestial realms, heaven.

mtshan dang dpe byad: see Ch 13.

mtshan dang dpe: The thirty-two major and 80 minor marks of a buddha. They are (sometimes fantastical) physical characteristics, wheels on the hands and feet, arms descending to the knees etc.

mtshan ma'i yul (chos): Objects having fixated characteristics (dharmas).

mtshan/mtshon med: Things like dharmadhatu without fixed characteristics. Such things can be talked about of course, but elude being successfully pigeonholed or exhaustively described by any particular description.

mu stegs: Non-buddhists, tirthikas, especially hindus, the variety most typically encountered within buddhist tradition. The term has a sense of infidel or heretic.

mya ngan las 'das pa: Nirvana, enlightenment. It is said enlightenment in ati is beyond sa.msara and nirvana to differentiate it from partial notions of the lower vanas which, from the viewpoint of ati, are not free from conceptualization and attachment. Such notions would be cessation, emptiness, knowledge, power, bliss, purity, morality, compassion, and social improvement, or their negations. Superficial imitation of the good qualities of former enlightened ones by turning them into preconceived programs is good at the beginning of the path. But in the end it is only creating more sa.msaric obscuration of the naked, boundless relation with our situation that Longchenpa presents as true enlightenment.

na da: iconographically the tip of the bindu, the first and last existence before nothingness. cosmic sound.

ngag 'khyal: Discipline of functional talking, restraining frivolous and unnecessary speech.

ngang du [las]: Within that [state], as that [state]

nges med: 1 Uncertain. 2 Not ascertained as anything in particular. 3 Unfixed, unfixed, unpredictable. 4 Untrue, unreal.

ngo bo: as opposed to manifestation and variety, emptiness possessing all the supreme aspects, nothing whatever but everything arises from it, Essence. Being, principle, substance, identity. In general like rang bzhin, but when they are distinguished, of sugatagarbha, etc. ngo bo refers to the essence, emptiness, and rang bzhin to the nature, the spontaneous presence of luminosity. (The terminology of the kun byed reverses these two.) ngo bo rang bzhin thugs rje: see sku gsum. Cf. snying po, bdag nyid. nfe long gi: Surface of a mirror. It can be said the essence of water is cohesion, the nature wetness, and the function cleansing or thirst- quenching. ngo bo should be distinguished from ngo = Face, viewpoint, side.

ngo sprod: Transmission, pointing out [instruction], showing, introduction, bring face to face with something.

ngos bzung: Recognizable or identifiable, fixated in terms of reference points.

nyams: Temporary experiences of meditation, which, however, are signs of a certain development in practice. (vs. sgyu ma, nying 'khrul, illusory and hallucinatory experiences.) The three usually mentioned are bliss, luminosity, and non-thought.

nyan thos: shravakas, the hearers or disciples of the hinayana, the first of the nine yanas. See theg pa dgu.

nye bar [nyer] len gyi phung po lnga: ES: Perpetuating, substantializing, bringing about, grasping, solidifying the skandhas; nye bar len lnga = phung po lnga.

nyon mongs gsum: = The three poisons, passion, aggression, and ignorance, chags, zhe sdang, gti mug.

nyon mongs lnga; rtsa ba'i—: The five root kleshas are hatred, envy, desire, jealousy, and ignorance.

pha rgyud: Father tantras of the anuttara tantras, emphasize form, upaya, and working with aggression, vs. mother tantras emphasizing space, prajña, illusion, desire, and compassion. Maha is considered father tantra and anu mother tantra.

pha rol tu phyin pa drug: generosity, discipline, patience, exertion, meditation, prajna/knowledge.

pha rol tu phyin pa: Paramitas or perfection practices of the bodhisattva path. All are practiced on every bhuumi, but on each of the ten bhumis one is emphasized. 1 rab tu dga' ba, supreme joy: Generosity, sbyin pa. 2 dri ma med pa, stainless: Discipline, tshul khrims. 3 'od byed pa, illuminator: Patience, bzod pa. 4 'od phro ba, blazing light: Diligence, brtson 'grus. 5 shin tu sbyang dka', difficult to conquer: Meditation, bsam gtam. 6 mngon tu 'gyur ba, presence: Knowledge, prajña. 7 ring du song ba, far going: Skillful means, upaya. 8 mi g'yo ba, motionless: Aspiration, smon lam. 9 fegs pa'i blo gros, good intellect: Power, stobs. 10 chos kyi sprin, clouds of dharma: Wisdom, ye shes. They are perfect or transcendent in being practiced from the perspective of emptiness. For example, generosity is perfect when there is no thought of giver, gift, and receiver, any action of giving. Then the action is pure and spontaneous. See JOL phra: Subtle. Probably similar to description of Kagyü divisions in SKK 3.323: When the eighty kinds of innate thoughts of coarse mind, possessing the three appearances [of body, grasping subject, and grasped object] are eliminated and cease, and everything abides merely in emptiness, that is subtle mind. Free from grasping the characteristic of the experience of emptiness, luminosity, absolute bodhicitta, which is called the manifestation of enlightenment, is the subtlest mind. This mind that is said to have defiled continuity is called subtle, and undefiled continuity is the subtlest. Similarly as for body, ...all the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas, having the nature of the environment and its inhabitants, are resolved as the coarse circle of the deities. Nadi, prana, and pure bodhicitta are resolved as the subtle essence. The well established singularity of support and supported is taught as the very subtle, co-emergence. Thus in meditating in the developing stage, first all the skandhas, dhatus, and ayatanas of the impure body which are to be purified as emptiness are the coarse body. Prana, nadi, and bindu, which are to be established as the body, speech, and mind mandalas of the deities are the subtle. At the time of fruition, the co-emergent three vajras, trikaya, the inseparable body of the realities of the natural state, are the subtlest... Thus, the coarse is the designated ground of purification, the subtle the object of purification in process, and the subtlest the ultimate state of the object of purification.

phrin las: Enlightened activity, buddha activity, which is egoless, beyond conception, spontaneously arising, and spontaneously perfect and appropriate. In particular, the buddha activities of the five families, pacifying (suffering etc), enriching (accumulations of good qualities), magnetizing (students), destroying (whatever needs to be destroyed or those who cling to that), and self-existing, effortless accomplishment phrin las: the spontaneous activity of enlightened beings. For example, without thinking about it buddhas emanate limitless emanations in limitless times and places to tame limitless sentient beings. However the ordinary teaching activities etc. of an enlightened person are also called buddha activity.

phun sum tshogs pa lnga: The five perfections, most often attributes of sambhogakaya, but in this text applied to the three kayas: excellent teacher, teaching, retinue, place, and time.

GLOSSARY

phung po: Expanse [eg. of wisdom] phung po lnga: the five skandhas or “heaps” one of the systems of categories under which the dharmas are organized in the abhidharma: 1 Form, gzugs, including physical objects. 2 Feelings, tshor ba, positive, negative, or neutral. 3 Perception, du shes. 4 Formations, du byed. 5 Consciousness, nam shes. In ati consciousness is understood in terms of the eight consciousnesses of yogacara. In hinayana abhidharma, eg. Abhidharmakosha, the skandhas are classes of truly existing dharmas. In ati they can also be thought of as an evolving series of non-existent confusions. Cf. mngon chos. In enlightenment these vanish and the skandhas manifest as the five wisdoms. Cf. mngon chos.

phyag rgya bzhi [of mahayoga]: In particular: 1 thugs dam tshig gi phyag rgya (mind as samayamudra). 2 gsung chos kyi phyag rgya (speech is dharmamudra). 3 sku phyag rgya chen po (body is mahamudra). 4 phrin las las kyi phyag rgya (Buddha activity is karmamudra).

phyag rgya chen po: Mahamudra, great seal. 1 Consort of empty form. 2 One of the four mudras of mahayoga. 3 Fruition teachings associated especially with the kagyü lineage as Dzogchen is primarily associated with the nyingma lineage.

phyag rgya: Mudra, symbolic [hand gesture], seal, symbolic encounter, consort.

phyi nang gsang: Outer concerns the external world, inner the body, secret the inner life of feelings etc.

phyi rgyud: The outer tantras which understand luminosity/emptiness beyond conception, but still believe that the fruition is established through stages and effort.

phyogs bcu: The ten directions, the four cardinal directions, four intermediate, up and down.

phyogs med: Impartial, without conceptual partialities. When one is impartial = without accepting or rejecting, one is not attached to partialities of concept. Thus, the impartiality = non-bias, inseparability, of the two truths is transparently seen.

phyogs: Direction, part, aspect, bias, partiality, side.

rab 'byams: Infinite, vast, encompassing, universal, immense, boundless, the whole of..., widely and deeply learned.

rab 'byor: Subhuti, a prominent and analytically inclined disciple of the Buddha.

rags: 1 Coarse. 2 Dependent.

Rahu: Ra hu

rang bshag: Let be as it is, rest as it is = cog gshag; self-absorbed, self-rested, self-established, established as merely one's own experience.

rang byung: Natural; naturally occurring or arising; self-arising, spontaneous. Eg. hunger is rang byung when one does not eat. A shape like a face found on a rock is a rang byung sculpture. Impromptu verse is rang byung.

rang bzhin gsum: kun btags, gzhan dbang, yong grub; parikalpita, paratantra, parinishpanna; false conceptions, other-caused relativity, the completely perfect. See Ch 3.

rang bzhin: Nature, actuality, natural expression, natural, intrinsic, inherent. In relation to sugatagarbha etc it means the luminous manifestation, vs. the ngo bo emptiness. ngo bo/ rang bzhin/ thugs rje. See sku gsum rang dag: Intrinsically pure, self-purified.

rang dbang: Freedom, independence, mastery vs. gzhan dbang, arising interdependently from others. The second of the three natures of mind-only.

rang ga [ma]: Spontaneous, ordinary.

rang gsal: Natural, clearly as it is; intrinsic clarity, radiance, brilliance, luminosity; naturally awake; self-cognizing. [esp in mind-only] See rang rig rang gsal.

rang mtshan: Own-, specific, or individuating characteristics that things would have if they were independent, individual entities existing in their own right. Ati accepts Madhyamaka claims to establish the impossibility of rang mtshan. The real thing, intrinsically identifiable, independently existing.

rang ngo: [One's] own nature, original face, true nature, self-nature.

rang rgyal: Pratyekabuddha, the second of the nine yanas. See theg pa dgu.

rang rgyud: 1 One's own being or stream of consciousness. 2 Svatantrika school of madhyamaka.

3 Independent vs. gzhan rgyud.

rang rig: 1 Intrinsic insight or awareness, = rang byung rig pa. 2 one's own insight or awareness, = rang gyi rig pa. 3 self-cognizance, self-insight, self-knowledge, rang gis rang rig. KPSR seems to favor 2), as 1) seems prima facie to involve claims of a fixed nature or entity that would conflict with madhyamaka, and 3. is specifically rejected in madhyamaka critiques of mind only. 1). Self-arising = natural = intrinsic insight is favored by TT and LUS; rang gyis rang rig self-insight in the sense of non-duality, and non-other of insight and its objects.. [KSTR, KTHR]. They all agree that all these interpretations are relevant if understood in the right way. They also agree that any acceptable interpretation must be distinguished from the rang rig rang gsal of the mind only school, conceived to be a truly-existing, self-intuiting substance. Ati accepts the madhyamaka refutation of such a substance. Part of the apparent disagreement is because Tibetan does not require choosing among these various uses of rang. The demand to do so is somewhat artificial. Cf. rang shar. See the passage in the text where Longchenpa specifically addresses the difference between mind-only and ati use of mind-only terminology. The main point is that ati does not accept these terms as describing dharms that truly or absolutely exist, and so does not fixate these conceptions.

rang rig was introduced by the sautrantikas. The two terms are pretty well equivalent here. rang gsal in mind-only means more or less self-apprehended, i.e. self-illuminating or clarifying, appearing clearly to itself. In mind-only, sa.msara has perception of quality of subject and object, and enlightenment involves seeing that in reality there are no external objects distinct from mind, but only various states of mind, which alone truly exists. All experience has to be the mind's experience of itself, because there is nothing else to be experienced. When one understands that this mind is changeless, eternal, and naturally blissful, letting go of attachments to the incidental waves on the great ocean of mind, one loses hope and fear about sa.msara and becomes enlightened. In ati too, insight is rang rig rang gsal, self-apprehending insight, and the luminous manifestations of the nature are actually of the essence of insight and do not go beyond it. But where sems tsam presents this as absolute truth, ati presents it as having only provisional, conventional validity. It is more valid than ordinary perception for the same kinds of reason that, in the venerable example, seeing the rope is more valid than seeing the snake. From the absolute viewpoint, insight has no more true existence than external objects. If it did, it would be contradictory in madhyamaka terms to say that insight, which does not appear with distinct qualities etc., is the same thing as appearances that have these qualities etc.. Mind-only, in claiming absolute validity for its formulations, falls into such faults as this. Ati tries to avoid them by claiming that the true state of affairs transcends conceptualization.

rang sar: Naturally, spontaneously, its own condition, in itself, as it is.

rang shar: 1) = rang 'byung: Self-arising, naturally occurring. Mere spontaneous arising is not peculiar to enlightenment, since the kleshas and obscurations are also notorious for arising by themselves in the superficial sense that they are not willed or produced by a specific effort. 2) Longchenpa glosses at least one occurrence as = rang snang shar. In that passage rang shar is taken to entail rdzogs, exhausted of defilements and therefore perfected. Thus, by appearing as mere experience, an aspect of insight, and thus appearing as they really are, they are perfected/exhausted.

rang snang: Personal experience.. One's own experience. When delusive, it has a sense of snang = false appearance, one's own projection. When good, it can mean natural or self-appearance of things as they are, in particular of objects appearing merely as one's own experience, and not as solid external entities. Self appearing, [of sambhogakaya deities etc]. Intrinsically appearing [as the rays of the sun]. Of the same nature with oneself.

rang sor: 1 As it is, where it is. 2 The freshness of one's original, natural state.

rang stong: Emptiness of its own nature or of itself. The typical sort of madhyamaka system, vs. gzhan stong which claims the absolute nature exists, but is empty of any truly existing other. See SSN. for Mipam's view on this distinction.

rang [bzhin] babs: "As it is" or occurring as it is, natural[ness], natural flow, natural state, spontaneous, naturally occurring.

rang: Self, prefixing compounds: self-, one's own, spontaneously, intrinsically, natural, [only] as it is, merely within one's own experience (and hence unreal), acting on itself. This multiplicity can make rang- compounds very difficult to evaluate. Often more than one sense is relevant. In such cases LUS was inclined to think that all the different aspects were part of the meaning.

rbad chod la chod: rbad = entirely. chod, cf. chig chod = sufficient.

rdo rje 'dzin: Level of a vajra holder, sometimes the thirteenth bhuumi.

rdo rje chang: Vajradhara personifies the state of primordial buddhahood. His function in the kagyü teachings is rather like that of Samantabhadra in nyingma.

rdo rje dbyings: Vajradhatu, indestructible space, the vajra-like aspect of ultimate space.

rdo rje sems dpa': Vajrasattva, a buddha of the vajra family, white and associated with purity.

rdo rje theg pa: the tantra or mantra path, one of the three vehicles, theg pa gsum. It is characterized by features like visualization practice, yoga, and strong samaya vows to the teacher and lineage.

GLOSSARY

rdo rje: 1 Prince of stones, diamond. 2 Indestructible, adamantine. 3 The weapon of indra, the thunderbolt.

rdol thabs su smra: One just puts forward one's own ideas without due attention to traditional knowledge in a situation where it is not appropriate, as eg. in arguing points of law or scientific theory.

rdzogs pa: Perfection, exhaustion, completion, fulfillment. Sa.msaric, impure aspects are exhausted, revealing things as the eternal perfection of the kayas and wisdoms. VCTR once suggested using perfection for this, but changing one's understanding of what perfection is—neither an eternalistic fixation on an impossible standard, or a nihilistic rejection of everything there is in its name. In this tradition emptiness/luminosity IS perfection.

rdzogs rim: Tantric stage of completion or perfection, sampannakrama, as opposed to visualization practice of sadhana. Both formless meditation and yogic practices such as the six yogas of Naropa are included.

rdzogs [pa] chen [po]: Ati, great perfection, mahasandhi, the ninth yana.

rgya: 1 Net, cage 2 Expanse, vastness rgyal ba: capitalized the Buddha, otherwise buddhas.

rgyu mtshan theg pa: Vehicles of cause and characteristics. In particular the first three yantras which present enlightenment as a causal process. Sometimes = hinayana, since it does not postulate emptiness. However all vehicles but ati have certain characteristics that are to be abandoned and attained by causal means.

rgyud: Continuity, tantra. In the latter case the continuity is that of the basic nature, sugatagarbha etc. See rang rgyud.

ri rgyal rab: Mount Meru, which in Indian cosmology is at the center of the world surrounded by four continents. Of these we inhabit the southern continent, Jambudvīpa (Jambuling).

rig 'dzin: awareness holder rig pa: 1 Insight, [intrinsic] awareness of the absolute, pretty much equivalent to wisdom. [KSTR] 2) Mind, knowledge, intelligence, understanding in the ordinary sense. -Inga: philosophy, reasoning, grammar, medicine, mechanical arts and crafts. However 1 is also the essence of 2, and in realization 2 does not go beyond 1. It was to bring out this dual aspect that VCTR preferred the translation "insight." cf. rang rig.

rigs drug: gods, asuras, humans, animals, pretas, hell beings.

rigs drug: gods, asuras, humans, animals, pretas, hell beings.

rigs drug: The six realms or lokas of sa.msara in which beings take rebirth. They are those of gods, asuras (demigod enemies of the gods), humans, animals, hungry ghosts (pretas), and hell beings.

rigs Inga: The five divisions of the families of the mandala: Vajra, rdo rje; ratna, rin chen, jewel padma, lotus; karma; and sangs rgyas, buddha. They are associated respectively with sa.msaric and enlightened forms of intellect and aggression; feeling, richness and territoriality; passion; artistic sense, discrimination; energy of activity and accomplishment; and spaciousness, the overall viewpoint, or neurotically just ignoring things. There are extensive descriptions in VCTR's Cutting through Spiritual Materialism and The Myth of Freedom. The five families are associated with the five colors, kleshas, skandhas, elements, bhagavans and their consorts, and wisdoms, qv. They are also associated with the seasons, time of day etc.

rigs sngags: Vidya mantra. rigs = esoteric knowledge. Knowledge of magic and magical formulas. By means of these the magician is said to create illusions, destroy enemies, change the weather, and demonstrate power over phenomena in other ways.

rigs: 1 Kinds, varieties, aspects 2 Family, lineage 3 Caste 4 Nature = snying po 5 Buddha nature 6 Realm = kham 7 Reasoning, logic, philosophy, ... rigs: It is logical, certain that rigs: being of the family of beings who can attain enlightenment. The eternal gotra is dharmadhatu. The incidental gotra is our intrinsic potential of achieving this combined with the process of the path of purification.

rim pa: Stage, detail, aspect.

rin chen sna bdun: wheel, jewel, queen, minister, elephant, horse, general. Or ruby, sapphire, lapis, gold, silver, spug mu tig dmar po ???, emerald ris med: Without limits, borders, bias, partiality, as between phenomena and dharmata, sa.msara and nirvana etc. Non-sectarian school founded in the nineteenth century by Khyentse the great, rje btsun: jetsün, [exalted] lord.

Jamgön Kongtrül the great, and others.

rjes thob: Post-meditation as opposed to the meditative state, mnyam bshag. In particular the noble ones who have not attained the pure bhuumis are said to cognize emptiness directly in meditation. In post-meditation false appearance still appears to them, but they know it to be empty, so it has the aspect of a dream or illusion. In general, all Tibetan schools agree that buddhas have transcended this distinction. They know the appearances of all sentient beings, but directly perceive their emptiness at the same time. Controversial points are just how accurate the perception of the bodhisattvas of the pure bhuumis is, and the extent to which lesser beings are capable of flashes of pure perception that can be used on the path. Ati tradition holds that sa.msara is self-liberating and enlightenment self-existing and self-actualizing. The guru points out that the nature of enlightenment is already within us, and that even ordinary persons can have brief flashes of experience of this. From that perspective, the path consists of acknowledging this and learning to let it be as it is.

rlung lnga: life, equalizing, upward moving downward moving, fire. See ch 9.

rlung: Prana. Part of the trio of prana, nadi, and bindu, rtso, lung, thig le. rtso: Nadi, root, vein, artery, psychic channel as visualized in yoga (such as gtum mo, tummo, (heat yoga)), any tubular organ. They are said in tibetan medicine to occur throughout the body, and to cluster together like wheels, chakras, in various energy centers of the body, such as the heart, brain etc. rlung: Wind (vayu), breathing, vital energy. In tibetan medicine the various vital energies move along the nadis. las — Karma, prana, karmic energy. thig le: Bindu, 1 Dot, circle, ring, in particular colored dot on the forehead between the eyes, dot on letter or mantric syllable representing the anusvara, eg. "M" in HAM. It is typically presented as a small flame. 2 The red and white thig les, the male and female vital essences as represented and embodied in semen and menstrual blood. When acted on by the pranas, these are refined, melting into a more subtle form that produces bliss etc. 3 = thig le nyag gcig: The single universal essence, the sole seed = byang chub sems, chos dbyings, ngo bo stong pa, etc.

mal 'byor bzhi: In this text this refers usually to the four yogas of mahayoga as presented eg. in the Künje. 1 sems dpa: The yoga of the two sattvas, samayasattva and jñānasattva, as practiced in the three lower tantras. 2 mā hā: Mahayoga, which works especially with the developing stage. 3 yongs su: Perfecting yoga, anu, which works especially with the perfecting stage. 4 shin tu: supreme yoga or ati.

mal 'byor rgyud: Yoga tantra, the sixth yana. See theg pa dgu.

mal 'byor [pa]: Yoga, yogin, literally meaning inseparable union with the absolute.

mal ma: The fundamental state before the various projections of subject and object occur. Cf. gnas lugs [tshul] rnām kun mchog ldan stong nyid: Emptiness possessing all the supreme aspects, as described in the Uttaratantra. Emptiness as realized by the buddhas is not nihilistic nothingness. It is the great emptiness, the union of appearance and emptiness, possessing the kayas, wisdoms, buddha qualities and activities, etc. The details are an important part of resolving the view of emptiness.

rnām pa: Aspect, phenomena, always.

rnām rtog: Discursive thought, conceptualization, the conceptualized phenomena of sa.msara.

rnām shes lnga/drug eye, ear, nose, tongue/ taste, body rten 'brel: 1 Interdependent arising, eg. as a rainbow appears from interconnection of sunlight, rain, air, the eyes, and mind, as reflections appear in a mirror, or as appearances appear in the mind. The rainbow is not the appearance of any of these, or all of these. Yet it is not the appearance of something completely independent of the above either. In madhyamaka rten 'brel is equated to emptiness. 2 Auspicious coincidence.

rten dang brten pa: Environment and inhabitants. OR support and supported. For example it will be said in general that the physical environment is the support and mind the supported, cf. snod bcud. In particular, the environment of the mandala, the palace and surrounding features, and the deities inhabiting it are called rten dang brten pa.

rtog pa: Concept, or perceiving things in terms of concepts.

rtogs pa bzhi: See appendix one.

rtogs su ma chod: Not cut off by concepts.

rtso gsum: the 3 main channels of prana, wind or vital energy in the body. These are the central channel, and the right and left channels ro ma and rkyang ma. They are visualized in breath control yoga.

rtso rlung thig le: Nadi, prana, and bindu. These are aspects of hatha yoga practices such as gtum mo that lead to awareness of insight. See for example Chang and others. See rlung. The direct insight of trechö is not directly concerned with these practices.

sa bcu: The ten bhūmis or levels of the bodhisattva path, entered on attaining the path of seeing from the five paths, lam lnga, and perfected on the path of meditation. See pha tol tu phyin pa.

sa bon: 1 = bag chags. The seeds of good and bad karma. From the path viewpoint, transmission and practice are like planting and cultivating seeds that will ripen as the fruition. 2) But from the absolute viewpoint this is only uncovering the ultimate sugatagarbha that was there all along. So relative reality is itself a seed of buddhahood in that sense.

sa gsum above the earth (god realms) on the earth (human realm etc. and below the earth (nagas and hells) sa sbyang: Training on the bhūmis. See JOL.

Sa ra ha: Saraha, a mahāsiddha, grub thob chen po, who worked as an arrow-maker and had a consort of the same trade. He composed many songs or dohas describing the enlightened state.

sal le ba: Vividness. Ego fixation draws on the energy of the natural state to produce blockage and obscuration. So, by comparison, experience of things as they are is one of vivid splendor and immensity.

sang nge [ba]: Pristine etherial; the spacious clarity and primordial purity of emptiness, like fresh mountain air.

sangs rgyas kyi yon tan the pure qualities of enlightened perception of things as they are.

sangs rgyas: Buddha[hood], enlightenment.

sangs: Purified, awakened.

sbubs: 1) Covering, cocoon, shell, confinement, hollow, narrow space, sheath. 2) TT essence (cf. bcud), nature. 3) Field of....

byang chub sems gnyis: aspiring and entering smon 'jug.

sdug bsngal bgyad: birth, old age, sickness, death, meeting enemies, separation from intimates, not getting what we want, sufferings of the skandhas.

sdug bsngal gsum: the sufferings of suffering, the composite, and change.

sems can: Sentient being = 'gro ba, unenlightened inhabitant of the six lokas having dualism of body and mind, vessel and essence, snod bcud, etc.

sems dang yid dang chos: TT sems = Basic mind of duality, alayavijñāna and kṛeṣha consciousness. yid = Intellectual consciousness, yid kyi nam shes. chos = Perceptions of the sense consciousnesses.

sems dp'a: = bodhisattva, byang chub sems dp'a sems dpa' chen po: mahāsattva, a bodhisattva of the pure bhūmis from the eighth upward, who experiences the pure vision of luminosity.

sems dpa'i mal 'byor: Sattva yoga: See mal 'byor bzhi.

sems las 'byung ba: Mental contents, inner feelings and so forth, not counting external perceptions of the five senses.

sems tsam: With madhyamaka one of the two great philosophical systems of the mahayana. It is associated with Asa ga and his brother Vasubandhu. It is also propounded in such sutras of the third turning (chos kyi 'khor lo 'khor) such as the La kavatara and Sandhinirmocana. It is said to record the realization experience of those who emphasized yoga more than the logical dialectics of madhyamaka, and hence is also known as mal 'byor spyod. It holds that luminous mind is the absolute reality, yongs grub, parinirvāṇa. Experiences of mind, like waves in water, are relative, dependently arising reality, gzhan dbang, paratantra. Our beliefs concerning a world of external objects that are other than mind are confused, merely imputed, and false, kun btags, parikalpita. Therefore, the duality of perceiver and object is a feature of saṃsāric confusion, and does not occur for enlightened mind. As there is nothing other than enlightened mind for it to perceive, it can be said to be intrinsically self-perceiving, rang rig rang gsal. Ati too accepts non-duality, the absolute nature of mind itself, rang rig rang gsal etc. But as Longchenpa notes in the text it sees this in the light of madhyamaka emptiness. Therefore it is not accepted that any of this terminology describes anything that is truly existing or non-empty of the level of the absolute. The use is for practical benefit in the relative sphere, in the same way exponents of madhyamaka speak practically of chairs and tables in everyday life, without believing that they have absolute existence. This kind of use all schools of madhyamaka sanction.

sems: 1 Dualistic mind. 2 = sems nyid or byang chub sems: The nature of mind, mind itself, bodhicitta (occurs in the titles of tantras 3) = Semde in compounds like _____, sems smad: The lesser texts of the Semde.

sgo gsum: The three gates, body, speech, and mind. grol ba'i sgo gsum: The three gates of liberation: the signless, markless, and wishless.

sgrib ma gnyis: nyon mongs and shes bya: Kleshas, knowables or primitive beliefs about reality. They are the obstacles to omniscience, and the pure vision of luminosity.

sgrub: Affirm, establish sgyu ma dpe bregyad: The eight examples of illusion: 1 Dream. 2 Echo. 3 City of the gandharvas (celestial musicians etc. who live on smells). 4 mig thor: A growth on the eyes, cataracts? 5 Mirage. 6 Illusion. 7 Reflection. 8 A magically emanated city. Sometimes the moon in water, lightning, a rainbow, and a bubble are added, making twelve].

shang shang: half human mythical bird, something like a garuda.

shes pa: Awareness, knowledge.

shes rab: Literally, supreme knowledge, prajña. Intelligence, discriminating knowledge in general, and in particular knowledge of emptiness as presented in the prajñaparamita scriptures, the reasoning of madhyamaka etc. shes rab pha rol tu phyin pa: Perfection of prajña, the sixth of the ten paramitas. Emptiness is directly realized in a way transcending concepts. In a strict sense this refers to realization in formless meditation. Shes rab and ye shes can be loosely used so that they are equivalent, referring to the transcendent knowledge of realization. ye shes involves the further realization of luminosity, pure appearance, omniscience, and the various other aspects of wisdom. It is the final paramita, the culmination of their development. Prajña clearly sees the essence of things, but does not yet see things as they are as the buddhas do.

shin rje: He and his retinue preside over Hell.

shin tu rnal 'byor: Supreme yoga = ati. See mal 'byor bzhi.

shugs 'byung: Spontaneous, self-arising, suddenly-arising.

skra shad: Seeing hairs or spots in the eyes, due to solidification and opacity of the vitreous humor.

sku bzhi: the three kayas + svabhavikakaya, de kho na nyid kyi sku.

sku gdung: The bodily remains of a teacher after death or the reliquary in which they are placed —bar ba: A text, The Blazing Relics of the Buddha Body.

sku gsum: Dharmakaya, chos sku; sambhogakaya, longs spyod rdzogs pa'i sku; and nirmanakaya, sprul sku. The first is the essence of buddhahood, the benefit for oneself, unborn primordial insight, awareness devoid of content, like space. It is called [buddha]dharmakaya, because it embodies the essence and fruition of the teachings. Dharmakaya is sometimes used in the sense of non-dual dharmakaya. In that case it includes all the phenomena of trikaya, in the aspect of inclusion within dharmakaya and not going beyond its essence. In this sense it is similar to dharmadhatu. Among the three kayas dharmakaya is associated particularly with the essence, emptiness. Sambhogakaya, and nirmanakaya are the two ruupakayas or form bodies, which are the benefit for others.

Sambhogakaya is the realm of enjoyment/realization of pure form, contemplated aside from existence as external objects. This includes visions of the pure lands and teachers (eg. of Samantabhadra, akani.shtha etc.) and form altogether as seen from that perspective. It is associated with the vision of luminosity, the nature.

Nirmanakaya is associated with the play of appearance of this dualistic, material world and so forth, which arise from the power of compassion to ripen beings for enlightenment. Longchenpa makes the remark that, strictly speaking, the two ruupakayas should be regarded as the ground of arising of their respective form phenomena rather than as those phenomena themselves. Otherwise contradictions may arise from regarding dharmakaya, which is essentially non-apparent and various apparent phenomena as having the same essence. This seems a little odd after all he has said about everything being included in the essence of insight-bodhicitta. But it does explain why he frequently uses formulas like thugs rje'i 'char gzhi, the ground of arising of compassion.

sku gsung thugs: Body, speech, and mind (honorific). When juxtaposed with lus ngag sems (non-honorific) it can mean enlightened vs. unenlightened body, speech, and mind.

sku lnga: There are various lists of the five kayas. The most common is trikaya (sku gsum) plus the mahasukhakaya, bde ba chen po'i sku, the body of great bliss, representing the inseparable bliss aspect, and the svabhavikakaya, ngo bo nyid kyi sku, which represents the unity of the kayas. Another list that is cited in the text is the changeless vajrakaya, mi, gyur rdo rje sku; the kaya of full manifestation of enlightenment, mngon par byang chub pa'i sku; Peaceful dharmakaya; sambhogakaya; and the variously manifested nirmanakaya cir yang sprul pa'i sku. Cf. T188. See appendix 2.

sku: sometimes = The kaya of emptiness, dharmakaya.

613

skye ba bzhi: The four modes of birth: womb, egg, heat and moisture, and spontaneous. See ch. 9.

skye ba med: From the absolute viewpoint, unborn, non-arising, non-truly-existent, because things and arising are empty. Relatively enlightened reality is unborn because it is eternally self-existing, and never arises as a limited thing. Nevertheless, from unborn dharmakaya, which is born as nothing at all, the pure appearance of rûpakaya rises. Though born in that sense, it too is unborn in the sense of becoming truly existing things other than dharmakaya.

skye mched bcu gnyis: The twelve ayatanas. The six senses and their objects. Cf. kham bcu brgyad skyong: Guard, protect or maintain is the basic meaning. In ati the sense is remembering that we are always resting in the essence. In a negative sense, it means trying to maintain something self-existing that has no need of that and in fact will even be obscured by the attempt.

sngang ba: 1) Appearance 2) False appearance of truly existent other etc, eg. perceptions of rocks and trees. 3) The objects of 2, the apparent rocks and trees themselves. Eg. med pa gsal sngang means that the objects, not the appearances do not exist.

sngang ba'i ye shes: ES: Wisdom of manifestation, - of appearance. The intrinsic radiance of awareness appearing as luminosity. Within the clear luminosity of insight-dharmata, rise the appearances of the fruition, without going beyond self-insight. Wisdom is not analytical knowledge. One directly perceives emptiness etc. Cf. SSN, "In our tradition when one actually sees the absolute, it is the kayas and wisdoms."

sngags kyi theg pa: the tantric or vajrayana teachings.

sngags: Mantra, praise.

snod bcud: the vessel is the environment, the world, and the essence the inhabitants, sentient beings. The vessel and essence, (as metaphor). snod = The container as the external world. bcud = The experience of beings within it, here compared to the liquid in a bottle, the essential part of the situation. Sometimes rendered "the environment and inhabitants (of the phenomenal world)."

snying po: 1 Heart. 2 Heart-essence or essence. 3 Garbha, = sugatagarbha, bde bshegs snying po.

snyom 'jug: Meditative absorption, samapatti. One might use it to obtain bsam gtan, dhyana. Samadhi originally in the abhidharma is an omnipresent faculty of concentration on whatever objects are present. It came to mean absorption in various objects, and thus ting nge 'dzin tends to be differentiated by its objects. Longchenpa too differentiates purposefully attained bsam gtan from naturally existing ting nge 'dzin qua awareness of the absolute.

so so rang rig [ye shes]: Since it discriminates mind and wisdom, it can be called discriminating-awareness wisdom. Since wisdom is also self-awareness in the sense of being insight of otherlessness, it can be called discriminating self-awareness wisdom. Since it is a non-conceptual personal encounter with wisdom, it can be called individual and personal wisdom. So so can be interpreted to mean either the individual entities that are known or the individual knower, rang rig has the various interpretations of that term qv. In any case it should not be confused with the padma family wisdom so sor rtags pa'i ye shes, discriminating wisdom [of individual things].

spangs rtogs: Simultaneous renunciation/ realization. This is an aspect of enlightenment, not experienced by ordinary beings. Because of realization, confused perceptions and desires naturally do not arise for them. Everything is enlightenment for them. This is very different from nges 'byung, which is a distaste for and rejection [zhen log] of sa.msara in ordinary beings like ourselves who aspire to whatever we think we understand as enlightenment. [KTHR.]

spros bral: Simplicity; unconditioned; free from conceptualization, complexity, elaboration, constructions. One of the four yogas of mahamudra. spros bral often refers to direct vs. conceptual realization of emptiness by wisdom.

sprul sku gsum: bzo ba'i sprul sku, skye b'i sprul sku, mchog gi sprul sku. OR skye ba'i sprul sku, mchog gi sprul sku OR sna tshogs sprul sku, 'gro 'dul sprul sku and rang bzhin sprul sku. The working or various tulkus are gifted individuals, artists, craftsmen, scientists etc who so benefit beings. The born or taming tulkus are the rinpoches usually called tulkus, who have taken human birth in order to tame beings by the dharma. The supreme tulku is the Buddha.

sprul sku: Nirmanakaya. See sku gsum.

spyan lnga: The five eyes. 1 The eye of flesh. 2 The divine eye (of relative siddhi). 3 The eye of prajña (emptiness). 4 The dharma eye of pure vision. 5 The buddha eye of omniscience.

spyan ras gzigs: bodhisattva of compassion.

spyi blugs: Literally head-vase, a coronation vase, especially golden, used in crowning kings. Later similar vases were used in empowerments. To say wisdom is the coronation vase means that it confers empowerment as King of dharmata.

spyod rgyud: Upa yoga, the fifth yana. See theg pa dgu.

spyod yul: Sphere of behavior, realization, instantiation. —med: It does not exist. skal med spyod yul ma yin: Not realized by those without good fortune.

spyod: 1 Behavior. 2 Apprehension. 3 Action in the trio view, practice, and action srid gsum: The three realms: The desire realm and its inhabitants, the realm of pure form (visions, the deities of pure form etc), and the formless realm (inhabited by formless deities).

srid pa: The phenomenal world, sa.msara.

srin po: demonic vampire-like beings. Among other things they can kill with their touch.

Stages can vary for different sadhanas. Examples might be these: 1. Visualizing the deity and palace: shastra, a treatise or discourse on any topic. A discourse delivered by the Buddha is a sutra.

stobs kyi rigs pa: The power of direct experience of reality, the ultimate source of all reasoning.

stong pa [nyid]: Emptiness. It is established conceptually by showing that a concept cannot be instantiated, eg. round square. It is directly intuited in the formless meditation of the aryas. At the time of fruition it is realized as a direct vision of naturelessness as the nature of the absolute, "nothing whatever and so it arises as all there is."

stong pa'i rang gzugs: rang gzugs, self-form, is like rang snang, self-appearance qua one's own appearance. Forms appear to one, but they are empty of any truly existing nature of their own. They are kun btags, dualistic, false conceptions in the sense of yogacara and natureless in the sense of Nagarjuna.

stugs po bkod pa: Gandavyuha, the densely ornamented or densely structured realm, as described in the sutra of the same name. This is the form of the vision of the sambhogakaya realm that realizes/enjoys the pure perceptions and energies of omniscient wisdom. This is also aesthetic perception of form etc. as the ornament. The array is dense not only because it is elaborate, but because of its multifarious connections of rten 'brel etc. which are such that everything is said to be contained within everything else. In this closed, endless web of pure vision, everything contains everything else and presupposes everything else, so ultimates of time, space, and meaning are nowhere to be found. Thus, according to the Avata.msaka Sutra, within every atom of the universe the whole universe is contained, and within every instant all of eternity is contained. This interpenetration is not discussed in this text, as it is more an aspect of the vision of mahayoga. (eg. the gsang snying). This aspect never seems to have the emphasis in Tibet it does in certain Hwa Yen and Zen teachings. But it is there, and it is correct to think of ati notions of the form aspect of enlightenment in this way. [KPSR VCTR] thabs: Upaya, skillful means, method, expediency. In the mahayana, the paramitas are called the path of means that ripens, and prajna is called the path that frees. In the tantra a similar distinction is often made between the practices having form as upaya and the formless ones beyond distinction like mahamudra or ati as the path that frees.

thag gcod: Settle, resolve, decide, have "got it."

thams cad mkhyen pa['i ye shes]: Omniscient [wisdom] which knows all phenomena without mixing, as the buddhas do. It is associated with the wisdom of extent, pure perception, and the vision of gandavyuha.

theg chen: Mahayana, the bodhisattvayana.

theg dman: Hinayana, including the shravaka yana and pratyekabuddha yana.

theg pa [dgu]:

thig le: Bindu. See rlung.

thog babs chen po: The great suddenness. Sudden realization.

three kinds of enlightenment: byang chub nram gsum: of buddhas and bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas, and shravakas.

thub pa: 1 Capable or mighty one: Reach, arrive, encounter.

thugs rje: In ati is sometimes equivalent to the power of manifestation [rtsal] and like the latter = manifestation in general = ruupakaya which produces benefit for others, bringing them to dharma-kaya, the benefit for oneself. But here there is the idea that all manifestations are either offerings for the enjoyment of enlightened beings, or presentations of the teachings to those who are not enlightened. In this case these sense of rtsal as skillful performance, articulation, etc is relevant. The individual receives teachings exactly suited to his needs and understanding, a personalized Embodied as yang dag, the vajra heruka of the bka' brgyad, the mandala of eight heruka-principle of mahayoga.

ye nas: Like gdod nas, back-looking eternity, primordial, from the beginning; hence translated "from all eternity." But it also keeps going limitlessly and hence is eternal.

ye shes lga: The mirror like wisdom, wisdom of equality, wisdom of individual discrimination, all-accomplishing wisdom, and dharmadhatu wisdom. They are discussed in the text.

ye shes: wisdom, literally primordial awareness or knowledge. Pristine cognition, direct intuition of absolute reality beyond conception. Sometimes the kayas and wisdoms ye shes sems dpa': One visualizes that jñanasattva, of similar appearance to one's visualization of the deity of sadhana, samayasattva, embodying spontaneously existing wisdom, descends and transmutes one's visualization. Ideally an experience of this actually occurs. Usually the visualization has the same outer form as that of samayasattva.

yi dam: Short for yid kyi dam tshig, samaya of mind. Deity of tantric practice that one is performing, eg. Chakrasamvara, Vajrayogini, especially the deity of one's main practice.

yi dwags: hungry ghost, one of the 6 realms of beings.

yi dwags: Preta, hungry ghost. Some have huge bellies and minute throats and suffer great torments of hunger and thirst. Some are rather like our conceptions of ghosts or malignant spirits.

yid bzhin nor bu: Wish-fulfilling gem, a mythical gem that makes things "as one desires," rather like Aladdin's lamp.

yid dpyod: Intellectualization, conclusion reached merely conceptually. ES.

yid kyi nam shes: Intellectual consciousness. See tshogs brgyad.

yid: Mind, intellect in general; = Yid kyi nam shes.

yo ga: Yoga, the sixth yana, see theg pa dgu.

yod pa: Existence. In conventional truth it is said that there can be no existence without non-existence. They are complementary. In madhyamaka it is argued that if anything has the characteristic of existence it ought to be intrinsically existent and hence eternal. So existence is equated with eternalism, and nonexistence with nihilism. What exists should be changeless and incapable of interaction with anything else. Relying on this logic, the texts will sometimes draw conclusions about existence that seem less than obvious in ordinary english. Readers will have to resolve questions of the ultimate validity of these statements for themselves by studying the appropriate texts.

yon tan bcu: Various lists will sometimes be so called. 1) The ten paramitas. 2) The stobs yon tan bcu, the ten powers of a buddha. 3) The ten abstentions from unwholesome karmic paths: 1 Not destroying life. 2 Not taking what is not given. 3 Refraining from improper sexual activities [together these are the three good actions of body.] 4 Not speaking falsely. 5 Not using abusive language. 6 Not slandering. 7 Not speaking frivolously or irrelevantly [together these are the four good actions of speech.] 8 Not being covetous. 9 Not being malicious. 10 Not having wrong view [these together are the three good actions of mind.] see CH 4 yon tan lnga: ES. KSTR. These are as follows: 1 rnam dag pa'i shing kham, completely pure buddha fields. 2 rgya tshad bral ba'i gshal yas khang, immeasurable celestial palaces. 3 gsal zhing dag pa'i od zer, pure and radiant light rays. 4 khyad par. phags pa'i gdan khri, highly exalted thrones. 5 dgyes rgur spyod pa'i longs spyod, rapturous enjoyment of doing what is desired.

yon tan: 1 good quality, virtue, excellence 2 object, property 3 skill, learning, knowledge. 4 Buddha qualities, enlightened qualities, the qualities of the pure perception of enlightenment. They are said to be eternally existing but to manifest when one attains enlightenment, as does wisdom etc. Sometimes these are differentiated from qualities of enlightenment that can be said to be produced. In particular the ten powers, four fearlessnesses, eighteen distinct doctrines of the buddhas, and thirty-two major marks are called the sixty-four qualities of a buddha. They are described eg, in the Uttaratantra.

zang zing: 1 Worldly possessions or offerings. 2 Tumult, turbulence, disorder. Cf. za zi zhi byed: The pacifier, the system of Phadampa Sangs rgyas. It is discussed in The Blue Annals, p 867 ff.

zhi gnas: Calm abiding, tranquility, serenity, quiescence [neither = nirvana of the karma of pacifying] A basic meditation practice found in most schools of buddhism. The mind is tamed and sharpened by being brought back again and again to the meditative object. In practice the breath is the most used object. Originally in hinayana shamatha was practiced in order to attain the dhyana states, bsam gtan) yogic trance states in which bliss, equanimity, and various higher perceptions were claimed to be experienced. However even hinayana claims that such states do not constitute enlightenment and can easily lead to various spiritual attachments.

In ati, shamatha is practiced not to attain one-pointed trance-concentration on an object, but to cut off attachment to thoughts and perceptions, which then are left as they are. By doing this one can directly experience one's self-existing true nature, one and all sufficient, and rest in that. With repeated practice this resting becomes spontaneous, and one realizes the basic nature as unchangeable and self-existing, like a mountain. This is the same buddha nature that is realized as bodhicitta and so forth in ati. However, here it is realized only as one's own true nature. Many subtle conceptualizations must be eliminated before it becomes known as the universal nature.

In the Semdé shamatha is described as part of a fourfold process of realization, zhi gnas, lhag mthong, gnyis med, lhun grub. NN

—steng po: inert shamatha. —ltengs po, the pool of shamatha = —steng po zhi: 1 Peace. 2 Pacifying (one of the phrin las lnga). 3 Nirvana zhing or sangs rgyas zhing: Realms of particular buddhas where sentient beings attain enlightenment. Eg. this is jambudvīpa which is the buddha field of the buddha Shakyamuni. The infinity of buddha fields is a major theme in such tathāgatagarbha sutras as the Gaṇḍavyūha and Avatamsaka. Pure land or realm. Each of the five bhagavans is associated with one. Akaniṣṭha and gaṇḍavyūha are called buddha fields. Twenty-five [sometimes twenty-one] such fields are said to be on the hands of Vairocana. Yid bzhi mdzod 28ff. [v. ES] corresponding to the permutations of body, speech, mind, quality and action, as body of body, speech of body, etc.

NOTES

¹. This work is part of a trilogy. The other titles are like this one except for substituting bsam gtan, dhyana/ meditation and sgyu ma/ illusion for sems nyid. Dzogchen or ati is the tradition that this teaching is part of, and also its fruition. A basic understanding of the titles is that samsara involves suffering and weariness. The view that sees the nature of mind, practicing meditation, and regarding activity from the viewpoint of all things being illusory are means of easing or weariness or relaxing tension. The result of doing so is resting in the great perfection.

The three means regarded from the viewpoint of the great perfection produce the fruition. If they are samsarically regarded they are part of the problem. The sanskrit offered for sems nyid is citta, whose primary meaning is mind in the conceptual sense, the very thing that needs to be eased. In the same way meditation as the notion that our being is intrinsically bad and needs to be made into something else is a problem. Illusion in the sense of clinging to confused views and goals is a problem. This points out a central point of ati, that this very world of samsara is the world of nirvana, when we relax our confused fixations about it and stop struggling with the projects that confusion suggests of saving ourselves and the world from spiritual degradation.

². Mind, sems, sometimes = samsaric mind sometimes = sems nyid the nature of mind = enlightened mind.

³. realm. The same name is used for a bodhisattva personifying the sambhogakaya buddha field of Vairochana.

⁴. bstan bcos, usually treatise or shastra. Here KPSR said that the sense was more the teachings in general, and US said that the connotation was teachings delivered for certain purposes.

⁵. This increases merit so that enlightenment is gained. If reasoning is rightly used it inspires people to appreciate directly the experiential meaning of the teachings and teacher. But often the result is just the opposite, to make it all seem very conceptualized, abstract, and proud of its orthodoxy. It becomes uselessly circular. The teachings are true because the Buddha taught them, and the Buddha is an authentic, true person because the teachings say so. We have to be inspired to see for ourselves what is meant. For example, the Gelugpas often begin more with reasoning and then practice. The nyingmas and Kagyus tend to start in the middle with some of both. But in the end, if they practice well, they all go to the same place. KPSR.

By means of the ten causes, two types of faith arise: outer faith and inner faith. There are three types of outer faith: faith of faith, faith of desire and faith of trust.

The object that gives rise to the faith of faith is the three jewels. The object that gives rise to the faith of desire is the four truths...[details omitted]... relying on samsara and nirvana, knowing what to accept and what to reject are the essence of the faith of desire. The object that gives rise to the faith of trust is both virtuous and evil deeds. Do not make white actions the ground of all dharmas.

Inner faith also has three aspects. The first: the object of the faith of faith is the holy guru who is the authentic embodiment of all places of refuge. The second, the faith of desire, is the desire that the mind of the holy guru and one's own mind be inseparable. It is the desire to mix together the guru's mind and one's own mind at all times, day and night. The third is the faith of trust: One should attain confidence in the knowledge of the realization that the body, speech, and mind of the guru and one's own body, speech, and mind are inseparable.

In this contrast is not between greater and lesser degrees of conceptuality in cognition.
